Mr. CLAY. I am opposed to this bill, and I should be glad if I could engage the attention of the Senate to the reasons on which that opposition is founded. I am against the bill partly on financial and partly on constitutional grounds. As a measure of finance, what is it? It proposes to take the public money, and lend it to the claimants under the French and Neapolitan treaties at an interest of four per cent., and to guaranty the ultimate payment of the whole amount stipulated by both treaties. Now, as a question of finance, is the Government of the United States justifiable in loaning out the public money to individuals at four per cent. at a moment when the Legislatures of several of the States have augmented the rate of interest to six and seven per cent., and the rate of money in the market is, in fact, not less than from ten to twenty per cent.? Such an arrangement seems to me extremely injudicious. When we look at the state of the Treasury, I ask, can we do it? The Secretary of the Treasury says that there will be a deficit on the 1st of next January, so great as to render it necessary to recall a part of the sums deposited with the respective States under the act of the last session. Suppose that necessity should arise, and, in consequence of the expenditures of the Government, and of this advance of nearly two millions of dollars, it should become indispensable to recall a part of the money deposited with the States, in what condition should we find ourselves? These States are now using the money at an advantage of from six to ten per cent., and you will recall it out of their hands, to lend it to private citizens at an interest of four per cent. Would this be wise?

But I have other and higher objections to this measure. What is it, in point of fact? Is it not a loan by the Government of the United States to certain claimants, or their assigns, of the amount of two instalments under the treaty with France, and of six instalments under the treaty with the Neapolitan Government? Is not that the substance of the bill? Now, I ask, have we a right to make such a loan? If we have, I should like to see that part of the constitution under which the right is claimed. I understand that the action of this Government in regard to claims of her citizens on a foreign Government is a mere agency. We get for A, B, and C, the amount of their individual claims on a foreign Government, so far as we can do it consistently with the general interest of the whole country, first to be secured in our negotiations with that Government. But here, in order to secure these private claims, we are to guaranty the fulfilment of treaties by two independent foreign Governments. I say that we have no right to advance the public money on the face of these treaties, more than we have to loan it in any other case. Suppose the Barings or the Rothschilds had created a debt to our citizens to the amount of these two millions, might you advance the money? On what principle are you to guaranty these treaties? What security is there provided in this bill for the repayment of this money by the claimants who receive it, in the event of revolutions subverting the Governments of France or Naples, and thereby causing the treaties to remain unfulfilled? What right have we to grant to individuals this large premium? Is it not a positive grant of the whole difference between four per cent. and the value of that money in their hands, be that ten or be it twenty per cent.? Some part of these indemnities are not to be paid for five years to come; even that from France is not to be received till two years hence. Do you not then, in substance, grant to particular individuals for five years to come this difference between four per cent. and the interest the money may command in market, or for purposes of speculation, on the whole amount of their respective claims? On what ground, either of the constitution or of expediency, will you make these gratuitous donations? I hope that when the Senate shall consider the bearings of this bill, either as a financial measure, or in its aspect toward the constitution, or even as a mere question of expediency, they will not concur with the chairman of the Finance Committee in the measure he has proposed. True, it will bring some relief to the claimants, and, through them, to the commercial community. But we have no right to pass any such law. A grant, out and out, of five millions of dollars to the merchants of New York, or of Philadelphia, would no doubt be of great assistance to them, and to the whole communities of those cities. But what right have we to make such a grant? The principle is now to be established that the Government of the United States, being an agent for claimants who have demands on foreign Governments, as soon as a treaty shall be established, is to advance the amount of the claims therein provided for out of the public Treasury, and the people of the United States are to lose the difference of interest which may accrue, and this Government is to endorse the engagements entered into by all those with whom we make treaties. I hope no such precedent will be established. These claimants had all justice done them in the efforts of this Government for thirty years to get these treaties ratified. All justice was done them in the treaties themselves, as well in that with France as in that with Naples. Their claims have been secured, and now they should be content to wait, and receive their money as other creditors do. The Government of the United States should not be required to interpose in advance the public money at four per cent. to a few favored individuals, to whom it is worth six, ten, and fifteen per cent.

MR. WRIGHT. This bill has been placed before the Senate for consideration, and I am entirely unaware of any thing like personal or party feeling on the part of any of those who have had an agency in preparing it. The committee believed that this money was in the Treasury, and that it would remain there at least during all the time which would be requisite to complete the indemnities under the French treaty, (which constitute the heaviest amount,) and it certainly never did occur to me that any constitutional question was involved touching the power of Congress to make this advance to our own citizens. It did and it does now appear to me a simple, proper, and advantageous mode of investing the money, if it is in the Treasury. The investment will be made on the credit of these two Governments. If it is not made, the money will remain in those banks where it is placed by law. If you invest it as proposed by this bill, it will draw an interest of four per cent.; if it remains in the deposit banks, it will produce but two per cent. So much for the financial view of the matter. And I would, very respectfully, suggest whether it will not come to precisely the same thing, as to the constitution, whether the money is disposed of in the one way or in the other. If it is not constitutional to place it in the hands of claimants at four per cent. it is not constitutional to place it in the hands of the banks at two per cent. If the one is a loan, so is the other; and, financially, four per cent. is better than two. It remains for the body to say whether this will not be a discreet use of the money which is in our hands, and which is not so much wanted for any public use as that this application of it will disturb the community. On the first day of this month there were five millions in the Treasury. I had supposed that there could be no question, whatever our legislation might ordinarily be, that there would be money enough to answer the appropriations we shall make, and to enable us to make this advance also. Half the amount of the French balance comes back in May, and one sixth of that under the Neapolitan treaty will be reimbursed in the fall. We have often been told that this is a time of peculiar pressure in our commercial cities; and to whom is this money due? To merchants; every dollar of it, so far as it goes, will tend directly to relieve the embarrassments of the money market. If, then, the effect of this bill will be thus beneficial, and if it conflicts with no principle, and if relief at those points most pressed is relief to the whole country, it does seem to me that the bill ought to pass, and it shall have my support.

MR. CALHOUN. I have been forcibly struck with the remarkable contrasts daily exhibited before us, in the language of gentlemen of the majority. How long is it since a member [Mr. BENTON] rose, and, after doling out to us a long list about standing appropriations, informed the Senate that by the distribution bill of last session the Treasury had been deprived of the means of providing for them; and that his brain was laboring daily and nightly to discover other means to meet these necessary expenditures of the Government. Now, the chairman of that very committee (both Senators being with the administration) rises in his place and tells us there will be a surplus of means. I am glad to hear it. If the one opinion had any weight with us, I hope the other will have at least as much. But how are we to explain these things? One day we are told we have an overflowing Treasury, and something must be done to reduce the surplus; the second day we hear from a member of the same Finance Committee that there is no money to meet the public appropriations; a third day arrives, and behold the Treasury is full again. The honorable member says he never heard there was any constitutional difficulty in a measure like that now proposed. I certainly have heard constitutional objections to loans, again and again. The question involves a right to give away the public money. This very loan would be a positive gratuity, in the existing state of the money market. Money is worth two and three per cent. a month, and here you are going to pass a bill loaning it to certain individuals at four per cent. a year. The difference is a pure gift. Have we a right to make such a gift? If we have, let the Senator show it. But, he says, if we do not make this disposition of the money, we shall place it in bank, and get but two per cent. for it; but then, I ask, what right have we to put it in bank? We have none to put it there as a loan, but for safe keeping only. I object to this bill in toto. It is a new extension of power, and Heaven knows power has been carried far enough already. We are now to commence the loaning of money at low interest. Establish the practice, and will not Government have the power of selecting A and B, to whom these loans are to be made? Can a more tremendous power be thought of? I understand the motive of the Senator from New York very well. He is opposed to the distribution bill, and he is ready to resort to every shift to avoid returning the surplus in the Treasury to the pockets of the people. That is his object; but I appeal to that overwhelming majority who last year voted for the distribution bill, whether they will sustain him in it. The Senator is unwilling that the money shall go back to the people, and he resorts to this as a means of effecting his object. I am glad the Senator from Kentucky made a constitutional point, and I hope the Senate will pause before it gives its sanction to a measure of this character.

Mr. BENTON said he rose to give the Senate some information; and it should be drawn from a source to which Senators in the opposition would not object. Mr. B. then proceeded to quote at length the official returns of loans made by the Bank of the United States, amounting to $20,337,236, in one year, distributed into classes according to the length of time for which the money was loaned, and then observed that the four per cent. which would be paid by these claimants to the Government was as much as the Bank of the United States charged to its great borrowers, whilst small borrowers were left to deal with middle men, to whom they had to pay two and three per cent. a month.

Mr. CLAY. I concur with the Senator from New York in believing that there are no party considerations involved in this measure, but that it will be examined upon its own merits alone. It cannot be forgotten that, at the last session, the measure contained in this bill formed a part of the scheme of the Senator from New York. All surpluses, instead of being placed in the deposit banks, were to be invested in stocks and domestic securities, but the plan was put down by a large and decisive vote; now it is revived; and under what circumstances? Has the gentleman shown that the revenue will be sufficient to meet the wants of the year, and to cover this advance also? The Secretary of the Treasury tells us the very reverse. He tells us that there is a high probability that it will be necessary to recall a portion of the deposits made with the respective States. Under these circumstances, so entirely different from those of last session, he proposes to us to make this gratuitous advance of two millions of dollars. I have said that it is in substance a loan; and how did the Senator from New York answer me? By saying, that if you loan now, you have done the same heretofore. I call for the constitutional provision which authorizes such an act. But, even in a financial view, I deny his position. He says that you now loan at two per cent., and that this loan will bring you four. But, in the first place, it is no loan to the deposit banks. We place the public money in those banks for safe keeping only—they get the benefit of the use of the money—and you ask of them an allowance of two per cent. But granting it to be a loan, still it is better than that now proposed. Is it not better to loan your money at two per cent., when you have power to recall it at pleasure, than to make an investment of it at four per cent. for five and six years, where it is beyond your control? While it is in the deposit banks it is ours—we can employ it instantaneously; but if we pass this bill, the money is tied up—we shall not get it for five or six years—and, in the mean time, we lie under a guarantee for the whole amount. If the honorable chairman—I beg his pardon, I had almost called him the Chancellor of the Exchequer—I mean the chairman of the Committee on Finance, knows that he has got a surplus in the Treasury, I can suggest to him other modes of employing it, much better than in anticipating the indemnities under these treaties. There are stocks in the States, and bonds bearing five per cent., which are to be purchased at par. If his object is financial, why not invest in these? These are objects which lie within our own country; and should the Government lose the money, it would not be lost to the country. But here, if a foreign Government shall fail to reimburse the amount we advanced to our own citizens, the loss falls on the country at large. But it is impossible to get over the objection that it is a loan or purchase of securities, and in either view there is nothing in the constitution which will justify it.

As to the relief of the community, if they want to relieve the community, let them repeal the Treasury cr-

der. I am glad to learn that there is a bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands, which has that object in view. Let the administration cease to make these ruthless attacks upon the currency, and the country will get a little quiet. But as to the relief by this bill, what is it? There are two or three hundred claimants in the city of New York, Boston, and our other commercial cities; and your relief is to advance them what they claim, and take an assignment of these two treaties to secure the reimbursement of your money. But, I repeat it, if you want to relieve the pressure of the community, without any regard to the constitution, open your Treasury, give to Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and Baltimore, two millions apiece. That would relieve them. Supposing we had certain claimants, A, B, and C, having demands upon a foreign Government, and they should prefer a memorial here, asking for a loan of the public money equal to the amount of their claim, would you grant it? Would you lend the money on any security, even the best security of a domestic kind? If not, then I ask, how are you going to anticipate these payments? I think the bill involves a most important principle. If the precedent shall once be established of thus loaning the public money to individuals, no human being can foresee where it will go to. I hope this bill will meet the fate now which it did at the last session.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will explain as far as I am able the grounds of this bill, and then, having discharged my duty, I shall be content to wait the result. But now let me correct a few of what I conceive to be erroneous impressions on the part of both the Senators who have opposed the bill. I understood the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] to throw out in the haste of debate an argument which implied that this bill proposed an advance of two millions of dollars to two foreign Governments, and that if the money should be lost, the benefit would accrue to those Governments alone. I had no such purpose, nor does the bill contain any such provision. It proposes to advance this money, not to foreign Governments, but to our own citizens; and if the money should be eventually lost, it is our own citizens who will get it; so, if the public money should be invested in State stocks, and through any contingency should be lost to the Government, still the money would not go out of the country, but would remain in the hands of our own citizens. I cannot consent for one moment that an impression should go abroad that this bill proposes to advance money to a foreign Government. The advance is to be made to our own merchants; to American citizens; to as worthy members of the community as are any where to be found; and to men whose enterprises are as beneficial to the Treasury as those of any other class in the country. I know of no description of citizens who are to be preferred to them.

As to the constitutional question, I only repeat what I before said, that if any constitutional objection lies against advancing this money to the claimants, it lies equally against putting it in the hands of the deposit banks. It is as much a loan in the one case as in the other; and unless gentlemen shall attempt to distinguish the cases, I rest content in that position, and think that the considerations of expediency are decidedly in favor of the law. The Senator says that the public money is placed in the deposit banks only for the purpose of safe keeping. Admit it; and will any gentleman get up in his place and say that the credit of the French Government is not as good a security as the credit of the deposit banks? If he thinks so, I do not. I believe that the security is as perfect as any that we can have. But it is said that the operation of this measure will be bad. Sir, with certain gentlemen it is utterly impossible for me but in one way to devise any measures whose operation will be good. Last session I proposed to invest the public money in these very securities which have been referred to by the Senator from Kentucky, and he strenuously opposed it.

[Mr. CLAY here rose to explain. He had said that it would be a better investment of this money to place it in State securities, than to loan it to these claimants, but he had not said that either disposition of it would be a good one.]

I understood the Senator; he was only amusing himself by proposing another measure which he did not approve, that he might with the more severity denounce that proposed in the bill. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] says that I am consistent at least. I certainly have endeavored to be so at all times; in this particular case I return the compliment. The object of that Senator is clear and manifest, and he is consistent in pursuing it by every means in his power. But, surely, if it had been my object to accumulate a surplus in the deposit banks, I should have endeavored to keep the money there, and not let it go out for any purpose; but such is not my desire. My course in respect to the deposit bill of last session has been repeatedly stated on this floor, and let me say that on that subject I acted as I thought right. I have complained of no one who differed from me in opinion, and most of my friends, as well as those who are usually in opposition to me, did think differently on that point. I regretted it then, and still do regret it. Yet, far be it from me to say that the wisest course has not been adopted. Sure, however, I am, that many then voted for the distribution of the surplus, who would never desire to see such a measure repeated, and who would gladly avoid accumulating a surplus for the gratification of distributing it among the States. Such are decidedly my own feelings, and such will be my course on that subject.

The Senator from South Carolina thought proper to remark, on a statement made here in reference to outstanding appropriations, in a manner which would lead a stranger to suppose that the statement had been mine. It was not mine, but was made by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON.] I did not understand that Senator to contend that if no further appropriations should now be made, there would be a deficit in the Treasury. His argument was this: that in reducing the revenue we must refer to appropriations already outstanding, and which, on the 1st of January of the present year, the Treasury had not the means to meet; and that, therefore, we could not reduce the revenue so far nor so rapidly as might otherwise be done, and as it was proposed by some to do.

I am told that I have made a choice admission, and the Senator hopes that it may have great weight with the Senate. Let us see what this important admission amounts to, and what it is that the Secretary of the Treasury said. He said that, as far as he had the means to calculate, if the appropriations should be made in the manner he expected, the revenue of the current year would be consumed, and, in addition to it, two millions out of the five which ought to be left in the Treasury; and that, consequently, there would be left there but three millions. I have not undertaken to impeach this statement, nor have I pronounced any opinion in confirmation of it. These are the opinions of the fiscal officers of the Government; and if they are correct they show that there would be more money in the banks than it is proposed by this bill to advance; then it must be remembered that near half the money will return into the Treasury this year, so that at the end of the year you will have but half this advance outstanding. If that be the admission of a dangerous surplus, the Senator is welcome to the entire benefit of it. I knew that gentlemen would differ about this bill, and that some might differ about its principles, but I have heard nothing to create any difficulty with me. I say that this advance could be made without any injury or interruption to the fiscal affairs of the Government; that the money will be as safe on the security of these treaties, as if in the hands of the deposit banks; that it will bring us double the interest, and that it will go so far toward relieving the country from the existing pecuniary pressure, and that the relief will be applied precisely at the points where it is most needed.

Mr. CALHOUN addressed the Senate in reply. The Senator says that this advance of money will be no more a loan than if the money is retained in the deposit banks; and that, if there is any constitutional objection against the one, it applies equally to the other. If that argument is good, it only shows that the entire scheme of keeping the public money in the deposit banks is itself unconstitutional. The Senator professes, I believe, to be a strict constructionist, and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. STRANGE] has told us that there is no spirit in the constitution, but that its words themselves, and they alone, must declare its meaning. Now, I call upon the Senator from New York to show, in the words of the constitution, any authority for making such an application of the public money; and I again submit whether it is a fair argument in favor of such a measure to plead the remote analogy of the deposit banks. No, sir. The constitutional argument remains unanswered; it is not, and it cannot be, answered.

The Senator from New York says that, as I have complimented him on being consistent, he will return the compliment; and admit that, in this case, I am equally so; and I understood him to go farther, and to intimate that I am in favor of accumulating a surplus in the Treasury. Sir, the Senator dare not assert such a position. I have indeed seen an assertion of that character in a dirty sheet published in the city from which the Senator comes; but I never yet heard such a palpable falsehood uttered on this floor. If the Senator attributes that design to me, he asserts that which is not, and never was, true. From the very beginning I have been opposed to the policy. The Chief Magistrate, who is the object of adoration to that Senator, in the draught of an inaugural address, had a paragraph recommending the permanent investment of surpluses as they might accumulate in the Treasury; but the paragraph was (in part, through my exertions) subsequently stricken out. The Senator knows, and the Senate will all recollect, that, in introducing the deposit bill at the commencement of this session, I distinctly stated that I proposed it only as an alternative measure; that I greatly preferred a reduction of the revenue; but was very apprehensive that no such reduction could be effected. Such has been my constant course. I hope to have an occasion before long of entering on this whole subject, when I shall have an opportunity to show who have, and who have not, been consistent. I shall then show the part which has been played by some prominent individuals, and shall be able to demonstrate my own consistency as clearly as the noonday sun. I claim to be consistent through my whole political course.

But the Senator from New York undertakes to explain for the Senator from Missouri. I rather think, however, that the latter will not accept, or thank him for, the explanation. Who does not remember his declaration, that there were fourteen millions of appropriations still unprovided, and that his head was occupied day and night in trying to find out the means of meeting them? Sir, I again call upon Senators on all sides of the House to stop and pause; to remember that this is pre-eminently a country of precedents; that our legislation is to a great extent influenced and guided by the legislation of those who have preceded us. We are now to commence the practice of loaning the public money to individuals. There will be a large surplus in the Treasury, and ample means will be afforded to carry out such a system to any extent. Who does not see the immense power which this will place in the hands of the administration? Who does not perceive the control which may thus be exerted over elections, when the favorites of the Government can obtain, at the rate of four per cent. a year, large sums of money which they can instantly loan at two per cent. a month? It will enable the Government thus to bestow a perfect gratuity on those who serve it; and this, forsooth, is a measure advocated and brought forward by gentlemen who profess to be strict constructionists, and who tell us that there is no spirit in the constitution.

Mr. WRIGHT rejoined. I had no idea, in the few remarks I made, of exciting the feeling which has now been manifested; nor had I any conception how my own feelings could possibly be disturbed in a discussion on this bill. As to what I said in reference to the gentleman from South Carolina, I am not answerable for any supposed case which that gentleman may be pleased to put. And I here say to him, in the best temper, that, when standing in my place, and performing my public duty on this floor, I do not think of what I "dare," or what I "dare not," assert; it is not my habit to indulge in feelings of that kind. I endeavor to treat all subjects of legislation coolly, fairly, and dispassionately; such has been my course, and such I intend it shall be.

Mr. CALHOUN explained. He had understood the Senator, when complimenting his consistency, as laying emphasis on the words "in this particular case;" and he had understood the Senator as almost asserting, in terms, that Mr. C. was in favor of accumulating a surplus for distribution, for which assertion there was not the slightest shadow of ground.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had presented a petition from several of his constituents in favor of this measure, and, approving the object of it, he should make some remarks in its support. He found it the easiest thing in the world to raise a storm in this body. He had supposed when this bill was taken up it would be almost impossible that it should excite feelings in any quarter.

He thought the less they talked about consistency here the better. He did not think it any credit to a man to prove himself consistent in the manner which seems to be required; for then, if he had begun wrong, he must remain so all his life, in order to reach the proper standard. If gentlemen would recur to past measures, they could perhaps all prove each other to be inconsistent; but, at the same time, it was disagreeable to notice it, and of no benefit whatever to the argument. We ought to grow wise by experience; and if our opinions should differ now upon any subject from what they were twenty years ago, no one had a right therefore to charge us injuriously with inconsistency.

Mr. B. said he should not vote for this bill, if he thought it would interfere in the least with the deposit bill of the last session. He had voted for that bill as a choice of evils; he was entirely satisfied with that vote, though his case had been very singular, for he had been denounced at home as an enemy of the deposit bill, and censured as its friend on the other side. He had undertaken to support it as a choice of evils; and he had ever continued to support it, both on this floor and elsewhere.

He would never vote for this bill, if he felt any doubt of its being constitutional; and if the contrary should be proved to him, he would vote against it. The constitution authorized Congress to impose and collect taxes. If, from any cause, there should be ten or fifteen millions in the Treasury beyond the demand for purposes of the Government, what would you do with it? Must it remain locked up there useless, or rather destructive to the community? Could there be a doubt of the constitutional power of the Government to act like any other proprietor, and make this money productive? Mr.

B. was opposed at the last session to the investment of the surplus in the State stocks. If he could see no distinction between that case and this, he would vote against this bill. But he thought there was a distinction. In this case the Government was originally bound to assert the claims of citizens of the United States on the Governments of France and Naples. These claims the Government had asserted, and had secured their payment by treaties; and now, on every principle of public law and faith, we had become a self-constituted guarantee for the full execution of these treaties. We were bound to see them observed; our faith was pledged for that purpose; and it would be our duty to compel the payment of the money by force, if no other means should be found adequate. The citizens of the United States had now a perfect right against these foreign Governments, and this Government is bound to see it carried into effect. Whilst he made this observation, he entertained no doubt but what the instalments would be punctually paid by these nations. What was now to be done? The money was in the Treasury, and great benefit would be derived from its circulation, both to our commercial cities and to the people generally.

As to the danger of such a precedent, it amounted only to this: that if ever the Government of the United States should again be in such a situation as not to know what to do with its means, and such treaties should again exist as the present between us and other Governments, we might again advance such amounts to the claimants. This was the whole force of the precedent; and he did not believe that a similar case would be likely to occur in our day. On the question of our ability to make this investment, without touching the deposit act, Mr. B. had no doubt whatever.

Mr. DAVIS. This bill was up in substance last year. I do not know by what argument gentlemen will justify their vote in its favor, for, I believe, they voted last year the other way. I do not, however, bring this as any reproach; for provided a man votes right, it is better to be inconsistent than still to remain in the wrong. I only intend to justify the vote I shall give now. I am at a loss to see how the question as to the surplus in the Treasury has much to do with the matter. The Government of France confiscates American property—the property, not of this Government, but of private citizens. The Government of the United States (because there is no other mode of calling a foreign nation to account for its actions) made a demand on France for indemnity. The Government, in such a case, makes the application merely because private citizens cannot make it—it acts for them. Well, we made a treaty, and by that treaty France agreed to pay the indemnity we demanded; and it has in part been paid. Whose is this money? It has been spoken of in this debate as if it was money of the United States; but it is no such thing; it is received indeed at the United States Treasury, but not a dollar of it belongs to the Government. The Government holds it only as an agent, as a trustee for the claimants, who are very many. The same remarks apply to the claimants against the Neapolitan Government. That Government has in like manner admitted our demand, and entered into a treaty to pay it by instalments. The Government receives the money, and it is their business to see that it is duly paid to the claimants. That is the whole history of the matter; and what does it prove? It proves that the United States have no interest in this money or control over it, and have no right to dispose of it. We are not acting on this money, for we have no right to touch it; but the question is whether you will, before these instalments fall due, advance the amount of them, distribute it among the claimants, and trust to the Governments of France and Naples to reimburse the money. Now, I ask, what difference is there in assuming the payment of these indemnities and any other debts in the community? Why not go to the bank and buy up their paper, or go any where else you please and purchase up what you believe to be good debts? What is the difference? But that is not the only difficulty. When you have paid out this money from the Treasury, what security have you that it will ever come back again? You have the promise of France and Naples. True; but suppose they refuse to pay the money, where do you stand? Have you any indemnity from these claimants? Are they bound to reimburse the money? Not at all. You must get the amount from France and Naples, or you do not get it at all. How often have Governments sunk, and all their engagements utterly failed?

But now let me put this matter in a little different shape. Suppose the chairman of the Finance Committee had introduced a bill proposing to guaranty the fulfilment of these two treaties, would not every Senator have asked, why shall we endorse the promises of the Governments of France and of Naples? And I still ask, why? Have we any interest in these payments? Did we act for ourselves in obtaining these promises? Not at all. We only negotiated for others; and we hold the money merely as trustees. Why shall we guaranty? We have fulfilled all our duty in obtaining the treaty. Why are we, in addition to this, to guaranty its stipulation? I ask whether any one vote could have been obtained for the naked proposition of guarantying these payments? I think not one.

This seems to be the whole case. I thought so last year, and I think so now. Perhaps my own constituents are as largely interested in this matter as those of any other gentleman. And I should certainly be most happy to see them realize their money and get their debts paid. But I do not feel authorized to vote for this bill. It seems to me to be an act wholly uncalled for. It has no connexion whatever with the money in the Treasury; it is not the money of the United States, and there is no need that this Government should assume the risk.

Without discussing the constitutional question, I shall be satisfied to vote against the bill.

Mr. CALHOUN demanded the yeas and nays; and they were ordered by the Senate.

Mr. BUCHANAN would say but one word in reply. He observed that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] had been looking over the journal; and Mr. B. would now say that he did not vote against this bill at the last session, though, if it had come up, he should have done so, because he would have been unwilling thus to diminish the dividends of the surplus among the States. His vote then was only against considering the bill. Had he then voted against the bill itself, gentlemen might now produce the journal, and show his inconsistent votes upon its face; and yet it is manifest that this would prove any thing but inconsistency. It would prove nothing more than that he had preferred depositing the amount covered by this bill with the several States, to advancing it to the French and Neapolitan claimants. Circumstances had since entirely changed; and thus many other apparent inconsistencies might be reconciled in the same manner.

Mr. DAVIS said he did not consider the vote of the Senator from Pennsylvania then, as of any importance at all at the present time. He had laid no stress upon it.

Mr. BAYARD made a few remarks in opposition to the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. If the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] understood me as intimating that this was a mere financial expedient to get rid of the surplus in the Treasury, he was wholly mistaken. As to the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] his difficulty is, that we shall guaranty the Governments of France and Naples. And he asks, with his usual clearness and force, whether, if this were a mere proposition to guaranty the engagements of those two Governments, any Senator would vote for it. He thinks not, and thence infers that they ought not to vote for this bill. I will put a case to the honorable Senator. Suppose he held a claim for two millions of dollars against the Government of the United States; he wants the money; he brings me the evidence of his claim, and asks me to endorse the promise of the Government of the United States; I decline to do so; he then says, if you will endorse you shall have the money at two per cent., and the Government will allow you four. Now, though I might refuse to guaranty without a remuneration, yet, if I gain two per cent. by the transaction, I might then be willing to endorse.

Mr. DAVIS. That is precisely my objection to this bill. It is a mere mercantile business transaction, and I think it does not become this Government to be a purchaser and dealer in stocks.

The question was now put on ordering the bill to its third reading, and decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Dana, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Linn, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wall, Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Moore, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Strange, Swift, Tomlinson, White—22.

So the bill was rejected.

After the consideration of executive business, The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 19.

Hon. THOMAS CLAYTON, Senator elect from the State of Delaware, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

TEXAS.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, through ANDREW JACKSON, jr., his private secretary:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with the resolution of the Senate dated the 16th instant, I transmit a copy and a translation of a letter addressed to me on the 4th of July last, by the President of the Mexican Republic, and a copy of my reply to the same on the 4th of September. No other communication on the subject of the resolution referred to has been made to the Executive by any other foreign Government, or by any person claiming to act in behalf of Mexico.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, January 18, 1837.

COLUMBIA, (IN TEXAS,) July 4, 1836.

MUCH ESTEEMED SIR: In fulfilment of the duties which patriotism and honor impose upon a public man, I came to this country at the head of six thousand Mexicans. The chances of war, made inevitable by circumstances, reduced me to the condition of a prisoner, in which I still remain, as you may have already learned. The disposition evinced by General Samuel Houston, the commander-in-chief of the Texian army, and by his successor, General Thomas J. Rusk, for the termination of the war, the decision of the President and cabinet of Texas in favor of a proper compromise between the contending parties, and my own conviction, produced the conventions of which I send you copies enclosed, and the orders given by me to General Filisola, my second in command, to retire from the river Brassos, where he was posted, to the other side of the river Bravo del Norte.

As there was no doubt that General Filisola would religiously comply, as far as concerned himself, the President and cabinet agreed that I should set off for Mexico, in order to fulfil the other engagements; and, with that intent, I embarked on board the schooner Invincible, which was to carry me to the port of Vera Cruz. Unfortunately, however, some indiscreet persons raised a mob, which obliged the authorities to have me landed by force, and brought back into strict captivity. This incident has prevented me from going to Mexico, where I should otherwise have arrived early in last month; and, in consequence of it, the Government of that country, doubtless ignorant of what has occurred, has withdrawn the command of the array from General Filisola, and has ordered his successor, General Urrea, to continue its operations. In obedience to which order, that general is, according to the latest accounts, already at the river Nueces. In vain have some reflecting and worthy men endeavored to demonstrate the necessity of moderation; and of my going to Mexico, according to the convention; but the excitement of the public mind has increased with the return of the Mexican army to Texas. Such is the state of things here at present. The continuation of the war, and of its disasters, is therefore inevitable, unless the voice of reason be heard, in proper time, from the mouth of some powerful individual. It appears to me that you, sir, have it in your power to perform this good office, by interfering in favor of the execution of the said convention, which shall be strictly fulfilled on my part. When I offered to treat with this Government, I was convinced that it was useless for Mexico to continue the war. I have acquired exact information respecting this country, which I did not possess four months ago. I have too much zeal for the interests of my country to wish for any thing which is not compatible with them. Being always ready to sacrifice myself for its glory and advantage, I never would have hesitated to subject myself to torments or death, rather than consent to any compromise, if Mexico could thereby have obtained the slightest benefit. I am firmly convinced that it is proper to terminate this question by political negotiation: that conviction alone determined me sincerely to agree to what has been stipulated; and, in the same spirit, I make to you this frank declaration. Be pleased, sir, to favor me by a like confidence on your part; afford me the satisfaction of avoiding approaching evils, and of contributing to that good which my heart advises. Let us enter into negotiations by which the friendship between your nation and the Mexican may be strengthened, both being amicably engaged in giving being and stability to a people who are desirous of appearing in the political world; and who, under the protection of the two nations, will attain its object within a few years.

The Mexicans are magnanimous, when treated with consideration. I will clearly set before them the proper and humane reasons which require noble and frank conduct on their part, and I doubt not that they will act thus as soon as they have been convinced.

By what I have here submitted, you will see the sentiments which animate me; and with which I remain your most humble and obedient servant,

ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANNA.

To His Excellency General ANDREW JACKSON,
President of the United States of America.

The President of the United States to the President of the Mexican Republic.

HERMITAGE, September 4, 1836.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th of July last, which has been forwarded to me by General Samuel Houston, under cover of one from him, transmitted by an express from General Gaines, who is in command of the United States forces on the Texian frontier. The great object of these communications appears to be to put an end to the disasters which necessarily attend the civil war now raging in Texas, and asking the interposition of the United States in furthering so humane and desirable a purpose. That any well-intended effort of yours in aid of this object should have been defeated, is calculated to excite the regret of all who justly appreciate the blessings of peace, and who take an interest in the causes which contribute to the prosperity of Mexico, in her domestic as well as her foreign relations.

The Government of the United States is ever anxious to cultivate peace and friendship with all nations. But it proceeds on the principle that all nations have the right to alter, amend, or change, their own Government, as the sovereign power, the people, may direct. In this respect, it never interferes with the policy of other Powers, nor can it permit any on the part of others with its internal policy. Consistently with this principle, whatever we can do to restore peace between contending nations, or remove the causes of misunderstanding, is cheerfully at the service of those who are willing to rely upon our good offices as a friend or mediator.

In reference, however, to the agreement which you, as the representative of Mexico, have made with Texas, and which invites the interposition of the United States, you will at once see that we are forbidden, by the character of the communications made to us through the Mexican minister, from considering it. That Government has notified us that, as long as you are a prisoner, no act of yours will be regarded as binding by the Mexican authorities. Under these circumstances, it will be manifest to you that good faith to Mexico, as well as the general principle to which I have adverted, as forming the basis of our intercourse with all foreign Powers, make it impossible for me to take any step like that you have anticipated. If, however, Mexico should signify her willingness to avail herself of our good offices in bringing about the desirable result you have described, nothing could give me more pleasure than to devote my best services to it. To be instrumental in terminating the evils of civil war, and in substituting in their stead the blessings of peace, is a divine privilege. Every Government, and the people of all countries, should feel it their highest happiness to enjoy an opportunity of thus manifesting their love of each other, and their interest in the general principles which apply to them all as members of the common family of man.

Your letter, and that of General Houston, commander-in-chief of the Texian army, will be made the basis of an early interview with the Mexican minister at Washington. They will hasten my return to Washington, to which place I will set out in a few days, expecting to reach it by the 1st of October. In the mean time, I hope Mexico and Texas, feeling that war is the greatest of calamities, will pause before another campaign is undertaken, and can add to the number of those scenes of bloodshed which have already marked the progress of their contest, and have given so much pain to their Christian friends throughout the world.

This is sent under cover to General Houston, who will give it a safe conveyance to you.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON.

To Gen. ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANNA.

The message and documents having been read,

Mr. PRESTON rose and said it would strike the Senate at once that since the date of the letter written by

SENATE.]

Texas.

Santa Anna, his situation had been very much changed. On the 4th of July last he was a prisoner in the hands of the Texans, but had been subsequently released, and was now in the city of Washington. According to the terms and purport of the correspondence, it would appear that it was carried on whilst Santa Anna was a prisoner. The President of the United States, aware of that fact, had expressed himself as being unable, in consequence, to enter into any negotiation with him while so situated. But now, as he (Mr. P.) had just stated, Santa Anna was in this city, and could negotiate on the subject up to April next; but whether he would or would not, he (Mr. P.) could not say; nor was it very material to the purpose Mr. P. had in hand. There was a resolution in relation to Texas offered a few days ago by the honorable Senator from Mississippi, and which had been made the order of the day for to-day; what disposition he wished to make of it he was not aware. It was a matter for the gentleman's discretion. The correspondence which had been laid before the Senate, however, would not, in his (Mr. P.'s) opinion, render it necessary to change the language of the resolution. Concurring, as he did, with that resolution, he would now say that he was prepared to establish the fact, that upon the recognised principles of national law, the practice of this Government, and the policy of the country, she ought, as was her duty, to make a prompt, speedy, and absolute recognition of the independence of Texas. He hoped, at the proper time, to be able to prove this. He insisted that her independence should be immediately acknowledged, and that, too, without any regard to what might be said or done by Santa Anna, for his authority had ceased in Texas forever. After having heard read the present and the other message of the President in relation to this subject, it was not his desire that any thing should be done here in reference to it, that would have the effect of contravening, running counter to, or obstructing, any purpose of the Executive of the United States.

He (Mr. P.) had understood that the President, when he sent his former message, had submitted this matter to Congress for their consideration, being willing to carry into effect what they might deem right and proper; but there were, at that time, some difficulties in the way, which prevented his recommending the adoption of any legislation on the subject. It seemed to him (said Mr. P.) that had the President of the United States not been aware of the fact that another expedition under General Bravo was about to invade Texas, he would not have hesitated to recommend to Congress to do something in reference to settling the war between Texas and Mexico.

Mr. P. adverted to the circumstances connected with the failure of the expedition under General Bravo, and then concluded with saying that all he desired was that Congress should proceed as early as possible to discuss the question of immediately acknowledging the independence of Texas. She was entitled to it; she had a right to demand it of the United States, and the sooner it was granted the better. He would await the action of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] as well as the consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi, when he would have something further to say on the subject.

Mr. WALKER, without intending to enter into any discussion at this time, wished to state some information he possessed previous to the Senate acting on it, because he considered the question of the recognition of the independence of Texas as having no connexion with any thing that General Santa Anna might now do. He considered the claim of Texas to be founded as well on the settled policy of this Government, as on the laws of nations, and that it ought to be decided on its own merits.

It would be recollected that the President, in his message, shortly after the commencement of the session, placed the condition of the recognition of the independence of Texas on the success or failure of the expedition then set on foot by Mexico, and which was about entering the Texian territory. One of the alternatives contemplated by the President had taken place; so that, according to the views clearly expressed in his message, there was now no longer cause for delaying to acknowledge the independence of Texas.

Mr. W. here read a letter addressed by him to a highly respectable individual lately arrived from Vera Cruz, whose name he said it would be improper to make public, though the letter was at the service of any of the members of the Senate who desired to see it, making inquiries respecting the contemplated invasion of Texas, with the gentleman's reply. From this letter it appeared that the idea of subjugating Texas was not entertained by any intelligent man in Mexico; that the invading army was broken up, the small remnant of it being without provisions or supplies of any kind, and that the Mexican General Bravo had resigned his command in consequence of not having been furnished by his Government with the means of opening the campaign. The gentleman further gives it as his opinion that the campaign never will open, as it is as much as Mexico can do to keep the discontented portion of her own citizens quiet, several insurrections having broken out which were suppressed not without difficulty.

Mr. W. continued, that the President, in the message alluded to, distinctly asserted that he considered that the recognition of the independence of Texas depended on the success or failure of the threatened invasion. Now, said Mr. W., the invading army being broken up and dispersed, and its commander having resigned, it would be perfectly obvious that the recognition of the independence of Texas would be in accordance with the views of the President, thus clearly expressed. He would say nothing further now, than to repeat the hope, that whatever was done by this Government might be done unconnected with General Santa Anna in any way whatever.

Mr. CALHOUN said he had always entertained the opinion that the people of Texas could never live under the Mexican Government in peace and happiness. He had thought, too, that it was our duty, at the earliest period practicable, to recognise the independence of Texas. He felt certain, from the events which had occurred in that country, that unless a speedy stop was put to what was going on there, the Rio del Norte would not be made the boundary of Texas. She would shake the Mexican empire to its very centre, if the controversy existing between her and Mexico should not instantly cease. He was ready to acknowledge her independence; and the sooner that was done the better.

The message and documents were then laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The Senate then took up several private bills, which were considered as in Committee of the whole, and ordered to a third reading; when

FRIDAY, JANUARY 20.

The bills which were yesterday considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to a third reading, were to-day read a third time, and passed. Among them, the bill to authorize the relinquishment of the 16th sections for the use of schools, and the entry of other lands in lieu thereof, in quarter sections, and in any part of the respective States, was passed by the following vote—the yeas and nays having been ordered on the call of Mr. EWING, of Ohio:

JAN. 21, 1837.]

Public Lands—William B. Lloyd.

[SENATE.]

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, White, Wright—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing of Ohio, Knight, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Rugles, Strange, Swift—12.

Mr. EWING moved to take up the bill designating and limiting the funds receivable by the United States; which motion, after a brief discussion, was decided in the negative.

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the previous orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to the further consideration of the bill prohibiting the sales of the public lands except to actual settlers, and in limited quantities. The question being on a motion of Mr. CLAY to reconsider Mr. MORRIS's amendment, requiring that land which had been ten years in the market should be sold at 75 cents; less than ten, and more than five years, at $1; and all other lands at $1 25 per acre—

Mr. CLAY said he had two reasons for moving this reconsideration. One was the avowed embarrassment under which it had placed several gentlemen. The other related to himself, being under a mistake as to the import of the amendment.

The motion to reconsider was carried in the affirmative: Ayes 19, noes 14.

Mr. MORRIS's amendment being now before the Senate,

Mr. CLAY called for the yeas and nays on the question; which were ordered.

Mr. MORRIS, on the suggestion of Mr. BENTON, added to his amendment the proviso, that no person should enter more than a quarter section at a reduced price.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. MORRIS, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Clayton, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, King of Alabama, Linn, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Tipton, Walker, White—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Dana, Ewing of Ohio, Hubbard, Kent, Niles, Page, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Wright—19.

So the amendment to the amendment, or substitute, was lost.

Mr. WALKER observed that a very important principle had been stricken from the bill, and moved that it be recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. GRUNDY said he did not see why this should be done. The bill, by the failure of the amendment, was left in the same form as when it came from the committee.

Mr. WALKER said he foresaw that the bill, in its present form, would fail; and he thought it of the utmost importance that some such measure should be carried, for the purpose of reducing the public revenue; and he regarded such a measure as the only one which could be adopted to prevent the accumulation of a dangerous surplus.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, opposed the recommitment. If the graduating principle should not be introduced, he hoped his friends would not reject the bill on that account. He hoped the Senate would go on with the bill.

Mr. EWING was in favor of the recommitment. The bill in its present form would not only not stop fleas, but camels would go through it. Mr. E. had thought of a project which he believed would effect the objects in view. He would endeavor to prepare it by Monday, and hoped for the opportunity of presenting it.

VOL. XIII.—34

Mr. MOORE spoke in favor of recommitting, and expressed the hope that some such measure would be adopted as was proposed by the original bill, (of Mr. MORRIS.)

Mr. BENTON asked Mr. EWING to point out the places in the bill where a camel could go through. He intimated that the design was to delay the bill. For himself, he wished to proceed with the bill, and obtain all he could get.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, said it would give him much pleasure to point out those places on Monday.

Mr. WALKER's motion having been withdrawn, or suspended, he moved to alter the amount of land cultivated by a settler, by making it one tenth, instead of one eighth, of the whole; which motion prevailed.

Mr. CLAY made some inquiries as to the bearing of the bill on such lands as might be used for grazing, and not for cultivation.

Mr. WALKER replied that a provision in the bill which authorized an entry of the land, after a residence of three years, was designed to supply this apparent deficiency.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the bill by requiring one year's residence instead of three.

Mr. GRUNDY objected to this motion. It would serve to defeat one of the great objects of the bill; for if one year only should be required, it would become a business to procure portions of the public land successively, by means of one year's residence on each. He was, however, willing to vote for two years.

Mr. TIPTON declared himself opposed to the form of this bill, and in favor of the original one by Mr. MORRIS. If the graduating principle which had been lost should not be embraced, several States would derive no benefit from the bill. If he could not get that principle, he should go to defeat the bill.

Messrs. MOORE and SEVIER also declared their determination to do so; the latter urging, at some length, the passage of a proper bill on this subject.

After some further remarks by Messrs. WALKER, NILES, BLACK, and MORRIS, the action on the bill was suspended by consent, and several bills from the House were read twice and referred.

The Senate then adjourned.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 21.

WILLIAM B. LLOYD.

After reading the journal,

Mr. MORRIS rose and said that he begged the indulgence of the Senate to make a short statement respecting an article which had appeared in one of the city papers this morning. It might be considered by gentlemen as partaking more of a private than a public nature, and one with which he ought not to trouble the Senate; and could he consider the paragraph as intended, or even bearing on its face a mere private individual allusion to himself, he would not thus publicly notice it; but it went further; it was a comment, in severe terms, to say the least, on his conduct as a Senator, and that, too, by a citizen of his own State; and, as such, it required of him an explanation. The charge is (said Mr. M.) that he had neglected the just rights of one of his fellow-citizens, and refused, as his representative, to present his memorial to the Senate, and thus had treated him with disrespect. It is due, then, (said Mr. M.,) to the citizens of the State, it is due to myself, that this publication should not pass without notice. It will be found in the Intelligencer of this morning, in the following words. [Here Mr. M. read the communication referred to.]

It is true, sir, (said Mr. M.,) that, on yesterday morning, after the time for the presentation of petitions and memorials had elapsed, and the Chair had called for reports of standing committees, one of the young gentlemen who attend the Senate came to his seat and handed him a paper, which he found to be a memorial, and which he believed was correctly published in the Intelligencer of this morning; and with the memorial he also received a note, of which the following is a copy:

"DEAR SIR: As a friend, I ask you to present the accompanying memorial to the Senate. As one of your constituents, I demand it.

"Yours, with the highest respect,

"WM. B. LLOYD.

"If you do not present it, please return it immediately to me in the Sergeant's room. W. B. L."

Mr. M. said that, on reading the note, he wrote at the bottom the following words:

"SENATE CHAMBER.

"SIR: Your memorial was handed me after the time in which memorials can be received on this day had elapsed. I return it: am willing to see and converse with you on the subject. What your rights are I am not prepared at this moment to determine.

"THOS. MORRIS."

He said that after he had endorsed the name on the note, it occurred to him as proper to keep the paper and send back the memorial only. He immediately sought an interview with the person who sent the memorial, with an intention of handing it back himself; and for this purpose he went to both doors of the Senate chamber, but was unable to meet with him at either. He returned to his seat; and soon after one of the young men came to him and informed him the gentleman was in the antechamber. He then handed the young man the paper, to return it to the author. He said, had time been afforded him for examination of the memorial, he might or might not have presented it, as justice and propriety should seem to require. He acknowledged that it was not only his duty, but a pleasure, when requested so to do, to present memorials or petitions on all or any subjects within the power or control of the Senate, and which were in proper language, not only for the citizens of Ohio, but also from citizens residing in any part of the United States. Whether the memorial in question was or was not of that character, the hasty manner with which he perused it did not enable him to determine, nor did he wish to be understood as expressing any opinion on that point; and while he considered the note of the gentleman as containing some biting sarcasms, of which he did not complain, it also contained a kind of left-handed compliment for the humble part which he took in the transaction to which the memorial referred. What transpired then is well known, and need not be repeated. As to the part he took, and the observations he made, they had been correctly, or at least substantially, reported in the National Intelligencer. The impression made on his mind at the time the proceedings respecting the memorialist took place, he probably could not, nor did he wish to make an attempt to describe.

He said he was hastily led to make the remarks he did, because he thought the proceedings of the Senate, with regard to the individuals who created the disturbance in the gallery, were wrong; but whether right or wrong, not himself, but aftertime, must determine; for himself, he said he had as yet seen no cause to change his opinions as expressed at the time; and he would further state that, while the proceedings in the Senate were going on, after the person was arrested, he was entirely ignorant who he was, or of what State he was a citizen. Near the close, and but a minute or two before the Senate adjourned, he was informed by some gentlemen that the person was from Ohio; he inquired his name, and was told it was Lloyd; he then had a recollection of having seen him some days before, and had understood from Mr. Lloyd that his business in the city was to endeavor to obtain the passage of an act of Congress making an appropriation to improve the harbor at Cleveland, by the erection of a sea wall. He said his efforts, be they what they may, were not made in defence of a friend, or in opposition to an enemy; he should have made the same efforts had he known the individual to have been both a personal and political opponent; he merely intended to discharge his duty as a Senator, in sustaining what he believed to be the rights of an American citizen. Sir, (said Mr. M.,) I think I understand this publication; it is intended to go to the State in which I live, and I have troubled the Senate with this explanation, that it may immediately follow, and that my conduct, in this particular, may be correctly understood. He said, so far as in him lay, no citizen of Ohio, or of any other State, should have it in his power to misrepresent his course in the Senate. He said the peremptory language contained in the gentleman's note he considered as the mere effect of excitement, and, as such, could readily be excused; he said it was but human nature to do and say things in excited moments which we would gladly alter or amend on future reflection; he said he had no idea that the language used was intended as any personal disrespect to himself; when he read the note, he thought it would be better to see and converse with the person as to the propriety of the course to be pursued; but he denied that he had, in this case, been either negligent or unmindful of his duty; at least, he had the approval of his own judgment, and should under like circumstances pursue a like course. It was very strange, indeed, that Mr. Lloyd should complain, when his instruction was to return him the memorial immediately, if it was not presented; and it is still more strange when, in his publication, he says that he might procure the presentation of it through other members of the body who were his friends; and the very reason he assigns for not applying to some one of them, is a reason why he ought so to have applied. There is no doubt he can obtain the presentation of his memorial through some member of the Senate, if he yet desires it, or if he ever did desire it. Should he fail to make a further request, the citizens of our own State will be able to draw correct conclusions.

Mr. BENTON said Mr. M. was correct in regard to every thing on which he had offered an explanation. That Senator had said it was not his fault that the arrest was made, and that the person arrested was brought to the bar of the Senate. Mr. B. now wished to show that it was not his own fault that the memorial was not presented, referred, and considered. He had been aware that a consultation was going on, and that some movement was intended; and, without the least reference to the terms of the memorial which he supposed would be presented, he resolved that, so far as he was concerned, it should have its full force. He had therefore drawn up a motion, which he intended to make whenever the memorial should be presented, that the memorial should be sent to the Judiciary Committee, with power to send for witnesses, and to report to the Senate the proper course of proceeding; and that the expenses should be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate. This motion he had shown to various Senators; and his friends had been kind enough to say that it should be done. If any gentleman would do him the favor to present the memorial, he would vote for its reference. He hoped there would thus be an occasion of giving to the public, in an authentic form, the details of the outrage. He asked for the presentation of the memorial.

Foreign Emigrants—Treasury Circular, &c.

FOREIGN EMIGRANTS.

Mr. CLAY presented the petition of sundry inhabitants of Wirtsborough, Sullivan county, New York, and, as it was not long, he asked that it might be read.

The document was accordingly read, and proved to be a kind of remonstrance, on the subject of Roman Catholic emigrants to the country, brought in under the auspices of Popes, Cardinals, Bishops, &c. It insisted on the impropriety and inexpediency of allowing so many persons to enter the country whose practice and tenets were avowedly and directly hostile to our republican institutions, and especially prayed Congress to institute commissions, in various parts of the country, to procure information and report on the subject.

Mr. CLAY said some of the objects prayed for this Government had no power to grant, however alarming to these good and religious people the evils complained of and the progress of papacy might be. But there was one object which Mr. C. thought might be a proper subject of inquiry, being within the power of Congress; and that was a change in our laws of naturalization. He therefore moved that the memorial be referred to the Judiciary Committee; and it was so referred.

THE TREASURY CIRCULAR.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom the motion of Mr. BENTON for an inquiry into the conduct of the deposit banks, &c. was referred, moved that the above committee be discharged from the further consideration of said motion, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BENTON said he thought it a grand joke that three or four days after a bill had been brought in by the Committee on the Public Lands, on the subject with which his motion was connected, after the occasion for which that motion was presented had entirely gone by, the gentleman should now propose to have the examination proposed by the motion, and by another committee. He thought the Land Committee ought to have acted on the motion, or turned over the whole subject to another committee.

Mr. WALKER said that, inasmuch as the Committee on the Public Lands had been arraigned before the Senate by the mover of that resolution, ["motion,"] he hoped he would be pardoned for giving the reasons for discharging the Committee on the Public Lands. That resolution was not transmitted to the committee till some time after the committee had commenced considering the subject of the Treasury order; or, at least, it had not come simultaneously with the Treasury order to the committee. It was, moreover, the opinion of the committee, that if they proceeded to act on the matter of the resolution, [Mr. BENTON'S,] there could be no action by Congress this session, on the subject of the Treasury order; and it was the desire of every member of the committee that such action should be had. It would have consumed the time of the committee for months, and it would even have been necessary to carry the required examination into the recess of Congress.

Mr. W. said that, although he had assented to the reference of the subject of the Treasury order to the Committee on the Public Lands, he had done so with the utmost reluctance.

Mr. BENTON said the subject of the Treasury order was referred to the Land Committee late on the evening of the 11th inst., and his resolution was sent to that committee as early as it could be on the morning of the 12th. That resolution had also been laid on the table at the very commencement of the proceedings on the Treasury order, so that every one might see it. But if there was not then time to carry that resolution into effect, why, at this late day, was it proposed to refer it to another committee, and to a committee, too, of which Mr. B. was a member? How would this thing tell in the newspapers, that the gentleman who moved to make these inquiries should proceed to make them himself?

Mr. KING, of Alabama, said this resolution passed without attracting his attention, or else he would have opposed its passage. If it was intended to impede the action of the committee, it would have done so effectually. And if there was a real intention of obtaining the information called for, it could not be obtained during the session. He could see no practical good to result from its reference now to the Finance Committee. He therefore called for a division of the question, and that the motion for a simple discharge should first be tried. The gentleman might then make such disposition as he thought proper of his resolution.

Mr. EWING said the subject of the resolution properly and exclusively belonged to the Finance Committee. He also had known nothing of the resolution since it was first laid on the table till this morning. He thought it better to divide the question, and leave the resolution in the hands of the mover.

The question was then taken on discharging the committee, and carried in the affirmative.

Mr. BENTON said he would here state to the whole Senate that he desired his resolution to be referred to the committee of which he was a member. It was accordingly referred to the Finance Committee.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate then proceeded to the special order of the day, which was the land bill, as amended by the Committee on the Public Lands.

The question being on so amending the bill as to require a residence by the settler of but one year to get a title to his land, it was negative: Yeas 12, nays 23.

Mr. GRUNDY then proposed to substitute a residence of two years. The motion was supported by Messrs. WALKER, KING of Alabama, LINN, and TIPTON, and opposed by Mr. EWING, as being wholly inefficient to the object proposed. Mr. E. stated that he had a different proposition to offer, which, as he supposed, would secure the object of confining the sale of public lands to actual settlers, and which he sent to the table to be printed. The printing was ordered; but the question being, in the mean while, taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. GRUNDY, it was carried: Yeas 27, nays 11.

Mr. BENTON gave notice of an amendment he should hereafter offer; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALKER, from the Land Committee, proposed sundry minor amendments, not touching the general principle of the bill. The whole of the various amendments were directed to be embodied, and printed all together, in their order; when the further consideration of the bill was made the order of the day for Monday next.

After transacting some other business,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, JANUARY 23.

PUBLIC LANDS.

After going through the usual morning business, The Senate proceeded to the special order of the day, which was the bill to confine the sale of the public land to actual settlers only.

Mr. WALKER, chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, who has charge of the bill, expressed his approbation of an amendment offered on Saturday by Mr. EWING, and which provides that land entered, and forfeited, by non-residence, under the bill, might be entered by others who shall prove the fact of such non-residence by the first occupant, and proposed to modify it by a provision that, when two or more persons should so claim the forfeited land, who inhabit the same quarter section, the preference shall be given to the first occupant; and that none of the others should get "floats," (i. e. pre-emption rights, to be located on any land not entered elsewhere.)

In consequence of some objections to the term "float," as unknown to the law and undefined, he agreed to waive the latter clause entirely, as being, in substance, provided for in other parts of the bill. The residue of his amendment to the amendment proposed by Mr. Ewing was then agreed to.

Mr. W. also proposed several other verbal amendments, which were agreed to.

Mr. TIPTON then moved an amendment, introducing the principle of graduation, and providing that land remaining unsold for ten years should be sold for one dollar an acre; and if remaining for fifteen years, at seventy-five cents the acre, with a proviso that not more than 160 acres be sold to any one man; on which he asked the yeas and nays, and they were ordered by the Senate.

Mr. EWING, thinking this a fit opportunity to go into the general principles of the bill, and the subject of the public lands generally, addressed the Senate in a speech which, with his consent, was interrupted by a motion for adjournment. The motion, having been suspended for some previous motions for the printing of documents, prevailed.

The Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 24.

MARINE CORPS.

Mr. PRESTON offered the following resolution; which was, by consent, adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the construction of the act of the 30th June, 1834, regulating the pay of the marine corps, by the Fourth Auditor, and into the propriety of any further legislation thereon.

Mr. PRESTON, when offering this resolution, remarked that he understood the design of the above-named act was to put the pay of the marine corps on the same footing with that of the infantry of the army. The construction of the Fourth Auditor had made it lower, contrary, he thought, to the design of Congress.

Mr. BUCHANAN (Mr. PRESTON having referred to him) said he had already given notice that he wished to introduce a bill to remedy the construction of the Fourth Auditor, and he was prevented from introducing it only by information that the Naval Committee of the other House had reported a bill on the subject. He was, however, gratified that Mr. P. had turned his attention to the subject.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate then took up the bill to prohibit the sales of the public lands, except to actual settlers, and in limited quantities.

The question pending was on Mr. TIPTON's amendment, offered yesterday, to the first section of the bill, "that all lands that have been in the market ten years, and remain unsold, shall be sold for seventy-five cents an acre; and all that have five years, shall be disposed of at one dollar; provided that not more than one hundred and sixty acres be sold to one purchaser."

Mr. EWING concluded his remarks, as given entire in succeeding pages.

Mr. E. addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: As it is my purpose to examine this subject with some care and exactness, and, as far as in my power, show it to the Senate in its true colors and proportions, I find it necessary, in the outset, to spend a few moments in clearing it of some of the rubbish with which it is overlaid and surrounded.

The bill now under consideration is the successor, not exactly legitimate, of one introduced by my colleague at the commencement of the session, for limiting the sales of the public land to actual settlers. That plain, unpretending proposition was what it professed to be, and nothing else; the title declared the object of the bill, and though I thought the measure impracticable, I could not but feel the justness of the motion, and the straight-forward means proposed to effect the object. That bill was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and we have here, reported back, in its name and in its place, what is now before us; and the title is all that is left, either of the letter or spirit of the original bill. But, even this small relic of what the bill once was, if I divine aright, is destined to be obliterated and destroyed. The title is not descriptive of the contents of the bill, nor is it sufficiently magniloquent. When the bill arrives at such stage that it will be in order, we shall have a motion to amend it, and, if the motion prevail, it will become "A bill to arrest monopolies of the public lands," &c. &c. &c.; the title is long and high sounding, and is to be found at large in the journal of last year, and I will not now detain the Senate by reading it. I will, however, endeavor to show, before I sit down, what name it really merits; for I intend to discuss its provisions, not its title.

This debate has been freely interlarded with high denunciation against a class of our fellow-citizens called "speculators"—men who purchase public land either for subsequent sale, or that it may lie by, as an investment of money to raise in value, and become a resource in after life, or an outfit for their children. And I have observed, also, what is not a little remarkable, that those who denounce these "speculators" the most loudly and the most frequently, on this floor and elsewhere, are those who understand them best, and who are themselves the most deeply engaged in the vocation which they thus condemn. This is generally, perhaps universally, the case. This disinterestedness of gentlemen who condemn thus openly their own calling, and devise laws, intended, as they say, to check and put it down, reminds me of an incident in modern history worthy to be remembered.

When Lord Chancellor Bacon was convicted before Parliament for receiving presents from suitors, which bore a very strong resemblance to bribes, and was removed from office, he was the foremost in proposing and concurring measures which should thereafter effectually keep off such temptation and sin in future, and most certainly protect the purity of the bench. It reminds me, also, of a late occasion on which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] near me was so deeply impressed with the aristocracy of the Senate—himself certainly not the least aristocratic of its members—that he felt constrained to turn "States' evidence," or, perhaps, rather, "people's evidence," against the whole body, himself, of course, inclusive, though I believe he did not suggest any remedy for the enormity which he exposed. Now, this is all right; and it is honorable; and it is unquestionably sincere. I take no exceptions to it, but merely notice it among the passing incidents of the times.

Now, sir, I will say a few words as to this class of individuals who are so much the theme of discussion and of attack; and, that my opinion may have the more weight, I can assure the Senate that I am neither an aristocrat nor a speculator in public lands. I do not know that I have been accused here of the one or the other, but I have heard gentlemen on the other side of the House talk loudly and harshly of speculators, and those who favor speculations, while, at the same time, they made strong gestures towards the benches here. As it referred to no one in particular, I could only appropriate to myself my just distributive share of the reproach which, lessened by division, would be but small.

Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

Yet that modicum, insignificant as it may be, I am prepared to dispose of. I therefore say, once for all, that I am wholly free from the offence of having ever purchased public land or any thing else from the General Government. And I have no sympathy, save that of general good-will to all mankind, with any who I know have so purchased. I never entered an acre of public land in my life, and do not know that I ever shall; nor do I know that any friend, or even acquaintance of mine, is engaged in these purchases. My neighbors, it is true, in whose welfare I take great interest, do sometimes raise a little spare money and go to the West and purchase a quarter or a half section of land, to settle a son who is about to arrive at the years of manhood, for which they pay the cash into the Treasury of the United States; and until gentlemen satisfy me, more fully than they have yet done, of the impropriety of the thing, I shall esteem them none the less for it, nor shall I the less assiduously advocate their interests and their rights.

But, in declaring my utter exemption from all participation, direct or indirect, in that kind of investment which is here condemned in such unmeasured terms, I do not at all admit the truth or justice of the judgment which condemns it. It is a use of money that is supposed to be unpopular, and it is no new artifice to exclaim against it, as if it were a crime, until, by force of voice and repetition, it may come to be esteemed so; and what is more to the purpose, those who are most deeply engaged in it, by being loud and vociferous in its condemnation, throw off all suspicion from themselves, and stand the pure advocates of the people's rights, and the very antagonist principle of all speculation and monopoly. But, sir, I see no objection to this mode of investing money when you have it to spare, and can make no better use of it. If it be fairly done, it is a fair, and just, and honest mode of acquiring property. The United States, by a public law, and a public proclamation, offers its land for sale at a stipulated price; an individual, who is desirous of possessing the land, goes and purchases, and pays his money. Now, why, I ask, does any one here apply to this act, or the man who does it, opprobrious epithets? Why accuse him? Why denounce him? If he had bought fifty hogsheds of sugar, or a hundred bales of cotton, he would be just as criminal, and deserve just the same opprobrium and reproach from the members of our National Legislature. Gentlemen are mistaken; these purchases and speculations, in which they and their friends are so deeply engaged, are not criminal, nor even improper in themselves. They are liable, indeed, and especially liable, to be contaminated, by fraud or force, or combinations among purchasers, and collusion with public officers; but from these they and all honorable men, as a matter of course, are free. They therefore pronounce a harsh and unjust judgment on their own acts, and I am prepared to defend them against themselves before the Senate and the nation.

[Mr. WALKER here rose to explain. If the gentleman's allusion was to any thing he had said, so far from criminating purchasers of this description, he had, in the report accompanying this bill, expressed many of the same sentiments just uttered by the Senator from Ohio. He had denounced, and ever should denounce, in the strongest terms, those speculators who attended public sales after having taken down the numbers of lots improved by actual settlers, and bid them off over their head, thus depriving them of their homes and the fruit of all their toil.]

Mr. EWING. I referred to the Senator from Mississippi who has just taken his seat, and also to others who, in both branches of Congress, habitually use the same course of remark. But I accept the explanation with pleasure, and regret that absence from the Senate prevented my hearing the Senator's principal speech on this subject, and that a pressure of business since my return has not allowed me time to read his report accompanying this bill. My remarks, so far as the Senator from Mississippi is concerned, applied to several short speeches of his on incidental questions touching the bill, which have arisen within a few days past. But I cannot concur with him in the distinction which he draws between those who purchase occupied and unoccupied lands of the United States. When all are offered in open market fairly for sale; when all who desire to bid are invited by law to become bidders, I cannot recognise the right of any individual to press forward upon a choice piece of the public land, before the sale, against law. Nor can I admit that, by so doing, he makes the lawful purchaser amenable to censure, any where, for purchasing according to law. The proposition is monstrous in itself, and it must be a diseased state of public morals that can hold it for a moment either reasonable or just. My guide on this subject is the law—those who purchase according to its letter and its spirit, and who neither break through nor evade its provisions, no matter how much or how little they may buy, and no matter who may have intruded upon the land before the purchase, I hold them in that matter blameless; and, as far as my information goes, in nearly all the cases in which occupied land is purchased the squatter is paid many times over the value of his improvements; and often permitted to remain and enjoy them.

The sales of land in large quantities to large capitalists, as a matter of public policy, is liable to some objections, though it produces good as well as evil consequences. The evil is sufficiently obvious, and being a very happy subject for popular declamation, it has been reiterated, I know not how often, already in this debate. That which occurs to me as substantial, and which we can obviate by legislation, without producing other and worse mischief, are, the entries, by an individual or company, of many small tracts, as of forty or eighty acres, in commanding points, all over the country, or what is called dotting, thereby compelling purchasers of the neighboring tracts to pay enormous prices for such choice spots; but it will be seen that this bill, so far from remedying that evil, makes it infinitely worse. No man can now enter more than two forty-acre tracts, and one of those subject to certain conditions—proximity to his farm; but if this bill becomes a law in its present shape, he may enter no less than thirty-two of those small tracts, and he may select them any where on the public lands between the northern extremity of Wisconsin and the southern cape of Florida. The entries of large tracts by great capitalists, with a view to enhance their value by great and important improvements, such as railroads, canals, harbors, cities, have produced, and are producing, the most important advantages to the districts of country in which they are situated. Look at the southern shores of Lake Erie, and the whole coast of Lake Michigan, and see the towns and cities which are rising up on their borders, under the fostering care of capital and intelligence, and you will see at once the full strength of this position. The scattered resources of a thousand individuals, who should have purchased each his quarter section of land in the neighborhood, could not have produced such mighty results in half a century as have been brought about in a few years by the investment of accumulated capital. It has facilitated migration by the establishment of lines of steamboats between the cities on the eastern shore of the lake and those remote western points which a few years ago were a wilderness. It has opened harbors, drained swamps, built wharves, and erected warehouses, transferring the business and bustle and comfort and intelligence of an old and cultivated community into the very heart of our remote Western forests. Fortunes, perhaps, are made or augmented by it, but it is well. The value of land is enhanced greatly all around these selected spots, but this also is well; it is a just reward of enterprise and public spirit, and it injures no one, for the broad prairies of the interior are still open to the grazier, and the plains and woodlands to the farmer, at the Government price, and a nearer and more extensive market is open to him in the new and flourishing cities which arise on these choice selected spots. I am not, therefore, prepared to condemn, even as a matter of public policy, the countenance which our present laws give to this kind of investment by the capitalist. Much less am I disposed to join in the denunciation of those who, under and pursuant to our laws, adopt this mode of investing their surplus capital. Gentlemen even here are perhaps too much in the habit of addressing themselves to the lowest passions of the lowest portion of society, and, while they themselves are insatiate in their thirst for riches, speak of poverty as if it were a merit, a good thing in itself—and wealth, or even competency, as if it were a crime. I, for one, unite in nothing of this feeling or expression; if a young man shows himself industrious, enterprising, and intelligent, and bids fair to rise in the world by these qualities, I am not prepared, as a statesman, to tell him that the moment he has risen he will have lost his claim to the affections of his country and the respect and regard of its rulers. And in our country, where industry, sobriety, and prudence, will in almost all cases raise a man to competence, I do not think that mere poverty, too often the result of indolence and intemperance, is of itself sufficient to entitle the individual to our special affections and regard. In my opinion, poverty and wealth are, or ought to be, out of the question. I esteem a man none the more and none the less for being poor or rich; and in legislation I know not how we can discriminate between American citizens according to their property. And I contend, and am prepared to defend the proposition, that the man whom industry, temperance, and intellect, have enabled to acquire a competence, is as meritorious as one whom indolence, intemperance, and imprudence, have kept poor.

I therefore put out of the question all that has been said about and against capitalists and speculators. I join in the denunciation of no class of our fellow-citizens who pursue a business which the law authorizes; and I do not make, nor do I pretend to make, any efforts to put them down. But, on the other hand, I will not consent to pass any law which shall operate against the mass of the community—against the small capitalist, the farmer, the mechanic, the laborer—for the special benefit of any class of speculators, however great their power or democratic their professions; and I believe it, that many of the executive officers, some of the very highest, next to the President himself, are deeply concerned in these land speculations. It is also said, and I believe it, that some in this chamber and in the other House are also members of these large joint stock companies, which have purchased to an immense amount. I charge no one in particular, nor do I present it as a matter of charge; but I name it to caution gentlemen who are so engaged and so interested, that they do not permit their private interest, unawares to themselves, to glide in and mingle with the performance of a public trust. How can those who are so engaged, and who have so purchased to the full extent of all their available means, how can they now, as lawgivers, say to the rest of the community, you shall not purchase—the public sales shall be closed against you—and if you wish to buy, come to us; we have land to sell in abundance, and we will sell it to all who will pay for it, without discrimination, and we sell it embarrassed by no troublesome conditions?

Gentlemen, it is true, could not be operated upon by motives of this kind, but it were well to avoid the appearance of evil; and as this bill will, if it become a law, have the direct effect of driving purchasers from the Government to the speculator, and as it is to continue, in force about long enough to enable these large companies to make sale of the twenty millions of acres which they have now on hand, the public will attribute to them this, as one of the motives which induced the passage of the act. They will be the more inclined to think so, as this act is not, and they will see that it is not, what it is pretended to be. It is not a bill to confirm the sales of the public lands to actual settlers; and an amendment which would produce that effect, laid on the table by myself, (not offered, for I could not support any proposition which would deny to my fellow-citizens the right of purchasing lands to settle their children)—an amendment which would have produced that effect, met with the universal disapprobation of the friends of this bill. This bill, therefore, is not, and the people will see that it is not, what it purports to be; and its effect, which is the important matter, will be to raise at once some fifty or a hundred per cent. the price of the lands already in the hands of the large speculators, of whom the lawgivers, who are about to pass this bill, form a very respectable part, and whose friends in the executive Departments form another portion not less large and respectable. If this law pass, a member of one of those companies, whose profits would have been confined to one hundred thousand dollars, will pocket his two hundred thousand. For this it will be said he may very well break out in terms of patriotic indignation against speculators and capitalists, and he may overflow with sympathy for the poor man. But the churlish and ill-natured will aver that the members of the legislative and of the executive Departments, who hold the key in their hands, have fed until they were full gorged with these dainties, and then locked the closet, that no one else might break in until they were ready themselves to return and renew the feast.

I have said that the amount of land in the hands of speculators is about twenty millions of acres; this, in round numbers, is very near the quantity. In a report which I had the honor to present last year, from the Committee on Public Lands, I estimated the quantity wanted for actual occupation at eight millions of acres yearly. This was then thought too high, but time will verify its accuracy. Year before last the sales amounted to about thirteen millions of acres. This year they amounted to more than twenty millions; which, taking my estimate of what is wanted for settlement as correct, (and every one admits it is high enough,) it will leave in the hands of speculators from sixteen to twenty millions of the purchases of those two years. The whole aggregate is low enough at twenty millions. This immense investment, amounting in cash (if we include all expenses) to thirty millions of dollars, has more than exhausted all the capital that can be turned from the ordinary business of the country to this object. Those who hold public stations and command political influence, or whose friends command it, have become borrowers to an immense amount of the public money from the deposit banks; and the deposit bill of the last year cut off the sources of their supply, and compels them to pour back into the fountain from which it was drawn a portion of their borrowed treasure. This state of things tends to make this business, pushed as it has been to an unreasonable extent, a precarious if not a losing business, unless the Legislature come to the relief of these borrowers of the public money. Gentlemen may say what they please about these persons, if they will only aid them by a law such as this. If they will but encumber the conditions of the sales of public land to honest and fair purchasers, so that they cannot buy of Government, but may be compelled to buy of the speculator, those who have gone farthest in proportion to their resources, and are compelled to sell, will thank you for your hard names and good gifts. And they have no reason to complain of unkindness; the Treasury order did much for them, but that cannot endure long; the public exclaim with one voice against it, and it must go down. But this bill, which better effects the same object, is to be first substituted in its stead. I see, however, by indications here, that we shall not touch the bill rescinding the Treasury circular in time for it to be taken up in the other House and passed into a law. It will not do to keep up that order to oppress the country, for the people will not endure it long. It is to be rescinded, but not by an act of Congress. We shall pass such act through this branch near the close of the session; it will be lost in the other House for want of time; and thus it will be reserved until after the 4th of March, that its final rescision may be a feather in the cap of the new administration. I infer this from the fact that this bill, for which the people do not call, is pressed in advance of the bill to rescind the Treasury order. And when I moved the other day to take up that bill, I received a most significant intimation, from a gentleman whose word is law here, that I might spare my efforts, for they were useless; and it proved so—the party refused to take up the bill.

Having considered some matters which touch this bill collaterally, and which, if it pass, will really have more influence on its passage than any intrinsic merit which it possesses, I will now proceed to consider some of the provisions of the bill itself, and show how far forth it is likely to effect its professed objects. It proposes to limit the sales of the public lands to actual settlers, and that in small quantities. The requirements of the bill in that respect are, 1st, no man may enter under one of the sections of this bill more than 1,280 acres of land; but in another part of the bill he is very generously allowed 640 acres more if he want it, to eke out his farm; so he may purchase 1,920 acres; and this is what is called "small quantities." The settlement provision requires that the purchaser should reside on the land or some part of it one year, or—not and—or clear and cultivate one tenth part of it within five years. Now, the clearing, where one tenth part of the tract is open prairie land, is not a matter of much difficulty or hardship, it requires only the burning off the grass in November, and that work is done. Then the cultivation; what is that; and how is it defined? Is it the passing a harrow over the ground, and sowing tame grass seed on it? Is it running a few furrows across a tract of one or two hundred acres, and planting corn rows upon it, with the hills a hundred yards apart? It is not to be cultivated well, but merely cultivated, and the fact of cultivation to be settled by those who make the affidavit before the register and receiver, in order to perfect the title. Those, then, who live upon the spot, and who understand it, would have nothing to do but to put up a log cabin, which would cost five or ten dollars, burn the grass off of 260 acres of prairie, and run a plough or harrow a few times across, and sow or plant a little grass seed or a few hills of corn, and the condition of the law requiring "actual settlement" is complied with. The affidavit is made, and the patent obtained. This bill leaves the fact of clearing and cultivation to the sound discretion and clear conscience of the affidavit man, who is to swear to it; and if there be any other regulation or restriction, I am not advised of it. We have a Committee on Agriculture, it is true, of which my honorable friend from Kentucky near me is a member, though not of high rank, last I believe. [Mr. CLAY: "last, but not least." A laugh.] This committee, however, has not yet reported what shall amount to cultivation, and I presume it is not the purpose of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands to refer this bill to them for their opinion. Now, my constituents who reside at a distance from the public lands, and who do not understand this mode of becoming "actual settlers" and of "clearing and cultivating land," would be unable to purchase of the Government at all, and would be driven to buy second hand of those who understood the matter better, or of the speculators who have already on hand large quantities for sale. Gentlemen who advocate this bill see in it a remedy for many great political and moral evils; among others, it is to destroy or prevent that dreadful scourge, "a surplus and distribution," for which they evince such a holy horror. This surplus was a very good thing so long as it remained in the deposit banks, and was by them lent out to those who wished to purchase public land "in limited quantities"—such, for example, as half a million of acres to a single company; but when you come to distribute, or rather deposit in the State treasuries, then it carries with it all sorts of political iniquity and corruption; it is every thing that is monstrous, no republican can bear it, and this bill is to put an end to the mischief; and this money, which, if distributed, would corrupt the whole nation, can be safely trusted with the gentlemen and their constituents, without any danger of corrupting them. Let us, say they, be the exclusive purchasers of the public land; we will not take much of it, but we want it cheap; but save us from competition! Do not permit the Ohio and Pennsylvania farmers, rough, rude fellows as they are, to come to the sales with their little wallets of cash, and bid against us—us, anti-monopolists—or enter the land that we want, while we are waiting to raise funds to secure it; withdraw all this provoking competition, pass this bill, and make it unlawful for any man living in one of the old States to come to the new to purchase Government lands, and we will let the tariff alone, we will adhere to the compromise and hold it sacred, and we will also save you from the inconvenience of a surplus and the perils of distribution. Some of these gentlemen reason with us mildly, others declaim with oratorical vehemence. Why, say they, should you collect money from the people which you do not want, merely to distribute it among them again? And when we answer that it arises out of the sale of the national domain, that we must receive or stop these sales, and when received we must preserve it in such manner as to render the most service to the whole country, they offer to relieve us of all this inconvenience by keeping the public land and the profits on it themselves; thus lightening the public burdens by possessing themselves of the public property. You have, say they, a great quantity of excellent land, which is a very great trouble to you; we and our constituents will relieve you of it at once; but do not let the people of the old States have it, or any part or lot in it; they are speculators, and they will fill your Treasury with money, which you know is a very troublesome thing. We who are not speculators, but who know how to make money by dealing in land, will take it without embarrassing you with any thing that will burden your Treasury.

These lands, which gentlemen ask, in behalf of themselves and their constituents, the exclusive privilege of purchasing at the minimum price of $1 25 per acre, are worth, by their own showing, from $5 to $40 per acre. There are yet undisposed of about one thousand millions of acres—not all of such great value, but worth, nevertheless, more than one thousand millions of dollars. Pass this bill, and follow it up, as you are certain to do if you once make the commencement, and there will be fortunes made under it, such as no crowned head in Europe can boast; Cræsus was a beggar compared with the industrious and unscrupulous speculator under this bill. Gentlemen before whose eyes these golden visions flit hate every thing they ought to hate, to induce other gentlemen to support their favorite measure: they hate the tariff, but they will endure it; they do not like the compromise, but they will adhere to it, if this bill can be passed to ease the Treasury of its cash, and relieve the people of their burdens. The public lands—an unconstitutional surrender of the public lands—is the only thing that can reconcile or pacify them.

Pacific as I am inclined to be, and much as gentlemen have operated on the easiness of my disposition, and greatly as they have alarmed my fears, I am not yet disposed to make them this large peace-offering, until I am assured that we have the constitutional power to do it; I want to see our authority, and I would like, further, to know that we can do it and be just. This public domain is a fund placed under the guardianship of Congress by a compact prior to the constitution, and which is recognised and made obligatory by that sacred instrument. And Congress is bound, by that compact, to dispose of it bonafide for the benefit of all the States, members of this confederacy, according to their proportions of representative population. And it ought to be so, for it was bought with the common blood and common treasure of the people of all the States, 'old as well as new; for I acknowledge no pre-eminence in favor of the old States. Our common ancestors fought on their soil for our freedom; and they (the small remnant of them) and their descendants (now a mighty people) are spread over our whole vast territory; and wheresoever they are, they inherit the glory as well as the rights of their fathers.

These public lands, then, are to be disposed of bonafide for the common benefit of all the States. The fund, of which we are thus made the trustee, is immense—worth not less than one thousand millions of dollars: this is now admitted; though a few years ago, when the estimate of its value was made by my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] it was scouted by gentlemen who then wanted to get the land, not because it was overflowing our Treasury with money, but because this land was not worth surveying and selling. Gentlemen, it is true, do not now ask it as a gift, but they admit the choice tracts to be worth from $15 to $40 per acre. And they ask us to withdraw from them all competition at public and at private sales, to give pre-emptions to those who shall intrude on the land, and thus secure it to them at $1 25 per acre. They only ask us to give them from about $14 to $39 an acre on all the choice land of the United States that remains to be sold. These demands, it must be admitted, are moderate, especially when addressed to a trustee who is bound to administer the fund bonafide for the equal benefit of all who have an interest in it. The privilege, therefore, which these gentlemen ask for their constituents, or those who shall become so, is a donation, and a very large one. It is against common right, and it promotes no meritorious object whatever. Suppose it to induce emigration: is that desirable to a greater extent than is now going on? Should it be the object or is it the interest of the United States, as a whole, to induce by bounties the citizens of the old States, on or near the seacoast, to abandon their farms and their homes, and migrate to the West?

The last census shows that the older portions of the old States are in fact depopulating. From the year 1820 to 1830, Virginia, east of the Blue Ridge, lost about 100,000 of its population. The same was the case, though in a less degree, with several extensive districts in others of the old States. Now, I make no objection to this; but I do not think it a desirable state of things. It is enough for us, in the West, if we receive the natural increase of the population of the old States; and it is enough for them if their increased population finds an easy access to our fresh lands, and a cheap home when they come among us. It is not wise, nor is it necessary, to give new bounties for emigration; nor have we a right to do it. Suppose the bounty to emigrants proposed in this bill were to be paid in money out of the Treasury, and the lands were sold in fair and open market to raise the money, would any gentleman from the old States, having the least regard for the rights and interests of his own constituents, consent to it, or even entertain the proposition for a moment? I think not. And where is the difference? It is the same thing in substance and effect: the mode of bringing it about gives it a different aspect.

Having considered the general objects of the bill, both as expressed and as professed by its advocates, I will now examine some of its provisions, and endeavor to show how those objects are to be carried into effect. The bill is entitled and professes to be "A bill to limit the sales of the public lands to actual settlers;" but I have said it is in fact no such thing. I call the attention of the Senate to its provisions. Who may enter land under it? Any one—man or woman, husband or wife, or both, without any evidence of residence, or of any declaration of intent to reside upon it. All they have to do is to swear that they enter it for their own use, and not for the purpose of speculation. Here is the initiation of the title. And how much land may be entered by making this oath, and under this particular section of the bill? The husband may enter 1,240 acres, the wife 1,240, the son and daughter, over eighteen years of age, 1,240 acres each—making in all, for an ordinary family of four persons, 4,960 acres; and this may be all entered in tracts of 40 acres each, making 128 tracts that a single family, such as I have described, may enter, on this "actual settlement" principle; and these 128 tracts may be dotted over all the public lands in the United States, occupying all the most commanding positions in the country. They may take your woodland in a prairie region, your springs and brooks in a country where water is scarce, and your coal banks and quarries where fuel and stone are valuable. Having thus sworn and made the entry, and obtained the certificate, the next step to procure a title is to reside on some part of the land one year within the first five; it must not be a continuous residence, but one year in all; or, erect a dwelling-house, clear and cultivate, within the five years, one tenth part of the whole; that is to say, select in the entry somewhere one tenth part of your purchases in a dry prairie, which will burn over in October or November. This burning is a compliance with the first requisition, that "to clear." The next is "to cultivate;" and that can be done, as I have already shown, in a most compendious manner. A few bushels of grass seed, and one man, two horses and a harrow, for a month or two, are sufficient to make the "cultivation;" for it has only to be sworn to generally as "cultivation"—the mode and manner of it being in no wise designated.

The next step to be taken to procure a title is to "swear" again, or to produce the affidavits of those who will swear—swear to residence, or swear to the erection of a dwelling-house, and swear to the clearing and cultivation of the one tenth part in five years. "Our army swore terribly in Flanders," said Corporal Trim.

But the person making an entry of the public lands must swear that he enters it, not in trust for any other person, but for himself or herself only. This provision prevents the father from entering in behalf of his child, the guardian for his ward, or the trustee of a will in behalf of the widow or orphan devisees; it prevents, also, an entry in execution of a charity. All open, honest trusts, those that deserve the countenance of mankind and the favor of Government, are excluded by this bill, while every species of fraudulent and secret trust will come in and evade its provisions. A person, before he is allowed to make the entry, must swear that he enters for himself, and not in trust for another. Now, suppose the affidavit to be wholly false, how is it ever to be proved that it is so? It is swearing to intent merely, and the intent at the time the oath is taken; and if some other person, who furnished the money to make the entry, go on in one month after, and clear and cultivate the one tenth part of it, and the patent issue at the end of one year, and the land is transferred accordingly, the capitalist has got the land, and he may go through the same process with hundreds, as far as his friends will go; and where is your evidence to convict of perjury or subornation of perjury? You clearly have none—the proof must come home to the time of making the affidavit; and doing of an act inconsistent with it afterwards would convict the party of a change of purpose, but not of perjury. And all who know the facility with which these ex parte affidavits are made, where much money is to be got by them, will agree with me that the fear of the law is the only restraint upon perjury in cases like this—conscience is nothing, public opinion is nothing, for all society is placed under like temptation, and public morals would, by reason of that temptation, become generally vitiated. The man who would hold out against such a state of things would be considered an enemy to his country and the interests of it, and he could reclaim his character in no way but by joining in the general plunder. If there should be a case of prosecution, and strong proof of perjury, there could seldom be a conviction, for the fountains of justice are poisoned when the public morals are thus vitiated; and there would be great danger that the registers and receivers in the several land offices would join in the fraud and share the spoils. We should hesitate long before we place before any portion of our community such a temptation to vice—such a vast amount of plunder to be obtained by fraud and crime. There is a clause several times repeated in the bill, and of course intended to be efficacious, which provides, in substance, that no legal encumbrance whatever, and no sale, or lease, or contract, as to such land, shall be, in any wise, binding, if made before a patent issues, but all such shall be absolutely null and void. Now, whatever might be the effect of this provision in the Territories, where we have a right to interfere as a local Legislature, I hold that it is wholly nugatory in the States. If an individual have title either complete or inchoate, that title is property, and, as such, is at once amenable to the local law, and must be governed and controlled by its principles. A judgment would bind the interest when the local law should declare judgments binding on imperfect titles. A contract would attach to it, and equity would enforce its obligations. A conveyance with covenants made prior to the issuing of the patent would draw to it the perfect title after the patent had issued, upon the principle either of estoppel, enurement, or relation. Gentlemen cannot, if they would, destroy the application of these principles to effect, or serve to effect, this or any other such object; and it is well that they cannot. They may provide that no patent shall issue to an assignee, for, as the vendors of property, we have a right to make what condition we please with the purchaser. But when the land lies in the States, and we sell it, we are vendors only, and we cannot accompany our sale with legal encumbrances, or immunities inconsistent with the general principles of law.

Public Lands.

I would next call the attention of the Senate to the 4th section of the bill, which grants pre-emptions to actual settlers on the public lands; that is, it permits any one who shall have gone in advance of the surveys and sales, or even of the purchase from the Indians, and intruded upon choice parts of the public land, to prove that they have done so, and then enter the land, no matter how great may be its value, at the minimum price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. I object to the principle of this section; and if the principle be adopted, I object to the language and the details, as open to the practice of the most stupendous frauds.

We have upon our statute book, yet unrepealed, an early law, punishing intruders upon the public lands. That law directs that the marshal of the district shall remove those who intrude against law on the public land, and that a fine shall be assessed upon them, on conviction in the district courts of the United States. Nor has this law become obsolete. It was recognised and its provisions extended in 1833, and it is now in full force, and as familiarly known as any other of the laws of the land. I object, therefore, in principle, to giving an important privilege, a great pecuniary advantage, to a class of individuals, merely because they have violated the laws. That statute, if it be unwise or unjust, should be repealed before any rights are permitted to accrue by intrusion on or over portions of the public lands.

But, sir, that law is a necessary and proper law—it ought to remain, and its provisions ought to be regarded and enforced. It was enacted to prevent the intrusions of the whites upon the Indian lands, and to avoid the fraud, imposition, and oppression which is the consequence of such intrusion; and, further, to prevent a possession in advance of the sales, which would encumber the lands, and operate to the injury of the purchaser. We have recently seen enough, in our own times, to satisfy us of the wisdom and foresight of our predecessors. Whence arose your Black Hawk war in the Northwest, which cost some lives and several millions of money, but from the haste of a horde of greedy speculators to possess themselves of the fine lands belonging to the Sac and Fox Indians at the Prairie du Chien? Whence your threatened Creek war? Whence your actual war in Florida, now raging, and which has cost already so many valuable lives, and which has cost and will cost more than twenty millions of treasure before it is quelled, except from the avarice, and pride, and oppression, of these intruders upon the public land and the Indian property? If the laws of the United States had been enforced, if this breach had been punished instead of being rewarded, we should have escaped all this, with its attendant train of misery to individuals and mortification to a people.

But if no evils arose from this contemplated law except those which fall on the individuals themselves who seek to take advantage of it, it would be enough to decide us at once against its policy. Those who framed it must have been aware of its tendency, and aware also that that tendency would be obvious, if the bill had, in form, the provisions which it is intended to have, and which, if it pass, it must have, in effect. The right of pre-emption is by the bill limited to those who have occupied, and does not extend in terms to those who shall hereafter occupy, the public lands. This is the form of the bill; but the effect is to give the right to all future occupants. For this measure is even now urged, on the ground that we have held out encouragement to settlers by former pre-emption laws; that, under the provisions of those laws, past settlers had been protected, and that those who entered on the public lands too late to claim protection under those laws had a right to expect that the same favor would be extended to them which was extended to their predecessors. This is the argument, and will it be less strong when urged next winter in behalf of those who shall have occupied and cultivated the public land during the summer of 1837, than it is now in favor of those who occupied during the past year? I can see no distinction. And if we pass this law now, we must pass another then, and so on in all future time. I would rather, therefore, pass at once a pre-emption law, to operate in all future time, and fairly, by law, hold out this reward to settlers on the public land, than to continue in force, as we do, the law against such settlement, with the assurance in advance that all those who break it shall hereafter receive the reward. All the evil consequences which would flow from a prospective pre-emption law, and they are many, flow from this state of things; and in addition thereto we hold out the assurance to the people that, whatever our laws may be, if resisted, they will not be enforced.

If it become a fixed principle that the actual settler or occupant gets the land which he may select, at $1 25 per acre, then will arise contests and conflicts between individuals about the possession of favorite and valuable tracts. First, it will be a race who shall get on first to take possession; then a conflict to keep it. The first who gets on, if the tract be very valuable, is likely to be driven off by a stronger hand, with the loss, perhaps, of limb, and sometimes of life. Another yet stronger detachment drives off the second "actual settler," and they in turn have to defend their possessions against a fourth; and all apply in their order to the register and receiver, and make the necessary affidavits to obtain their titles. Cases of this kind are constantly occurring, even now. A friend of mine, in the other House, who recently travelled through Wisconsin and part of Illinois, informed me that when at Mineral Point he heard a conflict for the possession of a lead mine spoken of, not as an extraordinary but as a recent incident. Two parties who contended for the mine drove each other away, and alternately took possession four or five times, with the loss of several lives. One of the party who succeeded in keeping possession, and who had killed a young man in one of their engagements, was quietly amusing himself in a store or tavern a short time after, when a young woman addressed him, and inquired his name. He told it; and she at once drew a pistol from under her cloak, and shot him through. Private revenge in these cases seems to be the only redress for murder, as the law takes no notice of incidents so common and so unimportant.

I am told that in travelling through the fine lands in the Northwest, you will see these "actual settlements and improvements" constantly forming. If it is prairie, they merely run a furrow round it. If it is a choice piece of woodland that is to be held by improvement, they will fell trees all around it, so that the top of one will lap on to the stump of another; then the woodland is enclosed, and the party is entitled to it, as an actual settler. And perhaps it is the only spot of woods within many miles in the midst of a broad prairie, and therefore of immense value; if the woody island be very large, it becomes the subject of a kind of joint stock company, or association, who all unite to "improve it," and to secure each other in the possession of it. I find the following advertisement in a Chicago paper:

SETTLERS, ATTENTION.—Notice is hereby given, that the semi-annual meeting of the Big Woods Claim Association will meet at the house of Thomas Paxton, on the east side of the Big Woods, on Saturday, the 4th day of February next, at ten o'clock, A. M., when a general attendance is requested.

JANUARY 3.

JOHN WARNE.

The particular character and purpose of these associations I will show by and by more fully. There is a false face constantly put upon this subject, not intentionally, but from a mistaken notion of the thing, by gentlemen who urge, with so much zeal and perseverance, the claims of the squatters to the lands on which they intrude. Gentlemen represent the squatters generally as poor men, seeking a freehold and a home, willing to pay for the land on which they settle, but unable to do so, because the lands are not in market, and cannot be purchased.

But how is the fact? You have more than one hundred millions of acres of land, a large portion of it excellent land, constantly in market, and open to entry at $1 25 per acre; but there is not much speculation in purchasing this, and therefore these "poor men" that gentlemen speak of, seeking a home, pass it by, and go habitually to the lands that are not in market; and they will continue to do so, let you push your surveys and sales to whatever point you may.

Then the improvements by which, under this bill, the squatters are permitted to gain a right to the land. We had that subject under consideration last year, and the proof was ample that, in a vast number of cases, I should think a majority of cases, the improvement was merely colorable, for the purpose of enabling the individual to get the land, but having nothing actual or substantial about it; and this bill requires no substantial occupation or cultivation. The individual, to give him a title to his pre-emption, must have "actually occupied and cultivated the tract for six months before the 1st of December, 1836." "Actually occupied and cultivated." How occupied? Not by residing on it; for that is not necessary to make an occupation in law, much less in the opinion of the two witnesses who are to make affidavit to the occupation. He may go on the ground, mark the trees if there be any, and burn a brush-heap, and continue to go upon it once a month for the six months, claiming to occupy, and he will make out his occupancy. He must also "cultivate." This, I am told, is done by building a little pen of rails, and sowing oats or turnips or radishes upon ten or twelve square feet of ground; and thus the "actual settler" "occupies and cultivates," and becomes the meritorious recipient of your large bounty. My colleague informs me that he travelled through a part of these public lands not long since, last summer, I believe, and he saw great numbers of these little pens, with something growing in them. I did not think to ask him whether they were square or triangular, built with three rails or four.

[MR. MORRIS. They were triangular, built with three rails.]

MR. EWING. I should have guessed so, for the economy of labor is important, and the "actual settler" could thus save one rail for the whole height of his pen—no small matter. But, after proving this occupancy and cultivation, these actual settlers sell their claim, at an advance of some two or three hundred dollars, to large capitalists, who have their agents always at hand, ready to purchase, and they go again beyond the survey, and "actually cultivate" another pen full of something that will grow in a shade, and sell again. Thus squatting becomes a regular profession. A gentleman lately from Chicago informs me that he knew a great number of the pre-emption claimants about that place some years ago, who got their claims allowed and shortly after disappeared, he knew not where; but last summer, as he was going across the country to the Prairie du Chien, he found and recognised them as old acquaintances. They were on the fine lands upon Rock river, waiting to take advantage of the next pre-emption law. I do not say that this is the habit of all who squat upon the public land for the purpose of obtaining a pre-emption; I am aware that it is not; but it is the business of many, and most of the pre-emptions fall into and pass through the hands of those who are employed for the purpose by the large capitalist, or who go in advance of him, and cater for him.

The pre-emption laws (for we have tried them for a few years past) have already produced a most fruitful crop of fraud and perjury. From papers sent each year to the Committee on Public Lands, it appears that in many cases even the pretence of possession or cultivation was not resorted to in order to get a pre-emption or a float, which could be laid on the finest land in the United States, the choicest and most commanding spots, and take them at $1 25 per acre. There was actually set up somewhere in Louisiana a manufactory of affidavits, in which the whole proof, with the justice's certificate, and every thing else necessary for the commencement of the title, were forged, leaving a blank for the name of the occupant and the tract of land. There is now pending a case of a French settler by the name of Baubien, who, about the year 1804, got permission to put up his hut under the guns of the United States fort at Chicago. When the pre-emption law was passed, as the United States had not sold this fort, he claimed it as a pre-emption. He was several times refused, but at last his claim was admitted by the register and receiver, and he got his certificate; his application for a patent is now pending. I understand that the land he claims on this state of his case is worth more than a million of dollars. That in order to obtain an influence, and a power by which it should be secured, he has disposed of parts of it, on very cheap terms, to men of high political standing, wherever he could find them. A valuable part of it, I am told, is now owned by members of Congress, and God knows to what point this interest and influence may at last extend; far enough, I presume, to secure the emanation of a patent. It is a subject worthy the inquiry of a committee of Congress.

These pre-emption laws have not only produced violence and bloodshed among those who strove as rivals for a choice spot; they have not only produced fraud, and perjury, and corruption, but they have taught your citizens to despise your laws, to resist by violence their due operation, and form great and extensive combinations to oppose them. It is well known by those who have attended the sales of public lands in the Northwest, that violence and intimidation are used at those sales, and in the presence of the officers of the United States, to put down competition. Men who are occupants, or pretend to be so, or who buy the privilege of coming in as an occupant, (and I am told that any one may buy that privilege of the association for five or ten dollars,) gather together in a group by the stand at the place of sale, and when a tract which they have selected is proclaimed, some one who has a good strong voice cries out, "pre-emption;" and then, wo to the man who ventures to bid for it. It is, as a matter of course, struck off at $1 25 per acre. Associations are now forming over the whole Northwestern country, the object of which appears to be, either to bind the law to the purpose of the combination, or to put down law by numbers and organization, if not by force. I hold in my hand the constitution and by-laws of one of these societies, which was forwarded me by a prominent member, accompanied by a letter, in which he seems to claim my approbation of its object. I hope it may be read.

[The Secretary here read the paper alluded to, of which the following are two of the principal articles:

"ART. 11th. Resolved, That before the land is offered for sale, each district shall select a bidder to stand and bid off all claims in the claimant's name, and that, if necessary, each settler will constantly attend the sale, prepared to aid each other to the full extent of our ability in obtaining every claimant's land at Government price."

"ART. 13th. Resolved, That we will each use our endeavors to advance the rapid settlement of the country, by inviting our friends and acquaintances to join us, under the full assurance that we shall obtain our rights, and that it is now perfectly as safe to go on improving the public lands as though we already had our titles from Government."]

This requires no comment; it is a Government established in a Government—imperium in imperio. It does not profess to be subordinate to the laws of the Union, but in opposition to them, and its object is to embarrass their operations and destroy their force.

I had hoped, at the last session, that we had got clear of this pre-emption system, with all its mischiefs, and all its demoralization; but a desperate effort is now made to revive it, and, if once more revived, it is fastened upon us, and forever.

When Mr. EWING had taken his seat,

Mr. TIPTON said that, as the subject of the gradation of the public land had been frequently discussed, he should not trouble the Senate with any remarks in support of the amendment, but would content himself by requesting that the vote be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays having been ordered, and the question being about to be taken,

Mr. CLAY said he should be glad to hear some reason advanced in behalf of a proposition which went to reduce the price of all the public lands, after having been in the market at the low price of $1 25, down to $1, and then to 75 cents. What was the complaint which had been so strenuously urged in behalf of the present bill? It was, that the public domain was selling too fast, and at prices so low that persons who did not want the land to settle upon were buying it up, in vast quantities, for purposes of speculation. What would present itself as the natural remedy for such a state of things? Surely it would be either to take the land out of the market, or to increase its price; for the Senate were told, by the advocates of the bill, that the land thus bought up was worth, at once, from $5 to $50 an acre. In the name of Heaven, then, why reduce the price? Had any reason been given for it? Were our new States settling too slowly? On that question, he would call the attention of the Senate to a table he had had occasion to compile some years ago, exhibiting the ratio of settlement in the different States. The table was based on authentic returns, and it showed that, at that time, the lands in the State of Illinois were settling at the rate of 18½ per cent. per annum; so that her population, proceeding at that rate, would double itself in a little more than five years. At the same time, the State of Delaware was increasing its population at the rate of one half of one per cent.; having the cheering prospect of doubling her population in a period of two hundred years. Illinois was populating more rapidly, at that time, than others of the new States; yet the table would show that the others approached to nearly the same ratio; and he thought it would be safe to say that Missouri, Arkansas, and Michigan, were settling at a rate quite equal to it. What earthly motive, then, could there be to reduce the price of the lands? Was it to bring in more settlers? No; for these States were settling too fast already. There was great truth in what had been said on that subject by his friend from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] who had remarked that, when vast numbers of people were suddenly collected from different quarters, and thrown into close neighborhood, having no previous connexion with each other, no common sympathies, no similarity of education, nothing homogeneous, to form a natural bond of union, the natural and necessary result must be struggles in legislation, and a loose, unsettled state of society, for a long period. It must surely be admitted by every reflecting man, that the public lands were selling quite fast enough. Yet, here was a proposition made, and from that side of the House which complained that the public domain was selling too fast, and who wanted this bill to pass in order to check the sales of it, whose effect would be to accelerate those sales at a rate that none could estimate; for, even at the present rate of $1 25, twenty-five millions of acres had been sold within the last year; and now, should the price be reduced still lower, what must the effect be, but still further to enhance the temptation to monopoly?

SENATE.]

Public Lands.

Mr. C. said that he had not risen to speak to the general merits of the bill, but merely to inquire on what reasons the amendment was founded.

Mr. DANA said: Mr. President, I do not arise to attack or defend the speculators on the public domain, whether they be private individuals or belong to some of the Departments. I leave the gladiatorial part of this warfare to those who have weapons for it, and have inclination and skill to use them; nor do I intend to go at length into the merits of this bill, but only express my views on the objects of it, and on some of its provisions. Its objects are threefold: first, to check the inordinate thirst of speculation, which has so generally prevailed through the country, and which first arose from the extravagant issues of the United States Bank, (furnishing ready means,) and afterwards practised in preying upon the public domain. The second object of the bill is to preserve the public lands; and the third, to reduce the revenue to the legitimate wants of the Government. By the provisions of this bill, its first and second objects will be accomplished, and the revenue will be greatly diminished. But, sir, the sales of the public lands of late have been very great, and the revenue arising from them equally so; and to stop them all at once would be neither judicious nor just. Many of the new States have vast tracts of uncultivated lands, with a sparse population. They, doubtless, are anxious to see their territory settled and cultivated. The support of their Governments, as well as their strength and defence, depend upon it. We cannot, therefore, expect that they will be willing to put a sudden and total check to the settlement of their country; nor ought we to wish it. They are willing to stop all speculations upon the public domain, and to reduce the revenue, but require that small tracts of land may still be granted to actual settlers on easy terms. Then, sir, the new States will continue to settle gradually, and with a good population, from their own increase, or from the surplus population of the older States. I know, sir, that many are averse to having their sons and daughters go into the new world. They seem to think them lost to society and to their friends; but nothing is further from the truth. They may be as useful and happy in the new as in the old States. Population is rapidly marching from the East to the West, and power is following in its train; these are facts which cannot be disguised or prevented. The great valley has heretofore, undoubtedly, been the seat of empire, and is destined to become so again. The Atlantic States will constitute but a small part of this Union; and New England will be but a speck upon our nation's map. What, then, shall be done? Shall we war against nature? Or pursue a wiser course—grant our lands, on reasonable terms, to actual settlers, who will enter upon and cultivate them, and not debar the surplus population of the old States from crossing the Alleghany, and seeking in the vast regions of the West a more fertile soil and a warmer sun? They will carry with them the enterprise, the activity, and perseverance, as well as the intelligence, the patriotism, and sound morality, of their fathers. And what have the East to fear from such a result? And better, far better, would it be for the West to have such a population, than to have their country flooded with the scum of the European population. Yes, sir, let the surplus population of the East flow to the West, and the sons of the Puritans and of Penn settle and inhabit that goodly land, and rear up a virtuous, enterprising, and intelligent race, to whom our liberties and the destiny of our republic may safely be committed. In this way, sir, the objects of this bill will be accomplished, wild speculation checked, the public domain secured, the revenue reduced, and the actual settlers and cultivators of the soil, the nerve and sinew of the country, its support in peace and its defence in war, be accommodated with settling lands only, and upon reasonable terms. But suppose, sir, after this reduction of the revenue, there should still be a surplus in the Treasury, what further is to be done? My answer is ready. Modify the tariff; reduce the duties. But, sir, we are told of the compromise. Dare you touch the compromise? I have nothing to do with the compromise. I have no faith in it. It is not an article in my creed. I do not subscribe to the doctrine, that one Legislature can, by their acts, bind subsequent Legislatures. If so, the one of 1834 could not only bind its successors for five or ten years, but for all time; and if they could bind them in regard to the tariff, they might upon every other subject—a doctrine too absurd to be spoken of. But, sir, if the modification of the tariff in 1834 was a judicious one for that time, and so continues to this, I would make but few alterations in it, unless it should become necessary, in order to reduce the revenue to the wants of the Government; because sudden and extreme legislation is always injurious, and often dangerous. In the consideration of this subject, I would pay no regard to the motives or intentions which induced the compromise; whether they were for good or for evil; whether the object then was to save the nation from ruin, or individuals from a dilemma into which their rash and headlong course had plunged them; but take up the subject, as we now find it, and reduce the duties on such and so many articles as we shall think best, in order to bring down the revenue to our wants. Prudence would seem to dictate that we should always be able to meet unexpected and unavoidable occurrences, like the Indian war which has drawn millions from our Treasury. These and similar wants we shall always be subject to. And here, Mr. President, I would remind this honorable body, that while we are legislating upon this strange, this unique subject, viz: the disposition of a surplus revenue, a subject which before never occupied the attention of any other Legislature, from the days of Adam to the present, we should not forget that the Northeastern boundary line of this nation has not been settled. While, sir, our Treasury is overflowing, without a national debt, at peace with the whole world, and our foreign relations established on the most firm and favorable basis, our territory has been invaded, our citizens despoiled of their rights, dragged from their homes, immured in foreign jails. Nor is this all: a large part of the territory of one of the States of this Union has been severed from the rest, and that constitutional protection which she has asked has been withheld. A foreign Power has not only taken possession of it, but is making a thoroughfare from one of her provinces to another. Provincial charters for a railroad have been granted, and these have been confirmed by their King—and no doubt, sir, before one year passes, (unless force is interposed,) we shall see it made; and thus a permanent possession will be had by that Power of an extensive and valuable portion of Maine, covered with forests of pines towering, as it were, to heaven, and not equalled by any in the Union; millions of which are annually swept off by the subjects of his Britannic Majesty. Thus, sir, we see our Union dismembered—one of her States stripped of its sovereignty, despoiled of its possessions and wealth, and the dearest rights and privileges of its citizens trampled under foot. Is not this aggression, insult, cause of war? Shall it be tamely submitted to? Shall Maine, sir, be tauntingly reminded of her wrongs by those who were the cause of them, and whose duty it was long since to have redressed them? Sir, the Governor of that State has, in his annual message, called the attention of the Legislature to that subject, in a tone and with a spirit which cannot be mistaken, and soon there will be a legislative response; and then, sir, you may hear again from that border State, whose dearest interests have been too long neglected by this Government. This subject is directly connected with the revenue; and reference should be had to it in regulating the same; and all our surplus may yet be required to preserve the integrity of the Union. The time has been when millions were ready for defence and protection; and I trust that it has not passed, but that these wrongs will soon be redressed.

Mr. TIPTON said that it had not been his purpose to trouble the Senate with a single word on the subject of the amendment he had offered, nor should he now have done so but for the call which had been made upon him by the Senator from Kentucky to state the reasons on which the amendment was grounded.

He should present these reasons as briefly as he was able, and, having done so, should trouble the Senate no further. No man (said Mr. T.) knows better than the Senator from Kentucky that, when the population first began to cross over the Ohio from his own State into what was then the Northwestern Territory, they had to encounter privations and difficulties in every form. They entered into a wilderness which had neither roads nor paths, but lay entirely in a state of nature. For this land they had to pay two dollars an acre. Those who settled the country had to construct roads and bridges and other improvements, which greatly increased the value of the land, and which they accomplished by their own labor, unaided by the General Government, except so far as the two per cent. fund might go toward the construction of highways, and also with the exception of certain sections of land given to the new States for the promotion of education. The first settlers in what is now the State of Ohio purchased all the land in that State which was worth two dollars, and that which was of poorer quality remained, much of it, unsold. The amendment which is now offered does not propose to reduce the price of all the public lands, but it provides that such as has remained in market for ten years without a purchaser shall be subject to entry at one dollar the acre, and such as has remained unsold for fifteen years at seventy-five cents. Should this amendment prevail, it will enable the old settlers of the country to add to their farms tracts of inferior land for purposes of timber or stone, which will not sell at the present price of one dollar and twenty-five cents. The people of the West have frequently urged the justice and expediency of a law of this kind; and so manifestly proper has it been admitted on all hands to be, that a bill for the purpose has once or twice passed the Senate, but has been lost in the other House for want of time. I now again introduce the principle, and ask its adoption, as a measure both of justice and of sound policy. Frequent complaints have been urged respecting trespassers on the public lands, who plunder them of timber and stone. If the lands could be obtained at a reduced price, the temptation to such trespasses would be diminished. We do not ask, I certainly do not, that the fresh lands should be reduced in price; nor have I heard such an idea so much as once advanced by any body within the last two years. The amendment refers only to that which has been in market for a course of years, and will not sell.

The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] in speaking of the purchasers of the public land, defended them against what he considered unmerited and slanderous imputations. His remarks on that subject, however just, do not affect me. I neither am myself a speculator, nor do I denounce those who are. I consider the public land as fair an object of purchase and sale as any thing else. I consider it perfectly fair and honorable for any man who has capital to purchase those lands at Government price, and to sell them out for as much as he can get. But the Senator, while defending this class of persons, bore very hardly on those who make an improvement on the land with a view to pre-emptive rights, and, in his statements on that subject, he certainly went far beyond any thing that I have ever known in the Western country. I have myself lived in the midst of the public lands for thirty years, and I am persuaded the Senator has been misinformed. I accuse him of no intention to do injustice, for he did not pretend to speak from his own knowledge. He made a strong argument, as he always does, but it was based upon supposed facts, which do not actually exist. While I was for a short time absent from the Senate chamber, he introduced, as I have since been informed, certain articles of mutual compact among the settlers on the public lands, which it seems he received from a citizen of Indiana. Now, if, as I hope, he intends to publish those articles as an appendix to his speech, it is all I desire on that point. Let those articles be read by any unprejudiced persons, and they will be able to judge for themselves whether persons bidding against the members of this association at the public land sales are, as he represented, to be knocked down or shot down. There is nothing like it in the agreement, nor in fact. I have myself a personal acquaintance with Solon Robinson, the individual whose name is signed to a circular read by the Senator, and who is also the secretary of the association referred to, and I believe him to be an upright, honest, and honorable man. I also know many of the settlers in Lake county, and I know them to be an orderly, peaceable, and respectable body of men. They have gone into that country with a view to better their condition; and who will blame them for it? They engage to employ at the public sales all the means in their power to obtain their rights, by which I understand them of course to mean all lawful means. By your law of 1830 you gave, on certain conditions, to every settler a pre-emption right to a quarter section of land; and you thus held out an inducement to individuals to enter on your domain, with a prospect of getting a permanent home. They went there, believing that the same opportunity would be extended to them. They are in possession of the land. They have by their labor enhanced its value, and they are ready to pay for it the price you ask. Can you expect that these people shall stand still, and let speculators come and turn their wives and children out of doors? It is most unreasonable; but as to the guns and dirks that the gentleman apprehends so much, they never have been used, nor will they be. Congress has nothing to fear on that score. They ask that you shall allow them a pre-emptive right, and thus do no more than what is just. The land, it is true, is settling fast; and why should it not? And why should not the United States Treasury get the money for it, and then distribute that money among the States? I see in this no such great evil; but, on the other hand, it will be a great public evil to check the sales of the public lands.

The Senator from Ohio laments that, in some of the older States of the Union, especially in some parts of Virginia, the population is actually decreasing. The fact is new to me. I certainly never heard such a complaint before. But if it is the interest of the young people of Virginia to go out into the vast West, and there to seek for fortune and for fame, why should you try to prevent them from doing that very thing which you yourselves have done? Many of the Senators whom I see around me are those who, in their youth, left the older States, and went out to seek their fortunes in the new; and shall these gentlemen seek to cut off others from the same advantages? Surely not. Their constituents, I am persuaded, do not require such a thing at their hands. It would, indeed, be a strange phenomenon in political economy, that, when the country has become rich and strong by this very process, her statesmen should turn round and say, we have too much public land in market; we must take measures to stop the sale of it. I am willing to modify the tariff in such a manner as to reduce, in some degree, the amount of revenue from that source, but I am not willing to cripple the sales of lands in the West, or to take them out of market.

Having thus briefly given the reasons in behalf of the amendment I have offered, I will conclude by expressing my hope that Senators will do what I conceive to be their duty in the case.

Mr. CLAY would add one or two words on this amendment. The proposition is to reduce the price of land which has remained for ten and fifteen years unsold to $1 and to 75 cents. Now, we hold the public lands as trustees for the entire people of the United States; we are bound, therefore, to administer the trust for the benefit of the whole people, and not for a part only. Has the gentleman shown that the price of these lands is now too high? Is it pretended by any body? Does any one doubt that the Government will get the price now asked at some day? What is the progress of things which brings these lands into market? The Indian title to a certain tract of country is extinguished by treaty; immediately, the people in the vicinity are urgent with Congress to have the lands immediately surveyed. Well, the lands are surveyed; forthwith they besiege the President to issue his proclamation, and set them up for sale; the President complies, and a fresh body of land is thus added to the stock already in market. And what has been the result of this eternal pressure on the Government for more land? Why, that we have now one hundred and twenty millions of acres at present in the market unsold? The inference of the honorable Senator, that because land has remained ten years in market unsold it is therefore not worth the price asked by Government, is most unfair. The true reason why any remains unsold is, that the supply is so immensely beyond the demand. The demand may average from eight to ten millions of acres; and you have one hundred and sixty millions in the market, and still have one hundred and twenty millions left on hand. Wait, then; there is no such urgent haste; wait a little, but do not adopt so wild a plan as to reduce your price in order to force a sale. Take the experience of Ohio as an example; her total amount of public land is reduced to about two millions and a half of acres, and the whole has been disposed of at the Government price. And so, as population goes on increasing, will it be in other States. There is no urgency in the execution of our trust; the whole may not be sold during this generation, and perhaps the next; and what then? If, in the faithful administration of our trust, it should be ages and ages before the whole is sold, is that a reason for reducing the price? Some years ago, indeed, when our sales were two or three millions of acres in a year, there might have been more force in the argument for a reduction; but when the sales have risen from five to twenty-five millions in a year, will you reduce your price that you may still further augment the sales, and tempt speculation more and more? It seems to me that in such a plan there is neither wisdom nor foresight.

On the general subject of the bill I hope to be heard, but now I limit what I have to say to the amendment before the Senate. As to the hardships of those who crossed the Ohio, and went into the Northwest Territory, does the Senator forget all the favors which have been conferred on that part of the country by Government? Has he forgotten the construction, at vast expense, of the most magnificent road in existence, now extending itself to the banks of the Mississippi, and beyond it? He talks of the exemption from taxation: why, does he not know that almost every part of that system has been, piece by piece, undermined, till there is almost nothing of it left? What has been done with the section granted in each township for the use of public schools? It is but the other day that we allowed a township, to exchange it for good land wherever they could find any. What was done at the last session? Did we not pass a bill giving them an exemption for five years? The whole system is almost utterly destroyed. And when the Senator speaks of the hardships endured by the first settlers north of the Ohio, he forgets to compare their condition with those on the south of it. Was it not they who conquered Ohio by their valor and their blood, rescuing it out of the hands of a savage foe? And what have we in Kentucky got from the General Government? No magnificent roads made through our territory at the public expense; no reservations for the education of our poor; no princely donations of land and money for the construction of our canals; no, sir, nothing of the kind. Does the gentleman suppose we are incapable of feeling and of comparing? Yet what do we hear but one eternal demand for more! more! at the sacrifice of a compact made for the general benefit of the whole confederacy? I hope this amendment will not prevail. I hope that while our lands are already sold at a price the gentlemen themselves say is too low, we shall not, at their request, reduce the price still lower.

The yeas and nays were then taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. TITTON, when it was rejected by the following vote:

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hubbard, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Niles, Page, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Swift, Tallmadge—19.

Mr. BENTON then offered the following amendment:

That it shall and may be lawful for any head of a family, young man over the age of eighteen years, or widow, not having received a donation of land from the United States, and being or wishing to become an actual settler on any parcel of public land which shall have remained five years unsold after having been offered at private sale at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and not exceeding in quantity the amount of one quarter section, to demand and receive, from the proper register and receiver, a written permission to settle on the same, upon payment, to be made to the proper receiver, of the sum of seventy-five cents per acre; and if such person, so applying for and receiving such permission, shall forthwith settle on the said land, and he or she, or his or her heirs or legal representatives, shall cultivate the same for five successive years, and shall be a citizen or citizens of the United States at the end of that time, then, on proper proof being made, before the register and receiver, of such settlement, cultivation, and citizenship, a patent shall issue for the said land to the person who received such permission, or his or her heirs or legal representatives. And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged to all persons who may settle on the public lands, according to the provisions of this section, that no dispensation shall, at any time, be granted to any individual from complying with the substantial conditions herein prescribed. And if due proof of settlement, cultivation, and citizenship, as herein required, be not made within one year next after the expiration of said five years, the said land shall again be subject to entry at private sale, as land belonging to the United States. And if two or more persons, entitled under this act to the privileges of actual settlers, shall apply for the same parcel of land, then the register and receiver shall immediately decide the right of preference between them, according to priority of settlement and other equitable circumstances; and where these are equal the decision shall be made by lot.

Richard W. Meade--Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

The question was taken on its adoption by yeas and nays, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hubbard, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Niles, Page, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Swift, Tallmadge, Wright—20.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. SEVIER offered an amendment, which granted the actual settler a pre-emption right, on his showing that he had occupied a quarter section six months immediately previous to a land sale. This was agreed to.

Mr. MORRIS now observed that the bill, since its first being reported by the committee, had undergone so many modifications, and the pre-emptive feature in it had been so much changed for the worse, that, by way of testing the opinion of the Senate whether that principle should be retained, he would move to strike out the entire section (the 4th) on that subject.

The motion was supported by Mr. CLAY, and opposed by Messrs. LINN, SEVIER, and BENTON, and with great vehemence by Mr. WALKER, who observed that if the two features of graduation and pre-emption were stricken out of the bill, he should abandon it at once; when

Mr. MORRIS expressed a wish to address the Senate in behalf of his motion, and moved, thereupon, an adjournment; which prevailed,

And the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 25.

RICHARD W. MEADE.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the relief of the executrix of Richard W. Meade.

The subject of the bill having been debated at great length by Messrs. CLAY, HUBBARD, WALKER, CALHOUN, WRIGHT, and BUCHANAN,

Mr. CALHOUN moved to lay the bill on the table, for further examination. Negatived: Yeas 19, nays 22.

After further debate, on motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the bill was amended so as to limit the amount to be allowed by the commissioners named by the bill to the proportion allowed to other claimants, from the $5,000,000, under the treaty with Spain.

Also, the Secretary of the Treasury was substituted on the commission for the Secretary of State, who, Mr. H. stated, had already given a favorable judgment on the claim: Yeas 25.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the special order, which was the bill to restrict the sale of the public lands to actual settlers.

The question being on the motion of Mr. MORRIS to strike from the bill the 4th section, which refers to the subject of pre-emption rights to be conferred on the settlers who shall fulfil certain conditions—

Mr. MORRIS declined making, at this time, his speech in support of the motion, and suggested to Mr. WALKER the expediency of postponing the further consideration of the bill to to-morrow.

Mr. WALKER wished, first, to offer an amendment, which had been agreed on in the Land Committee, with a view to exclude all lots or tracts of land reserved by order of the United States Government for town lots or other purposes.

Mr. EWING suggested that such an amendment would not cover the case of the fort at Chicago, to which he had referred in his general speech on the bill, because that lot had not been reserved by any law, but, as he understood, had been erected on a certain site by direction of the Executive. The amendment, to effect that object, ought to except from pre-emption all lands in the occupation of the United States Government for public purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON proposed that the amendment should exclude all lands "inhibited from sale by an order made pursuant to law." He then adverted to the Chicago case, and, while expressing his disapprobation of the claim there urged for a pre-emption right, reminded the Senate that a court of his own State had decided in favor of the claim. He then repelled, with much warmth, the charge thrown out by Mr. EWING, that officers high in the Government, and members of Congress, were reported to be interested in that claim. He was, himself, wholly free from all connexion whatever with that affair. He had particularly inquired, and he knew of no officers of his own State, or members of Congress, who were concerned in it. He demanded that the charge should be made more definite, called strenuously for the names of individuals charged, and pledged himself to visit them, if proved guilty of improper conduct, with the heaviest punishment the law could inflict. He passed very high encomiums on the character of Mr. Whitlock, of whom he said that "the Almighty had never made an honest man, nor could he, should he try it over again."

Mr. EWING explained, disclaiming the most distant suspicion of the Senator himself, and declaring that he had not charged, nor did he now charge, any individual whatever, but had spoken of what was public rumor on the spot; and declared it as his opinion that the subject was of sufficient importance to deserve the institution of a formal inquiry. No name had been mentioned to him but that of Baubien, the original claimant; nor would he have willingly received the names of individuals, had they been offered to be communicated. He spoke in general terms alone.

Mr. ROBINSON rejoined, and reiterated with increased warmth his call for a more specific charge. He then proceeded to reply to the reflections which had been cast during the debate of yesterday on the character of those who went upon the public lands and improved them, and then demanded pre-emption rights. What were they? Thieves? Pirates? Robbers? Where did they come from? From the States where the public lands lay? No; but from all parts of the Union. He should be proud, could he compare characters with many of the settlers thus denounced. He eulogized their patriotism, bravery, and integrity, and complained of the reiteration of the terms "trespassers" and "squatters," which had been repeatedly applied to them. He hoped the Government would entertain and act on better views; but (added Mr. R.) if you do not, we will learn you—yes, we will learn you a lesson—that the free people of these United States are not going to be deprived of their rights. He then upbraided the Government with a mercenary spirit in its conduct toward these hardy and industrious men, very inconsistent with its high claim of being the only free Government on earth, the refuge of the oppressed, &c., and cried, shame, shame upon it.

Mr. TIPTON moved an adjournment, but waived the motion at the request of Mr. BENTON; when the Senate went into Executive business.

After which, and some explanatory remarks having been made on the land question by Mr. WALKER—

cept to actual settlers, and in limited quantities, was taken up as the special order of the day.

Mr. WALKER moved an amendment, to except from the operations of the bill, and from pre-emptions, all lands occupied under the authority of the United States, and that have been or may be reserved by law for any special purpose, or for town lots; which amendment was agreed to.

After some remarks from Mr. RUGGLES,

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the amendment was further amended, by inserting a proviso that no written or verbal contract, mortgage, or other encumbrance, made with a view to evade the provisions of this act, shall be binding.

Mr. WHITE moved an amendment, striking out the provision permitting a purchaser of the public lands at any time within five years to relinquish the land purchased and receive back the purchase money.

After some remarks in support of this amendment, by Messrs. WHITE, LINN, GRUNDY, and CLAY, it was adopted.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the bill was here laid on the table, to allow him to make a motion with regard to the qualification of the

MICHIGAN SENATORS.

A message was then received from the President of the United States, by Mr. ANDREW JACKSON, jr., his secretary, stating that the President had signed the bill for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

The credentials of the Hon. JOHN NORVELL and the Hon. LUCIUS LYON, elected by the Legislature of the State of Michigan, on the 10th November, 1835, to represent that State in the Senate of the United States, were read by the Secretary; and,

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the usual oath to support the constitution of the United States was administered to Messrs. NORVELL and LYON by the Vice President, and they took their seats in the Senate.

PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the land bill was again taken up; when

Mr. BUCHANAN submitted an amendment, to allow to fathers, in each of the States, having children between the ages of twelve and twenty-one years, or to mothers of such children, whose fathers are dead, to enter a section of land in the name of each child, the patent not to issue until the child, in whose name the entry is made, becomes of age.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that he had expected that the Committee on Public Lands would have submitted an amendment of the character of the one he had just offered; but inasmuch as they had not done so, he felt it his duty to offer it, and to state concisely the reason why, in his opinion, it should be adopted. In the old States of this Union it was well known that, when a father of a family gets a little forward in the world, there was nothing more common than for him to go into the new States for the purpose of purchasing land, as a provision for his children when they became of age. These people (Mr. B. said) seldom purchased more than a half section of land; and if gentlemen wished to restrict the operation of his amendment to this quantity, he should have no great objection to it. The land is thus purchased, (continued Mr. B.,) and as sure as the child for whom it is intended becomes twenty-one years of age, he goes out to the West with his wagon and horses, and farming implements, and becomes the very best settler that the new States can have. No speculation was intended by this mode of purchase, and none could possibly take place under it. It would be a great advantage to the citizens of the old States to permit them in this way to provide for their children, and he apprehended that the new States would be equally benefited by being thus provided with such a meritorious class of settlers as the sons of the industrious and respectable farmers of the old States. Mr. B. said he had hoped that the Committee on Public Lands would have offered this amendment; but, as they had not done so, he had felt it his duty to submit it to the consideration of the Senate, trusting that no objection would be made to it.

Mr. CLAY said he was very glad the gentleman from Pennsylvania had offered the amendment, for it could not have come from a more appropriate quarter. But he would ask why there was to be any greater privilege in the case of a child of a provident and attentive father, than in that of a son or daughter who might be left orphans? Did not every consideration of humanity carry out the principle to the grandchild as well as to the child? He would suggest, then, to the Senator from Pennsylvania so to modify his amendment as to embrace that relation as well as the others.

Mr. WALKER said that it would be recollected by the Senate, that among the greatest objections to the bill was that raised by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] that it would increase instead of diminishing the land sales, by facilitating the entry of land; that individuals would not only enter lands in their own names, but in the names of all their children. Now, if these objections of the Senator from Ohio would apply to the bill itself, they would undoubtedly apply with still greater force to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania. He did not himself, however, agree with the Senator from Ohio, and would have no objection to the amendment of his friend from Pennsylvania, with a slight modification. The bill itself (Mr. W. said) provided for the entry of lands by minors, after arriving at the age of eighteen years. Therefore, if the gentleman would confine his amendment to minors between the ages of twelve and eighteen years, he would agree to it.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, said his objection to the bill of the Senator from Mississippi was not to any of the particulars to which the gentleman had just referred, but it was that a father could enter in the name of his wife or child a tract of land, provided he lived near it, but that fathers living in the old States had not that privilege. Now, he (Mr. E.) conceived this to be a great objection to the bill, for it was giving a great preference in favor of actual settlers, over those living at a distance; it was, in fact, placing it in the power of those resident on the spot to monopolize to the amount of threefold or fivefold more of the public lands than those living at a remote distance from them. He thought, then, that the bill should be modified, rather than the amendment, and so as to confine the entry of lands to parents in behalf of their children who may be between the age of twelve and twenty-one years.

Mr. BUCHANAN remarked that he did not wish to embarrass the bill by offering any provision to it which he did not deem absolutely necessary, in order to prevent a public good from being converted into a public evil; but he could not, representing as he did an agricultural community, (many members of which were frequently going West with their children, whose welfare was of some importance,) forego this opportunity of proposing this amendment. He should like to know what course to pursue which would render his amendment successful. If so, he would move to amend the bill as reported by the committee, by saying that the individual should enter at the age of twenty-one, instead of eighteen. He thought it was but proper that a youth, before arriving at the age of twenty-one, ought not to have any inducement offered him to quit the paternal roof. He entertained the opinion that policy and prudence required this course; and if he did not think that there was some danger to be apprehended in regard to the loss of the amendment, he should certainly make the modification which had been suggested to him; and if any gentleman would move to strike out "eighteen," and insert "twenty-one," he (Mr. B.) would then vote to carry his proposition into execution.

Mr. LINN suggested to the Senator from Pennsylvania that his amendment, as it stood now, would be more likely to receive the vote of the majority than if modified. Mr. L. said that if the amendment should prevail, it would be at variance with the whole object of the bill.

Mr. MORRIS contended, that if the amendment should prevail, the title of the bill should be changed. It ought to be entitled "A bill to encourage the settlement of the public lands by law." He repeated that if the amendment should be adopted, it would entirely destroy the great object intended to be accomplished by the bill, and open wide the flood-gates of speculation.

Mr. BAYARD remarked that the effect of the bill, as it at present stood, was to confine its benefits entirely to the inhabitants of the neighborhood, to the exclusion, in fact, of those living at a distance. He maintained that the right of entering lands should be given to the uncles of children, and also to guardians, as well as fathers and grandfathers, in behalf of the child or children whose parent may be dead.

Mr. MORRIS hoped the amendment, or substitute, for the original bill, as reported by the Committee on Public Lands, and amended, together with the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, might be printed, and the further consideration of the subject postponed till to-morrow.

Mr. WALKER hoped not. If the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania prevailed, he would have no objection to postpone the further consideration of the bill till to-morrow.

Mr. LINN wanted the bill to be what it purported, to confine the sales of the public lands to actual settlers. That was all he desired.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed, that with all the favorable feelings he had for the interests of the West, he did not know that he could vote for this bill, unless it contained some such provision as the one he had submitted. Was this amendment to open wide the flood-gates of speculation? What was there in it to authorize such a prediction? How could speculation possibly be practised under it? If gentlemen thought the quantity of land too great, he cared not if they reduced it below a section; for so far as his constituents were concerned, he did not believe that one in a hundred of them ever purchased more than a quarter of a section.

How (Mr. B. asked) could speculation ever be attempted under this provision? No patent was to issue until the child for whom the land was purchased arrived at the age of twenty-one years; and was it likely that any father would travel from the Atlantic to the extreme West to buy land for his child, for which he is to receive no patent for eight or ten years, encountering all the trouble and expense of the journey with a view of making a speculation? The very circumstance that no patent is to issue until the child becomes twenty-one years of age would of itself prevent the possibility of a speculation. It was asking a little too much, said Mr. B., to expect us of the old States to vote for a bill of this kind, without some such provision. He did not say that he would not vote for the bill without the adoption of the principle he contended for, but he did say that after the bill was sufficiently matured, and was out of committee, he would weigh well all its advantages and disadvantages, and that the absence of this provision might turn the scale against it. Mr. B. suggested that it would be better to postpone the bill for the present, until all the amendments were printed. He did not know at present whether he would or would not make a modification of his amendment, but he certainly would contend for the principle it contained with all the ability he possessed.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, made some observations in favor of the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MORRIS.] He wished to see the bill in print in the shape in which it now stood, in order to thoroughly understand it before voting, or agreeing to it as amended in committee. It was not now the bill it was as it came from the Committee on Public Lands, for it had undergone many amendments; and though a number of them were said to be verbal, yet he apprehended that they had materially changed the character of the original bill. The gentleman from Ohio said the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] would change the whole character of the bill; and if so, he could not vote for it; for the principal object they all had in view was to check speculation, lessen the great amount of the land sales, and thus diminish a too redundant revenue. These were the objects for which the bill was introduced, and he wished, by having the bill printed as it then stood, to see how far it retained its original character. He was not disposed to enter into an examination of all the provisions of the bill now. He was not prepared to do so, in consequence of the changes that had been made in it by the many amendments which were called verbal, and which no Senator had been able to keep an exact account of. It was, therefore, necessary that the whole subject should be distinctly presented to the Senate before taking any further question on it, as nothing could be gained by hurrying the question before the details were arranged. He wished, further, to see what modification the Senator from Pennsylvania would give to his amendment.

After some remarks from Mr. WALKER in opposition to the postponement,

The question was taken on Mr. MORRIS's motion, and the bill was postponed till to-morrow, and the amendments of the committee, with the amendment proposed by Mr. BUCHANAN, were ordered to be printed.

TREASURY CIRCULAR.

Mr. WALKER moved to postpone the previous orders, and take up the bill designating and limiting the funds receivable for dues by the United States.

Mr. EWING expressed an opinion in favor of the motion, and

Mr. RUGGLES against it, inasmuch as it was intimately connected with the land bill, whose fate ought first to be ascertained.

Mr. CLAY said he thought gentlemen did not duly sympathize with those who were suffering embarrassment under the operation of the Treasury order. Every hour that order continued, it inflicted injury and degradation on the West. He hoped the bill would be taken up, and called for the yeas and nays on the motion; which were ordered.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, said he should vote for taking up the bill, because he believed it right and proper to legislate on the subject, and not because he considered the continuance of the Treasury order as in any way degrading. He could see no special connexion between this measure and the land bill, to require a delay of this bill. The action on the land bill should terminate. This measure should be carried independently of that.

Mr. MORRIS said, if the object was to take an immediate vote on the bill, he was opposed to taking it up. He was not now disposed to vote either for this bill or the amendment. He was opposed to the Government's interfering in any way with the State institutions, either directly or indirectly, and banks were State institutions.

The question being then put, on taking up the bill, was decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cutlbert, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Moore, Nicholas, Norvell, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Walker, White—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Dana, Fulton, Grundy, Linn, Morris, Niles, Page, Ruggles, Strange, Wright—12.

So the Senate decided that the bill should be taken up.

Mr. RIVES thereupon offered an amendment, to extend the prohibition respecting the notes of banks issuing notes of small denominations, so as to embrace, after the 30th of December, 1841, notes of $20. [The bill only extended to those of five and of ten dollars.]

He supported the amendment in a short speech, urging the moral effect of the measure, and its necessity, as the only means of effecting the enlargement of the specie basis of our circulation.

Mr. EWING referred to a provision in the bill which requires the deposite banks to receive and pass to the credit of Government all such bank notes as they receive in general deposite. This took away their power to oppress, and reconciled him to the bill, which should now have his vote. The effect of Mr. RIVES's amendment would be to confine the circulation of the large notes in the West to the banks in the immediate vicinity of the deposite banks, while all the small notes circulating there would be those of banks at a distance, to whom it was of less consequence that their notes should be received at the land offices than that their small notes should have a wide circulation.

After some remarks of Mr. NILES, and a brief speech from Mr. WALKER, the question on Mr. RIVES's amendment was decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cutlbert, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Niles, Norvell, Page, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, White, Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson—18.

The bill was ordered to its engrossment.

The Senate then adjourned.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 27.

MICHIGAN SENATORS.

Mr. GRUNDY observed that yesterday the Senators from the State of Michigan were admitted to their seats; and as the constitution required that they should be placed in their appropriate classes, he supposed that this had better be done at once. He would therefore submit a resolution, and ask for its immediate adoption. Mr. G. then submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Senate proceed to ascertain the classes in which the Senators from the State of Michigan shall be inserted, in conformity with the resolution of the 14th May, 1789.

Mr. GRUNDY observed, that before submitting the motion to carry the resolution into effect, a word of explanation would perhaps be necessary. There were, according to the constitution, three classes of Senators; and there was an equal number of each, until the coming in of the Senators from Arkansas; but one of them drawing number one, and the other number three, of course there were more of these numbers than of number two. This he had in view in drawing up the motion, and by providing that numbers two and three only shall be drawn, the inequality would be lessened.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, it was Ordered, That the Secretary put into the ballot box two papers of equal size, one of which shall be numbered two, and the other shall be a blank, and each Senator shall draw out one paper; that the Senator who shall draw the paper number two shall be inserted in the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire on the 3d day of March, 1839; that the Secretary then put into the ballot box two papers of equal size, one of which shall be numbered one, and the other shall be numbered three, and the other Senator shall draw out one paper; that if the paper drawn be number one, the Senator shall be inserted in the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire the 3d day of March, 1837; and if the paper drawn be number three, the Senator shall be inserted in the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire the 3d day of March, 1841.

In pursuance of the above order, Messrs. NORVELL and LYON proceeded to draw ballots for their respective classes; when Mr. LYON, drawing number two, was classed with the Senators whose terms of service expire on the 3d of March, 1839; and Mr. NORVELL, drawing number three, was classed with the Senators whose terms of service expire on the 3d of March, 1841.

AMERICAN COLONIZATION SOCIETY.

Mr. CLAY presented the memorial of a number of citizens of the District of Columbia, stating that they had, a number of years past, formed an association for colonizing free negroes, with their own consent, on the coast of Africa; that many donations had been made to them in money and in lands, which last species of property they could not render available, in consequence of their not having a charter, and praying for an act of incorporation to enable them to hold and convey real estate. Mr. C. moved to refer this memorial to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CALHOUN regretted that the Senator from Kentucky had thought fit to present this memorial, and deprecated any discussion or agitation of the subject, which he thought would rather tend to increase than to allay the excitement which had been produced by an injudicious interference with a question of much delicacy. He did not intend to oppose the reference of the memorial, but he indulged the hope that the committee would see the propriety of not acting on it during this session.

Mr. CLAY regretted extremely that there should have been any expression, even in a modified form, in opposition to the object which the memorialists desire to attain. The day would come, he would venture to predict, when the people living in all portions of this vast continent would become converts to the American colonization scheme, and become convinced of its utility, and the humane principles by which it is characterized in striving to ameliorate the present condition of the African race.

The object, then, of the memorialists, was to send free negroes, with their own voluntary consent, to Liberia. They do not desire to touch any interest nor any property—to affect no right of any citizen here, or in the States. The memorialists come here and tell the Senate that many donations have been made to them, from time to time, both in land and money, and it was of the highest importance that such an act as they applied for should be granted. He might remind the Senate of a donation that was given the Colonization Society by one of the best and greatest men this country had ever produced—he meant the late venerable ex-President Madison. He bequeathed the donation (on account of there not being in existence such an act as these memorialists pray for) to Mr. Gurley, for the benefit of the society. Although, in the present case, the trust was faithfully executed, in other cases it might not be; hence, therefore, the memorialists ask for an act of incorporation, in order that they can receive what may be given them. Now, the object was dear, was interesting, was just, was natural; and he could not but express his hope that an act of incorporation would be granted them.

Mr. CALHOUN, after some remarks in reply to Mr. CLAY, said that from the first to the last he had been under the impression that any interference with the objects of this society by the General Government would not only be unconstitutional, but would have the most mischievous effects. He would remind the Senator from Kentucky, who had mentioned the late Mr. Madison as one of the friends of the Colonization Society, that that great statesman was so strict in his notions as to the granting of charters by the General Government, that he had vetoed the act of Congress incorporating a church in Alexandria. The Senator from Kentucky must know that great diversity of opinion existed among the wisest and best men of the country as to the ultimate good to be effected by this society; and that the prevailing opinion of the great body of the people of the South was against it. Nine tenths of the Southern people at least, said Mr. C., were opposed to any interference with the objects of this society by the General Government.

Mr. WALKER did not intend to discuss or agitate the question at this time. He would only state that, among the unfortunate consequences which had been produced in Mississippi, owing to the movements of the abolitionists, was the unpopularity of the Colonization Society, which previously, on the contrary, had been extremely popular. There were many individuals in that State who had been very beneficent contributors to it, but who now were opposed to it. He thought, therefore, that the present was a most unfortunate period for the agitation of this question, not only as regarded the country, but for the ultimate success of the Colonization Society. He hoped the Senator from Kentucky would not, under these circumstances, press the subject for the consideration of Congress. At some more auspicious time, when the agitation of the abolitionists shall have subsided, and when, too, the country could look unbiased at the request of the memorialists, then would be the more appropriate period to urge the matter.

Mr. CLAY replied that he should be extremely happy if he could reconcile it to his sense of duty to conform to the wishes of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER;] but, after much reflection, he was satisfied that it was his duty to present the memorial, and to advocate the reference he had proposed. He agreed with the Senator in thinking, that whatever of unpopularity had been given to this Colonization Society resulted exclusively from the acts of the abolitionists; and he would take this occasion to say that, as far as he understood their objects, they were just as much opposed to the Colonization Society as to the slaveholders of the South, denouncing it and imputing motives to it which did not exist, and in fact assailing it in every possible form. With regard to the veto of Mr. Madison, alluded to by the Senator from South Carolina, it would be recollected that it was made on the grounds that the act was to incorporate a religious association, which Mr. Madison supposed would come in conflict with that provision of the constitution which declares that Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

Mr. C. doubted the accuracy of the opinions of the Senator from South Carolina, as to the opposition of the South to the Colonization Society. Of the slaveholding States, he was well assured that a majority of the people of Virginia, Maryland, Kentucky, and Tennessee, and North Carolina, were in favor of its objects. He did not know but that the people of South Carolina and Georgia were opposed to it, and he could not speak as to Alabama; but the Senator from Mississippi had just assured them that this society was highly popular in his State, until the excitement produced by the abolitionists had brought it into discredit.

Mr. BUCHANAN rose to make a suggestion to the Senator from Kentucky; and that was, that, if an act of incorporation be granted at all, it must not be confined in its operation to the District of Columbia; it must go to the extent of the whole Union. It appeared to him (Mr. B.) that this was not a proper subject to be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, which was a committee having a great deal of business to attend to, though not of a character of such general importance as was connected with this memorial. He should, therefore, think it would be better to have a special committee on this question. The gentleman from Kentucky understood the matter perfectly well, and should be placed at the head of it, and could bring forward such a proposition as would meet general approbation. He (Mr. B.) therefore moved that the memorial be referred to a select committee.

Mr. CLAY observed that he understood the subject, and had determined to make his proposition as free from objection as possible; and, therefore, he limited the powers of the act of incorporation to this District only. He was perfectly aware that in an attempt to give it a general character, so that the society might establish branches here and there, a constitutional question would arise. He hoped the Senator from Pennsylvania would withdraw his motion for a select committee. He (Mr. C.) did himself doubt whether Congress had the power to pass an act of incorporation which should have powers beyond the District of Columbia. But as to the memorial, he would say that, as it came from the District of Columbia, the proper reference was to the committee having charge of its affairs, to which it might be sent; and he hoped that it would report a bill as speedily as possible. He hoped gentlemen would not postpone the consideration of the subject.

Mr. CALHOUN conceived that the Senator from Pennsylvania had taken the proper view of this question. He thought, too, that it should be referred to a select committee. The Senator from Kentucky and himself view the subject in a very different point of view. A mysterious Providence had brought the black and the white people together from different parts of the globe, and no human power could now separate them. The whites are an European race, being masters; and the Africans are the inferior race, and slaves. He believed that they could exist among us peaceably enough, if undisturbed, for all time; and it was his opinion that the Colonization Society, and all the other schemes which had been gotten up through mistaken notions of philanthropy, in order to bring about an alteration in the condition of the African, had a wrong foundation, and were calculated to disturb the existing relations between the two races, and the relations between the North and the South. He knew the Senator from Kentucky viewed the subject in a very different light, for he had stated on many occasions the opinions he held. He (Mr. C.) believed that the very existence of the South depended upon the existing relations being kept up, and that every scheme which might be introduced, having for its object an alteration in the condition of the negro, was pregnant with danger and ruin. It was a benevolent object, and highly desirable that the blessings of civilzation and Christianity should be introduced into benighted Africa; but this was a Government of limited powers, and had no more to do with free negroes than with slaves; and if Africa was to be Christianized and civilized, he hoped it would not be done by this Government acting beyond its constitutional powers. It was a matter of little importance to him, whether the memorial should be referred to a select committee, or to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PRESTON expressed his hope that the memorial might be sent to the Committee on the District.

Mr. STRANGE said that he should be compelled to vote against the reference of the memorial to any committee whatsoever. He coincided in opinion with both the Senators from South Carolina, that, were an act of incorporation passed, its effects would be coextensive with the Union itself. And he should deprecate more the location of a society at this point than at any other, because of its commanding position, and on account of its indicating the right of Congress to interfere with so delicate and important a subject. It was impossible to be so obtuse as not to see that this society, with its Briareus arms, would exercise a great influence over the interests of the Southern country. What would be its effects, but to hold out to the slave population a desire to become free? He meant, according to the laws of the country in which they live. They did not generally desire freedom, in their degraded condition, and most of the slaves preferred living in that condition. But when an inducement was held out to them, it was done to make them discontented with the situation in which God had placed them. He had been opposed to the Bank of the United States, because he believed Congress had no power to grant a charter out of the District of Columbia; and for the same reason, nearly, he was now also opposed to granting an act of incorporation to the Colonization Society in this District, because, in its very nature, its operations could not be confined to it solely.

Mr. BUCHANAN, after a few remarks, said that no gentleman could look upon this question without perceiving that it involved one of the greatest constitutional questions that could possibly be raised. What was it? Simply to charter the Colonization Society of the District of Columbia? Why, said Mr. B., are not the members of this society scattered all over the Union, and is it not its object to establish an empire in Africa? Did not the gentleman from Kentucky say that, through its means, civilization and Christianity were to be extended over Africa? These were most benevolent and praiseworthy objects, Mr. B. said, and he hoped they might succeed; but he would ask, were these grand objects to be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, constituted, as it was, to take charge of the local interests of this ten miles square? He could not think that this was a proper question for the consideration of the District Committee; but it would be an appropriate subject of consideration for the Committee on the Judiciary, which was constituted to take cognizance of questions involving constitutional law. Desirous, however, to have as much light as possible on this subject, and knowing that the Senator from Kentucky was perfectly well acquainted with it, he would greatly prefer referring the memorial to a select committee, of which that gentleman should be the head, in order that the public might be enlightened by the able report that he would make; but if this could not be done, he thought it ought to be sent to the standing committee which had a peculiar charge over constitutional questions.

Mr. CLAY said the argument of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania was founded upon the hypothesis that the operations of this society were not to be confined to the District of Columbia, but were to be coextensive with the Union. It should be recollected, however, that the memorialists did not come here to ask for any legalization of their operations, for they could go on, as they had already gone on for twenty years past. They could fit out their vessels from Norfolk, New Orleans, and elsewhere, without coming to ask Congress for permission. Having, then, got that power now, they did not ask the aid of Congress to carry on their operations in that respect at all. The error into which the gentleman had fallen was, in not limiting his views to this single fact—that the memorialists asked Congress to grant them simply the power to receive and to hold property bestowed upon them by voluntary benevolence.

Mr. BUCHANAN wished to ask the Senator from Kentucky one question. If a charter was granted by Congress to this society in the District of Columbia, would not the whole society be thereby organized? Would not the presidents and officers of the auxiliary societies act in obedience to this society here? He could not (Mr. B. said) conceive of two distinct societies.

Mr. CLAY could not say as to the officers of the auxiliary societies; but the actual corporators would be residents of the District of Columbia.

Mr. STRANGE would say one word in reply to the last suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky. If the society was efficient, without legislation, why did they desire something else? And that brought to his mind all the consequences growing out of a society of that character. If it required to be legalized, he would deprecate the consequences of that legalization. It was apparent that they could not get along so well without legislation as with it. He was opposed to lending them any assistance at all; for, if Congress granted them simply the powers they asked, it would be doing nothing less than to lend their countenance to the first step of a great system pregnant with evil to Southern interests. He did not doubt that the gentlemen who brought forward this proposition were sincere, and that the Colonization Society were actuated by benevolent motives; but, nevertheless, he was unwilling to aid them by legislation, for the reasons which he had already stated.

Mr. RIVES remarked that, as he had made up his mind to vote for the reference of this memorial to the Committee on the District of Columbia, he did not wish to be considered as expressing any opinion that the objects of this society could be accomplished by the aid of Congress. While he did not believe that it was competent for Congress to incorporate any society whose objects extended beyond the limits of the District, and were coextensive with the Union, he was yet disposed to vote for the reference, on the assumption that the acts of this society were to be confined to the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, felt very unwilling that the memorial should be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, for it was general in its character, as many gentlemen seemed to think; and that was to his mind the very reason why it should not be sent to this committee, whose duty was to attend to business connected only with the ten miles square, and to guard the rights of the people living within that space. It was quite palpable that no corporate body of this character could be established here, without affecting the whole Union. Why did not the society, instead of coming to Congress for an act of incorporation, apply to some of the States of the Union. Their object was clear; and he could not but regard this as an entering wedge to more extended operations, and it should be frustrated at once. He had never thrown any obstacle in the way of what he considered praiseworthy and meritorious on the part of the Colonization Society; but it was not the duty of Congress to lend them any assistance. Mr. K. concluded by moving that the memorial be laid on the table.

The memorial was then laid on the table: Ayes 24, no.s 12.

Reduction of the Revenue.

REDUCTION OF THE REVENUE. ✓

Mr. WRIGHT said the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred, by a resolution of the Senate of the 19th day of December last, so much of the annual message of the President as relates to the reduction of the revenue to the wants of the Government, had directed him to report a bill; and, as the bill was not accompanied by any written report, he hoped he should be indulged by the Senate in a very concise statement of some of the principles and views which had governed the action of the committee. It was not his purpose to debate the bill at this period, but merely to state its contents, and the foundations upon which it rested.

Mr. W. said it was his duty here to say that, in consequence partly of ill health, and partly of other and paramount engagements, the committee had been deprived, during all its deliberations upon this bill, of the valuable advice and aid of one of its members; and that, therefore, nothing contained in the bill, and nothing which he should say, was to be considered as committing that member of the committee, or as expressing his views upon the important and interesting questions involved. The very late arrival in the city of another member of the committee had prevented him from partaking fully in their deliberations. The bill, therefore, is to be received rather as the conclusions and recommendations of a bare majority of the committee, than of the whole committee; and it was his duty further to add, that what he should now say would be more the expression of his private views, and the motives and opinions which had governed his action, than any thing he had been either authorized or directed by the committee to say.

The reference was general, and applied to the whole revenue of the country. This revenue, or, more properly speaking, the receipts into the Treasury, consists of two parts: the money derived from the duties imposed upon importations, which is revenue proper, and the receipts from the sales of the public lands, which is, in fact capital, and not revenue. The committee, upon their first view of the reference, considered this last branch of the subject, the receipts from lands, more properly to belong to another standing committee of the Senate—the Committee on Public Lands. Indeed, at the very time of the reference, they knew that the subject of the reduction of the amount of money flowing into the public Treasury from the sales of the public lands was under consideration before that committee; and very soon after this reference to the Committee on Finance, and before that committee had made it a subject of deliberation, the Committee on Public Lands reported to the Senate a bill, having for its object the reduction of this branch of the receipts into the public Treasury. That bill was, long since, taken up for action in the Senate; and has, for many days now last past, occupied the principal time and attention of the body.

The Committee on Finance, therefore, have not, at any time, considered that branch of the reference before them for their action, or that they have been, at any period since the reference, at liberty to consider and act upon it.

Mr. W. said, another conclusion of his own mind, and one he believed existing also in the minds of his colleagues upon the committee who were present and acting, was, that if Congress, by any legislative action, at its present session, could reduce the receipts into the Treasury to the wants of the Government, the most important measures to reach that object must relate to the lands, and go to reduce the receipts from that source. This conclusion was founded upon the amount of receipts from that source for the last two years. These receipts for the years 1835 and 1836, counted together, had amounted to between thirty-eight and thirty-nine millions of dollars, he did not know but full thirty-nine millions; a sum which exceeded the usual estimate of the wants of the Treasury for the two years mentioned. If, then, every dollar of the revenue from customs were instantly repealed, and the receipts from the lands were to continue at the rates of the last year, there would still be a surplus in the Treasury, or the expenses of the Government must be swollen beyond the amount which is considered economical and desirable. It was, therefore, impossible to apply an efficient and adequate remedy for the existing evil of a redundant revenue by any reduction of the revenue from customs. The receipts from the lands was the seat of the evil, and to that quarter the great and commanding remedies must be directed. The committee hoped and believed, during the whole of their deliberations, that Congress would pass the necessary laws, during its present session, to lop this branch of our public receipts, and to relieve the national Treasury from the dangerous plethora now weighing upon it from that source. Mr. W. said he yet entertained that hope, and his action upon the interesting and important subject of a reduction of our revenue from the customs had been influenced by that hope and belief.

Thus confined, as the committee believed they were, to a consideration of the reduction of the duties upon customs, another principle which actuated himself, and which he believed actuated every member of the committee who participated in their deliberations, was to move cautiously and safely; not to shock the public sense by any hasty and rash movement; not, if that could possibly be prevented, to disturb any permanent and important domestic interest of the country, which had grown up, or was now growing up, under the protection of our revenue laws; but to go as far as the existing laws would permit, to reduce this branch of the revenue without incurring any of these evils. Acting upon this principle, the committee had, in the bill which he was directed to report, and which he was about to send to the Secretary's table, added to the list of free articles every thing which had appeared to them to admit of being made free, without injury to the interests to which he had referred. Every article proposed to be made free was distinctly named in the bill, and the committee had caused a statement to be prepared, from the tables of commerce and navigation for the year ending on the 30th of September, 1835, (the last table of that description which is yet completed,) showing the name or designation of the article, the present rate of duty, the amount of importations for the year 1835, the amount of duty paid upon the article as calculated upon those importations, and the amount of duty proposed to be reduced, as estimated upon the importations of that year. Many of the articles named in the bill are not enumerated separately in the tables of commerce and navigation, but are given as non-enumerated articles, and so grouped as not to show, with precision, the importance of each; but the committee believe that the statement will present, with satisfactory clearness, to the mind of every Senator, the effect of the action they recommend by this part of their bill. This statement it was the intention of the committee to ask the Senate to order to be printed, to accompany the bill; and they felt confident it would afford greater aid to the action of the body upon the bill than any other form of written report they could have presented.

Among the articles proposed to be made free would be found "common salt;" and Mr. W. said, while it was not his object, at this time, to discuss any of the merits or provisions of the bill, he hoped he should be pardoned for the remark, that he knew this was, by far, the most important article inserted in the free list, and an article much more likely than any other to excite a deep feeling in the country, and to meet with firm and spirited opposition. He also knew that this was, in certain portions of the Union, a protected article, and would, in that sense, be considered as inserted in violation of the general principle by which the committee had proposed to govern their action. Under these convictions, he was consoled by the reflection that no State in the Union held so deep a stake in this article, as a domestic article, and one of domestic manufacture, as the State he had the honor in part to represent here. It was an important article to a large and most respectable class of the citizens of his State, as one of production and manufacture; and it was important to the State itself, as a source of revenue to the State treasury. In these aspects, he was fully aware of the delicacy of his position in having consented, as a member of the committee, to the insertion of salt as a free article, and in standing here to urge the Senate to repeal the duty upon it. He did, however, believe that the universal wish of his constituents was that the revenues of this Government should be reduced to the economical wants of its Treasury, and that they did not expect to reach that desirable result without themselves making their full share of sacrifices to the common object. He therefore relied upon their liberality and patriotism to justify him in the course he had pursued; and he did not doubt that they would justify their representatives upon this floor, and in the other House of Congress, in consenting to this reduction of more than half a million of tax upon one of the most prominent and universal necessities of life, when the money raised upon it was not only not wanted for public expenditure, but was producing dangers to our institutions greater than any which those institutions have heretofore encountered—the dangers of an over-filled Treasury and a surplus revenue. He could not be mistaken in the opinion that if the country could be effectually discharged from these startling dangers, his constituents, patriotic and intelligent as they ever had been, and still are, would not only justify, but applaud, their representatives here, for coming forward and offering this sacrifice on their behalf, to reach so important a national goal.

Mr. W. said the article of "wines" was another important article which had presented itself to the notice of the committee, and which they would have been inclined to make free, had it not been their duty also to notice and regard the stipulations in relation to wines in our late treaty with France. Those stipulations must be preserved with all the national faith which has throughout the whole history of our beloved country so signally distinguished her policy towards other nations; and, in the opinion of the committee, they put it out of the power of Congress to make any wines free until after the expiration of the term mentioned in the treaty, during which the wines of France were to have extended to them certain advantages, in our revenue laws, over the wines of other countries. Under this impression the committee have recommended a further reduction, to the extent of one half, of the existing duties upon all wines, from whatever country imported; thus preserving the proportions between French and other wines, stipulated by the treaty to be preserved in our future legislation upon this subject, and pursuing the same course of legislation which Congress has, upon two former occasions, since the ratification of the treaty, pursued in regulating the duties upon wines.

As intimately connected with this branch of the revenue from customs, the article of "spirits made from vinous materials" attracted the attention of the committee. They found the existing duties upon this description of spirits very high, ranging from fifty-three to eighty-five cents per gallon, according to the rates of proof at which the spirits may be imported; and that, by applying the same reduction to this class of duties which the committee propose to apply to wines themselves, they would be able to reduce the current revenue by a sum not less than from $275,000 to $300,000 per annum. It was not without much hesitancy and doubt that the committee adopted this recommendation. They were, and are, fully sensible that a proposition for the reduction of the duties upon any description of ardent spirits will not meet with favor in the minds of a very large portion of our citizens. They feel no certainty that it will receive the approbation of the Senate; but so deep was the conviction in the minds of a majority of the committee of the necessity of a reduction of every duty not protective in its character, to secure the preservation of those which are so, that they felt bound to make the proposition, and present it to Congress. The reduction in the revenue which will be effected by its adoption is so important in amount, that the committee hope it will receive the calm and candid consideration of Senators before a determination shall be made to diminish so extensively the beneficial action of the bill they present. To relieve the country from the incalculable evils growing out of a surplus revenue is the object of the bill; to do that without a reduction of the protecting duties has been the intention of the committee. They have, therefore, not touched the duty upon "spirits from grain;" and they cannot suppose that the reduction they propose upon one single other description of spirits will bring them at all into injurious competition with domestic spirits of any kind.

Mr. W. said he was extending his remarks further than he had designed, as discussion now was not his object. He would not, therefore, refer to any other articles affected by the two first sections of the bill. The two great articles of salt and spirits were the only ones which he supposed could excite much interest, or lead to much discussion or opposition. Hence he had desired to bring them more particularly to the notice of the Senate. It might be found that other articles had been unwisely inserted. It would be strange if, in so extensive a list, it should not be so; but they would not be important, and might be stricken out. It would also, no doubt, be found that some articles had been omitted which ought to be made free; and it might be the pleasure of the Senate, when acting upon the bill, to extend reduction to articles not now included. The examinations of the committee had been careful and diligent, but they had not been as extensive and perfect as they themselves could have wished, though as perfect as the time allowed them had permitted.

He would now, Mr. W. said, offer, very briefly, the apology which the committee had to offer for presenting the bill unaccompanied by any written report. If he had been fortunate enough to make himself understood by the Senate, in the remarks he had already made, it would be seen that no report could make the provisions of the bill more clear, or show more accurately its influence upon the revenue, and upon the articles embraced in it, than the statement prepared by the committee to accompany the bill would accomplish those purposes. The only object, therefore, of a report from the committee would be to give to the Senate their views, he would say their conjectures, as to the receipts and expenditures of the Government for the present and future years. After the most mature examination and reflection, it was the unanimous opinion of those members of the committee who were present, and acting in the matter, that they could make no report upon these points which would communicate to the Senate any new information, not already in the possession of every member of the body, or which would furnish any valuable or useful guides to the action of Congress upon the bill. Were it not proposed, by legislative action during the present session of Congress, to make great and important changes, affecting all branches of the revenue, and all the sources from which money comes into the public Treasury, calculations, estimates, conjectures, might be made as to the revenues of the present year; but all such calculations, even in that case, would be most vague and uncertain at best. The experience of the last two years has demonstrated the impossibility, with all the information which can be reached by those officers of the Government whose sole business and duty it is to manage our fiscal affairs, of so perfecting estimates upon this point that they may not disappoint us many millions. Distinguished and experienced legislators, too, have frequently attempted estimates with no better success, and no member of the Committee on Finance can pretend to information, or judgment, superior to those who have thus erred in their conjectures as to the receipts into our public Treasury for a given future period.

Add, then, the consideration that both branches of Congress are, at this moment, considering bills designed to diminish, for the future, the receipts into the Treasury from the sales of public lands, the impossibility that the committee should know whether any bill upon that subject will finally pass, and become a law; what may be the provisions of the bill which shall pass, in case any bill do pass; and what may be the effect, in practice, upon the receipts of money for land sales, of any given provisions which may be incorporated in any bill, and Mr. W. said he could not suppose it would be expected by the Senate that the Committee on Finance would have attempted any estimate of the amount to be reduced from the revenue from customs, in order to reduce the whole receipts into the Treasury to the standard of the economical wants of the Government. Against a body of contingencies and uncertainties of the magnitude and character specified, added to those which must always attend estimates of future revenue from uncertain sources, estimates in name would be more loose than ordinary conjectures; and so loose as to be of no other value than the mere conjectures of so many members of the body to which their report would be submitted. So much for the reasons which have led the committee to come to the conclusion not to attempt estimates, or calculations, or conjectures, as to the amount of money to come into the national Treasury during the present or any future year. They have satisfied themselves that the reductions from the revenue from customs proposed by the bill they recommend can be spared by the national Treasury, and leave it able to meet the necessary calls upon it. They do not pretend to say that further reductions will not be required to bring the revenue to the point so much desired, that of the economical wants of the Government. The receipts into the public Treasury are now greatly above that point. The committee have already said their examinations have convinced them that the great measures of reduction must be directed to that branch of the receipts arising from the sales of lands. They feel strongly the soundness of the principle, that reduction should be proceeded in cautiously and carefully; and, so far as that can be done, with a certainty that, while we are remedying one evil, we do not fall into another; that while we omit nothing which can be properly done to reduce the revenue to the wants of the Government, we do nothing calculated to carry us so far below that point as immediately to produce the necessity of again raising revenue by an increased rate of duties upon imports. These constant fluctuations, sudden and excessive changes in our revenue laws, and consequent agitations of the public mind, and uncertainties in the operations of mercantile and commercial men, Mr. W. said, he thought it most important, in any legislation, to avoid. Hence, he, as a member of the committee, had determined to pursue what he considered a safe course, neither endangering nor disturbing any important protected interest of the country, or the public Treasury in meeting the necessary calls upon it. He had not attempted to determine that the bill would do all that a full remedy for the existing evil demanded, but merely that, in the present state of uncertainty as to the other important branch of the public receipts, and the influences upon it of the instant legislation of Congress, it was all the committee had concluded, at present, to recommend, and that so much might be done safely.

Mr. W. said there was no less difficulty in making calculations and estimates upon the other side of this great account, the public expenditures. The ordinary expenditures of the Government, that portion of the expenses required to keep all the departments of the Government in organization and operation, were laid before us by the proper fiscal officer of the Government, and appropriations to that extent might be very safely calculated upon. All the information within the power of the committee upon this class of appropriations had been equally fully in the hands of every member of Congress, from the commencement of the session. No benefit here, then, could be derived from any report the committee could have made. All beyond this was within the pleasure of the two Houses of Congress and the President. What extraordinary appropriations they might see fit to make for fortifications, for the navy, for public defence generally, or for any other of the great objects calling for expenditures of money, it was not only out of the power of the committee to say, but would be in vain for them to attempt to conjecture. They could not, therefore, with any certainty, estimate the expenses of the year. Mr. W. said he felt conscious that the appropriations of Congress would, as he thought those appropriations should, be graduated by a due regard to the ability of the Treasury to pay, and the public and national wants to be supplied; but he also further believed that a redundant Treasury always promoted, not large merely, but extravagant appropriations; and one of his greatest anxieties to reduce the national revenues to the national wants arose from the conviction that in that way only can we preserve a system of economical expenditures. He would add no more upon this branch of the subject, hoping the Senate would find in these suggestions sufficient apology for the action of the committee in submitting the bill without any attempt at a report upon these vague uncertainties.

A single other remark, (said Mr. W.,) and he would relieve the Senate from listening to him further. He had not forgotten that another bill had been introduced elsewhere upon this same subject, and proposing to accomplish the same great purpose. He hoped he should not be considered as infringing, unpardonably, upon the rules of order, in making this reference to that measure. It might be supposed by some member of this body, it might be supposed by some member of the other House of Congress, or it might be supposed by some portion of our common constituents, that this bill, coming from the Committee on Finance, was designed to conflict with the measure referred to. For himself, (said Mr. W.,) he could say, with perfect truth, that no such motive or feeling had entered into his action. He was sure he could say the same for his colleagues upon the committee. They had considered the reference of the Senate, in the special manner in which it had been made, positive and mandatory upon them. A report of some sort was their duty, and the report which they believed most conformable to their duty, under the reference, was the bill he was about to present. The time for making their report was not a matter of their pleasure. If made in the shape of a bill, they were bound to make it in time to permit the possibility of action upon it; and they had not been unfrequently reminded of the impatience of some members of the body for the conclusions to which they should come. Their delay had been unintentional and compulsory, and the advancement of the session had urgently admonished them that further delay would be equal to a failure to discharge the important and delicate duty intrusted to them. He (Mr. W.) thought that an examination of the two bills would satisfy every one that they could, in no sense, be antagonist to each other. The one proposes to add largely to the list of free articles, and to make material reductions upon two classes of articles not considered as belonging to the protected products or manufactures of the country. The other proposes to hasten, with very great rapidity, the reductions proposed to be made by the compromise act. It cannot, then, escape attention that there is no contradiction, in principle or action, between the two measures. Both may make too large or too rapid a reduction; but should the bill now presented fall short of its object, a sufficient reduction of the revenue from customs, it was his duty to say that no other mode of further material reductions had suggested itself to his mind, in the course of his examinations and reflections upon the subject, than to adopt the principle of that bill, moderated as to time so as to suit the exigency. He would further say, that he wished those most interested in the great and important provisions of the compromise act could see, as he thought he could see, that it was their peculiar interest to consent to a modification of that act, which should make its reductions of the revenue gradual and uniform from the present period to the year 1842; a little more rapid from this time to 1841, and much less precipitous and shocking to those interests from 1841 to 1842. As, however, the committee had no evidence before them of the feeling of the citizens most deeply interested in this policy, and as they had determined, if possible, to digest a bill which would meet with favor, and be passed into a law, they refrained from affixing any such condition to the bill they now report.

As to the instant effect of the two measures, (said Mr. W.), he believed there would be little difference. The bill he held in his hand proposed to reduce a fraction over $2,400,000, from and after the 30th June next. The other measure to which he had referred, as he understood it, proposed to reduce about $7,000,000 at three periods stated; the first of which was the 30th of September next, and the only one of the three periods falling within the present year. That measure, however, was prospective, and this was not; but Congress would be again in session before that bill would have effected but one reduction, and the accounts of the Treasury for another year would have been laid before us, as our guide to future and further action. He would detain the Senate no longer.

Mr. WRIGHT having concluded his introductory remarks explanatory of the objects of the bill,

Mr. CLAY said that he wanted, at this early stage of the bill, to say only a word or two. I will begin, said he, with expressing the regret I feel that no written report accompanies this bill, and that the substitute with which we have been presented, in the verbal remarks of the Senator from New York, is not as satisfactory as I think it might have been. In considering the amount of revenue which the wants of any Government may require, two questions should be taken into view. First, the probable amount of the revenue to be received from the taxes; and, in the second place, the probable amount of the public expenditure. If Congress have no knowledge of these, how can they know what revenue is to be raised, or what reduction may be provided for? In both of these points, the Senator from New York has utterly failed to furnish the Senate with any information.

By way of getting rid of presenting to us the probable amount of revenue, the Senator states that the Finance Committee are not able to offer any thing but uncertain conjectures. But every man who has hitherto been charged with the finances of the country, whether a Secretary of the Treasury or the chairman of a Finance Committee, has supposed it important to go into conjectures or estimates on these subjects, and to approximate as far as possible to the truth, that the Government may be enabled to form some practical estimate of the amount to which they may with propriety tax the people. But if the Senator thinks he can justify himself for this omission, how will he justify it to the country, and to those great interests which are assailed by this bill, that we have been furnished with no information touching the amount of public expenditure; and without information on either point, how has he come to the conclusion that there can exist a redundant revenue, and that it is an evil so great as to call for the legislation of Congress?

But I have not risen simply to express my regret at the want of information under which we are invited to act. I have risen, at once, promptly to declare that I shall oppose, so far as my voice and my vote can go, this disturbance of the compromise arrangement made in March, 1833, under which the country has flourished in an unparalleled degree, and on which all parties have reposed as being durable and permanent.

In regard to the articles of salt and spirituous liquors, both of which, but salt especially, are articles which cannot be touched without a violation of that compromise, the former is one in which my State has little interest, as connected with a tax for protection. It is the great States of New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Ohio, which are principally concerned in this question. In my own State, some of the article is manufactured, but we are so situated that the manufacture, as existing among us, derives no advantage from any protective duty. So far, therefore, as my constituents are concerned, I care not a particle if the duty shall be repealed in toto. But I oppose the measure because I view it as what has often and expressively been denominated an entering wedge; and because it is well known that all encroachments on the system may be expected to commence under plausible pretenses. The article of coal is an instance of this. In the depth of winter, when, during a season of intense cold, all are shivering for the want of a more abundant supply of fuel, the cry is raised to repeal the duty on foreign coal. So salt is known by every body to be an essential article of human subsistence, and it is seized upon as furnishing a plausible article on which the duty may be reduced, or dispensed with altogether.

But if these are all articles covered by the compromise, what security, what guarantee, can the country possess that the work of reduction is to stop at that point? Will not the process, ere long, reach to cotton and to woollens? Nay, are we not already notified, while, as I admit, the Senator has brought us a bill less exceptionable than a corresponding one which has been introduced elsewhere, that is not "antagonistical" (I believe the term is) to that measure; that there is no hostility between the two; and, if the purpose shall not be effected by this bill, for reducing the revenue to a sum not specified, that bill itself, or some kindred measure, must be resorted to? I want the country to know what is its actual condition. I want it to know whether that odious, that shocking list of articles, which has just been read by the Secretary, is to be brought up, session after session, for discussion and gradual action, till the whole protective system is destroyed. The country has a right to know whether the peace effected by the compromise of 1833 is to be respected; or whether it is to be assailed, first, in respect to articles calculated to excite public sympathy in their favor, and then those more important ones are at length to be reached which are essential to the prosperity of the national industry.

I have now discharged what I believed to be a duty. You have the power, both in this House and the other; you can do in this matter as you think proper. Go on, then. Disturb, distract the country; reagitae the community; reopen its wounds, just closed; do this, if it seems to you good; take upon yourselves the awful responsibility; but you shall never do it with my consent, nor without my solemn protest.

Mr. WRIGHT, in reply, observed that he should not argue the bill at this time. He had at present but one duty to perform, which was to report the bill. He would say again that the Finance Committee considered the amount both of revenue and expenditure for the coming year so entirely dependent on the action of Congress, that, beyond the documents already on the tables of members, the committee could state no valuable fact for their consideration. He would move that the bill be made the special order of the day for Thursday next, and that, in the mean time, the statement which had been presented in company with the bill might be printed.

The printing having been ordered,

Mr. DAVIS observed that this measure was one of great importance, and worthy of great consideration. He considered it desirable to keep the country out of agitation; its prosperity depended more on that than this body seemed to be fully aware of; prosperity was impossible, under any policy, unless the nation had the assurance of something steady in that policy. The nation wanted rest; the people need repose, that they may know what to do. He had almost said that even a bad policy, if steady, was better than a comparatively good one, if unsteady and perpetually fluctuating. This was peculiarly true in relation to the manufactures of the country, because those who conducted these establishments, if they were able to look a few years ahead, could shape their mode of conducting business so as to meet the policy of the Government. The bill proposed seriously to affect, among other articles, that of salt, in which Mr. D's State was largely interested, inasmuch as very large capitals were vested in establishments for its manufacture upon the seashore. Inasmuch, therefore, that the country might understand what was doing here, and what was sought to be accomplished by this bill, he would ask that one thousand extra copies of the statement which had accompanied the bill be printed.

This was agreed to.

The bill was then read a second time, and made the order of the day for Thursday next.

TREASURY CIRCULAR.

The following bill, which was yesterday ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read a third time:

A bill designating and limiting the funds receivable for the revenues of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, required to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to effect a collection of the public revenue of the United States, whether arising from duties, taxes, debts, or sales of lands, in the manner and on the principles herein provided: that is, that no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money payable for lands, shall be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States, under the following restrictions and conditions in regard to such notes, to wit: from and after the passage of this act, the notes of no bank which shall issue or circulate bills or notes of a less denomination than five dollars shall be received on account of the public dues; and from and after the thirtieth day of December, eighteen hundred and thirty-nine, the notes of no bank which shall issue or circulate bills or notes of a less denomination than ten dollars shall be so receivable; and from and after the thirtieth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, the like prohibition shall be extended to the notes of all banks issuing bills or notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That no notes shall be received by the collectors or receivers of the public money which the banks in which they are to be deposited shall not, under the supervision and control of the Secretary of the Treasury, agree to pass to the credit of the United States as cash: Provided, That if any deposit bank shall refuse to receive and pass to the credit of the United States, as cash, any notes receivable under the provisions of this act, which said bank, in the ordinary course of business, receives on general deposit, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to withdraw the public deposits from said bank.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. BENTON rose and commenced his speech against its passage with stating the reason why he had not spoken the evening before, when the question was on the engrossment of the bill. He said that he could not have foreseen that the subject depending before the Senate, the bill for limiting the sales of the public lands to actual settlers, would be laid down for the purpose of taking up this subject out of its order; and, therefore, had not brought with him some memorandums which he intended to use when this subject came up. He did not choose to ask for delay, because his habit was to speak to subjects when they were called; and in this particular cause he did not think it material when he spoke; for he was very well aware that his speaking would not affect the fate of the bill. It would pass; and that was known to all in the chamber. It was known to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. EWING] who indulged himself in saying he thought otherwise a few days ago; but that was only a good-natured way of stimulating his friends, and bringing them up to the scratch. The bill would pass, and that by a good vote, for it would have the vote of the opposition, and a division of the administration vote. Why, then, did he speak? Because it was due to his position, and the part he had acted on the currency questions, to express his sentiments more fully on this bill, so vital to the general currency, than could be done by a mere negative vote. He should, therefore, speak against it, and should direct his attention to the bill reported by the Public Land Committee, which had so totally changed the character of the proceeding on this subject. The rescision of the Treasury order was introduced a resolution—it went out a resolution—but it came back a bill, and a bill to regulate, not the land office receipts only, but all the receipts of the Federal Government; and in this new form is to become statute law, and a law to operate on all the revenues, and to repeal all other laws upon the subject to which it related. In this new form it assumes an importance, and acquires an effect, infinitely beyond a resolution, and becomes, in fact as well as in name, a totally new measure. Mr. R. reminded the Senate that he had, in his first speech on this subject, given it as his opinion, that two main objects were proposed to be accomplished by the rescinding resolution: first, the implied condemnation of President Jackson for violating the laws and constitution, and destroying the prosperity of the country; and, secondly, the imposition of the paper currency of the States upon the Federal Government. With respect to the first of these objects, he presumed it was fully proved by the speeches of all the opposition Senators who had spoken on this subject; and, with respect to the second, he believed it would find its proof in the change which the original resolution had undergone, and the form it was now assuming of statute law, and especially with the proviso which was added at the end of the second section.

Mr. B. then took up the bill reported by the committee, and remarked, first, upon its phraseology, not in the spirit of verbal criticism, but in the spirit of candid objection and fair argument. There were cases in which words were things, and this was one of those cases. Money was a thing, and the only words in the constitution for that thing were, "gold and silver coin." The bill of the committee was systematically exclusive of the words which meant this thing, and used words which included things which were not money. These words were, then, a fair subject of objection and argument, because they went to set aside the money of the constitution, and to admit the public revenues to be paid in something which was not money.

The title of the bill uses the word "funds." It professes to designate the funds receivable for the revenues of the United States. Upon this word Mr. B. had remarked before, as being one of the most indefinite in the English language; and, so far from signifying money only, even paper money only, that it comprehended every variety of paper security, public or private, individual or corporate, out of which money could be raised. The retention of this word by the committee, after the objections made to it, were indicative of their intentions to lay open the federal Treasury to the reception of something which was not constitutional money; and this intention, thus disclosed in the title to the bill, was fully carried out in its enactments. The words "legal currency of the United States" are twice used in the first section, when the words "gold and silver" would have been more appropriate and more definite, if hard money was intended.

Mr. B. admitted that, in the eye of a regular bred constitutional lawyer, legal currency might imply constitutional currency; but certain it was that the common and popular meaning of the phrase was not limited to constitutional money, but included every currency that the statute law made receivable for debts. Thus, the notes of the Bank of the United States were generally considered as legal currency, because receivable by law in payment of public dues; and in like manner the notes of all specie-paying banks would, under the committee's bill, rise to the dignity of legal currency. The second section of the bill twice used the word "cash;" a word which, however understood at the Bank of England, where it always means ready money, and where ready money signifies gold coin in hand, yet with the banks with which we have to deal it has no such meaning, but includes all sorts of current paper money on hand, as well as gold and silver on hand.

Mr. B. verified this statement by reading from the sworn return of the Clinton Bank of Columbus, one of the deposite banks, made to the Legislature of Ohio at their present session, and where the available means of the bank, among other items, has one thus stated: "Cash on hand, viz: Eastern bank notes, $34,521; Western do. $65,700; gold and silver, $136,389." This return is sworn to by Wm. Neil, president, and J. Delafield, jr., cashier, before Squire Jenkins, justice of the peace; and it is certified and declared by ten directors of the bank to be correct and accurate; so that no doubt can be entertained that, in the vocabulary of the Clinton Bank of Columbus, the word "cash" signifies Eastern and Western paper, as well as gold and silver; and in this case the vocabulary of that bank is superior to all the dictionaries, for it is a deposite bank, and will have the execution of the act, if it passes, in its own hands, and will decide for itself what is and what is not cash.

Having shown from this authentic statement that a deposite bank in the West construed cash on hand to be bank notes on hand, Mr. B. would now show the same construction made by 130 banks in a lump, and that in a part of the Union where correctness of phraseology was as much or more attended to than in any other part. He spoke of Massachusetts, and of the official return made by all the banks in that State to the Legislature of the State, now in session at Boston. In the consolidated returns of these 130 banks, he found the following items: "Cash deposited, not on interest, $8,784,516; cash deposited, on interest, $6,447,928; gold, silver, and other coin, $1,455,230." Here (said Mr. B.) is the highest evidence that this word "cash," in the vocabulary of our banks, comprehends paper money; and he had no doubt but that proofs to the same effect might be accumulated to any amount. He had not looked out for such proofs; what he had used had fallen into his hands in the common current of his reading, since this bill had been reported. But why look abroad for proofs? Let every gentleman look to his own knowledge. Does he not every day hear the word "cash" used to include paper money? Does he not daily see sales of property advertised, and the terms stated to be cash; and under these terms is it not understood, by all parties, that ready pay in bank notes, as well as in hard money, are the terms intended? And has the instance ever been heard of, that a bidder going to one of these cash sales thought it necessary to supply himself with gold and silver, under the belief that current bank notes would not be received as cash? Certainly, said Mr. B., the original idea of cash, as used at the Bank of England, where it means British gold coin on hand, in contradistinction to foreign gold coin on hand, which is always called bullion, is now lost in this country; and that paper money is just as fully comprehended now, throughout our country, under the term "cash," as hard money is. But why argue, or look to proofs, or even refer to our own knowledge? Look to the proviso to the second section to the committee's bill, and it will be seen that it is not only the intention of that bill that paper money may be, but that paper money shall be, included under the term "cash." These are the words: "Provided, That if any deposite bank shall refuse to receive, and pass to the credit of the United States, as cash, any notes, receivable under the provisions of this act, which the said bank, in the ordinary course of its business, receives on general deposite, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to withdraw the public deposites from said bank." These are the words, and they are not only declaratory of the committee's meaning that paper money is to be considered as cash, but is clearly expressive of their purpose, that it shall be received as such. The point to which such an enactment would soon bring the federal finances, Mr. B. said, might be seen in a certificate of general deposite granted by the Clinton Bank of Columbus, of which he would read a copy:

"No. 276. Clinton Bank of Columbus, 31st December, 1836.—B. S. Brown has deposited twelve hundred dollars, subject to the order of himself, payable in currency, and return of this certificate. Signed, &c."

Yes, said Mr. B., currency, payable in currency! such will quickly be the revenues of the Federal Government under this enactment to compel deposite banks to credit current paper as cash.

Mr. B. said it would be sufficient, he should think, to point out the meaning of the words used in the committee's bill, to show that they were susceptible of a construction by which this hard-money Federal Government, as it was intended to be by its framers, may be changed into a paper-money Government. It would be sufficient to excite apprehension to see the systematic use of these terms, even after objection made to them, and the systematic exclusion of the terms used in the constitution, even after their insertion is solicited; but all room for mistake vanishes when we come to look to this proviso, and to see that the deposit banks are not only required to credit paper as cash, but are to be punished by a loss of the public deposits if they do not so credit it!

Having remarked upon the phraseology of the bill, and shown that a paper currency, composed of the notes of a thousand local banks, not only might become the currency of the Federal Government, but was evidently intended to be made its currency; and that, in the face of all the protestations of the friends of the administration in favor of re-establishing the national gold currency, Mr. B. would now take up the bill of the committee under two or three other aspects, and show it to be as mistaken in its design as it would be impotent in its effect. In the first place, it transferred the business of suppressing the small-note circulation from the deposit branch to the collecting branch of the public revenue. At present, this business was in a course of progress through the deposit banks, as a condition of holding the public moneys, and, as such, had a place in the deposit act of the last session, and also had a place in the President's message of the last session, where the suppression of paper currency under twenty dollars was expressly referred to the action of the deposit banks, and as a condition of their retaining the public deposits. It was through the deposit banks, and not through the reception of local bank paper, that the suppression of small notes should be effected. In the next place, he objected to the committee's bill, because it proposed to make a bargain with each of the thousand banks now in the United States, and the hundreds more which will soon be born, and to give them a right—a right by law—to have their notes received at the federal Treasury. He was against such a bargain. He had no idea of making a contract with these thousand banks for the reception of their notes. He had no idea of contracting with them, and giving them a right to plead the constitution of the United States against us, if, at any time, after having agreed to receive their notes, upon condition that they would give up their small circulation, they should choose to say we had impaired the contract by not continuing to receive them; and so either relapse into the issue of this small trash, or have recourse to the judicial process to compel the United States to abide the contract, and continue the reception of all their notes. Mr. B. had no idea of letting down this Federal Government to such petty and inconvenient bargains with a thousand moneyed corporations. The Government of the United States ought to act as a Government, and not as a contractor. It should prescribe conditions, and not make bargains. It should give the law. He was against these bargains, even if they were good ones; but they were bad bargains, wretchedly bad, and ought to be rejected as such, even if all higher and nobler considerations were out of the question. What is the consideration that the United States is to receive? A mere individual agreement with each bank by itself, that in three years it will cease to issue notes under ten dollars, and in five years it will cease to issue notes under twenty dollars. What is the price which she pays for this consideration? In the first place, it receives the notes of such bank as gold and silver at all the land offices, custom-houses, and post offices, of the United States, and, of course, pays them out again as gold and silver to all her debtors. In the next place, it compels the deposit banks to credit them as cash. In the third place, it accredits the whole circulation of the banks, and makes it current all over the United States, in consequence of universal receivability for all federal dues. In other words, it endorses, so far as credit is concerned, the whole circulation of every bank that comes into the bargain thus proposed. This is certainly a most wretched bargain on the part of the United States—a bargain in which what she receives is ruinous to her; for the more local paper she receives in payment of her revenues, the worse for her, and the sooner will her Treasury be filled with unavailable funds.

But what is worse is, that in order to make this ruinous bargain—a bargain by which the Treasury would be immediately filled with many ten millions of unavailable funds—we shall have to reject the proper, cheap, speedy, and effectual mode of suppressing these small notes which is now in our power, and not only in our power, but offered and pressed upon us. Mr. B. alluded to the propositions of the deposit banks to effect this suppression, not only for themselves, but on other banks also, which were now in the Treasury Department, and waiting the action of the Government. He himself had communicated with a great number of these banks, both personally and by letter, and knew that many of the most respectable deposit banks were not only willing, but ready and anxious to enter into arrangements with the Treasury Department for the effectual and speedy accomplishment of this purpose. Two years ago, he said, the Secretary of the Treasury had addressed a circular letter to the deposit banks, to know if they were willing to give up their small-note circulation, as a part of the conditions on which they were to retain the public deposits. He held a copy of that circular in his hand, and knew that many favorable answers had been received, and was certain that they presented the ready and far preferable mode of suppressing this small-note circulation.

Mr. B. repeated, it was not in Congress only that he had worked at this object; he had communicated with many banks; and, from those of large business and high character, he had invariably received the strongest assurances, not only of a readiness, but of a wish to co-operate with the Government in this good work. He would read from one communication, a letter from Mr. Campbell P. White, president of the Manhattan Bank, New York, and would show the resolutions which that gentleman had drawn up and sent to him (Mr. B.) at the commencement of this session, to accomplish this object. This is the extract:

"I submit to you two resolutions that I think should be passed by a concurrent vote of the two Houses of Congress. The large amount of specie, above seventy millions of dollars, now in the United States, makes it a favorable moment, if not an imperative duty, to repress the circulation of all bank notes under the denomination of twenty dollars. As some persons question the constitutional power, and others the expediency, of resorting to taxation for this purpose, none can object to making it a condition for retaining the public deposits, that the deposit banks shall check and repress the emission of paper, so as to secure to us that portion of the money in circulation in the world which our exchangeable products bear to the whole exchangeable products of the world, and which we should ever enjoy, were it not driven out by the substitution of the shadow for the substance—the substitution of paper for gold and silver."

This is the extract of the letter, (said Mr. B.,) and the sentiments in it are worthy of the gentleman who, as a former member of Congress, was one of those most instrumental in reviving the gold circulation, by taking a lead in correcting the erroneous standard of our gold. The following are the two resolutions communicated at the same time:

"Resolved, That from and after the 4th day of July, 1837, no bank shall be employed, or continued in the employment of the Treasury of the United States as a deposit bank, unless they shall previously engage, in writing, under their corporate seal, to issue and put in circulation no bank note or bank check of a less denomination than ten dollars; and, also, that they will not receive on deposit, or in payment, any bank note or bank check of a less denomination; nor the bank notes or bank checks of any bank, of any denomination, on deposit or in payment, after such period, that issues or puts in circulation bank notes or bank checks of a less amount than ten dollars, as aforesaid."

"Resolved, That from and after the 4th day of July, 1838, no bank shall be employed, or continued in the employment of the Treasury of the United States as a deposit bank, unless they shall previously engage in writing, under their corporate seal, to issue and put in circulation no bank note or bank check of a less denomination than twenty dollars; and, also, that they will not receive on deposit or in payment any bank note or bank check of a less denomination; nor the bank notes or bank checks of any bank, of any denomination, on deposit or payment, after such period, that issues or puts in circulation bank notes or bank checks of a less amount than twenty dollars, as aforesaid."

These (said Mr. B.) are the propositions now made to us by a bank of the highest character; and he knew many others which were ready to agree to the same propositions. Compare them with this bill, if it is possible to institute a comparison between two such objects, and observe the immeasurable difference between them. First, in the nature of the process: here there is no bargain, no contract; but Congress is requested to act as a Government, not to deal like a contractor, and to prescribe the conditions on which the deposit banks are to accomplish our purpose. In the next place, so far from making a contract for the receivability of their notes in exchange for the suppression of the small ones, there is not even a wish expressed for such reception. In the third place, as to the promptness and efficiency of their action in suppressing the small notes. Instead of waiting three years for putting down those under ten dollars, it is proposed to be done in four months; so far from waiting five years for putting down those under twenty dollars, it is to be done in less than one year and a half. Next, as to the efficiency of the action of the two modes: the bill of the committee acts upon but one bank at a time, and upon the notes only of that one bank, leaving the door open to checks, and the use of the notes of other banks; the proposition of the Manhattan Bank, and which may be considered as a sample of those from all the banks of high character, operates in three different ways, and upon multitudes of banks at the same time. 1. The deposit bank is to bind itself, under its corporate seal, neither to issue nor to put in circulation any bank note or bank check under the denomination of ten dollars, after the 4th of July next, or of twenty dollars after the 4th of July, 1832. 2. It binds itself, in like manner, not to receive on deposit or in payment any bank note or bank check of less denominations, after the said terms. 3. It binds itself, in like manner, not to receive the notes or checks, of any denomination whatever, of any bank whatever which continues after those dates to issue or circulate notes or checks under the respective amounts of ten and twenty dollars. This (said Mr. B.) is what the respectable banks are ready to submit to, if Congress will only act as a Government, and prescribe conditions for all the deposit banks; which, in their turn, are to operate upon all other banks, instead of entering into petty bargains with each bank by itself. One acts effectually, and upon masses; the other acts ineffectually, and upon units. One demands no price; the other is to have the incalculable price of having their paper made legal currency, and put upon a footing, in the receipts and expenditures of the Federal Government, with the gold and silver of the constitution! By one mode, our work will be done speedily and effectually; by the other, tardily and ineffectually. Why grant these three and five years? The only object of delay is to give the banks time to gather specie from abroad to supply the place of the small bills. But that is done to their hand. The Government has done it. The specie is here, and will go away if we do not create a home demand for it. Instead of beginning to suppress their notes, the local banks will put it off to the last moment of the three and five years, and double their small issues in the mean time, to make profit while they can. There is specie enough now, and it is increasing every day. Arrivals from abroad are daily announced. Five hundred thousand dollars arrived at New Orleans on two days only of this month, the 9th and 10th of January. If our hard-money measures are continued, specie will continue to increase for years to come as it has for four years past—at the average rate of more than ten millions per annum. The delay proposed by this bill is not only unnecessary, but injurious to its own object; the mode of acting is either ineffectual or ruinous. There are now a thousand banks in the United States, and the distributions of the surplus are breeding multitudes more. If all these banks accept the terms, then our Treasury is ruined by becoming the receptacle—the tomb—of all their paper; if half or a quarter refuse, or even a hundred, then the bill will be ineffectual; for these refusing banks will turn all their strength upon the issue of small paper. Mr. B. said here was a terrible dilemma. If the majority of the banks accept the terms, then they ruin the Treasury; if they do not, then they continue to injure the country; and he quoted, to sustain his opinion of the inefficiency of this mode of acting, the following sentiments expressed, when the United States Bank charter was under consideration, in 1832, by a Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER:]

"It may, perhaps, strike some gentlemen that the circulation of small notes might be effectually discouraged by refusing to receive not only all such notes, but all notes of such banks as issued them, at the custom-houses, land offices, post offices, and other places of public receipt, and by causing them to be refused also, either in payment or deposit, at the Bank of the United States. But the effect of such refusal may be doubtful. It would certainly, in some degree, discredit such notes, but in all probability it would not drive them out altogether; and, if it should not do this, it might, very probably, increase their circulation. If in some degree they become discredited, to that degree they would become cheaper than other notes; and universal experience proves that, of two things which may be current, the cheaper will always expel the other."

Mr. B. had been at work for five years to procure the suppression of paper money under twenty dollars. His exertions, on that point, had brought him into communication with the officers of many banks; and it was due to them to say, that all the banks of high character, with which he had communicated, were in favor of the suppression of small notes; and he was fully persuaded that many of them, and as a mere condition of retaining the public deposits, if the deposit banks were reduced to the proper number, would give up their circulation entirely, and introduce into our country the example of banks of discount, deposit, and exchange, alone, as they exist in Europe, and where they give all the real benefits of banks, without the dangers and mischiefs of issuing paper money. In his opinion, about thirty deposit banks were enough; they were more places of deposit than existed during the time of the Bank of the United States, which had but twenty-four branches; and if the deposits were confined to about thirty banks of good capital and high character, these banks would immediately, that is to say, within one or two years, and now while we have the specie to justify the operation, enter heartily into the measure of putting down the circulation of notes under twenty dollars. With the additional inducement of relinquishing the interest which they now pay on deposits, he felt certain they would quickly accomplish this great work for the country. Now is the time, as Mr. C. P. White says in his letter, now is the time to do it, when our specie is between seventy and eighty millions of dollars. Certainly this is the time, while forty-five millions of that specie is locked up in the vaults of banks—and while our paper circulation is so redundant as to have undergone a depreciation which is heavily felt in the price of every article of consumption by all persons who live upon wages and fixed income. This is the time to effect the suppression; and it was afflicting to see it lost; for to postpone it five years was to lose the golden opportunity. And at whose instance was this to be done? At the instance of the small banks—the two-and-sixpenny concerns—to which it was an object to put out small notes, for the sake of the gain to the bank upon the loss to the community, in the wear and tear of small notes. Mr. B. said it was the small banks which cling to the small notes, and some of them since they became deposit banks, and in violation of the deposit law. He would give an instance; it was from that same Clinton Bank of Columbus, from which he had before read. In the statement of its condition made to the Legislature of Ohio on the 9th day of January of the present year, the circulation of the bank is thus stated: One-dollar bills, $6,226; two-dollar do. $4,916; three-dollar do. $6,669; five do. $60,085; ten do. $10,910; twenty do. $12,140; fifty do. $13,400; one hundred do. $300. Now, here is a bank whose total circulation is $115,000, and of which the whole, except about $25,000, is under twenty dollars; and yet this bank, on this question, and in this chamber, is to outweigh the Manhattan, and the other great banks of the country!

Mr. B. said it was curious to observe that the small country banks in England had governed the legislation of the British Parliament in the suppression of the small notes, precisely in the manner now going on in this country, and with the same disastrous results there which may be expected to ensue here. He would, to show this, read an extract from the testimony of the governor of the Bank of England, Mr. Horsley Palmer, before Lord Althorp's committee, in 1832. He says:

"By the resolution of the House of Commons of 1819, the Bank of England was required, within four years, to pay off in gold the amount of their one-pound notes then in circulation, (about £7,500,000; further, to provide the coin for paying off the country small notes in 1823, (about £7,800,000 more;) in addition to which, the necessity was imposed of providing the requisite surplus bullion for insuring the convertibility of all their liabilities; which addition of bullion to their stock could not be estimated at less than £5,000,000; making in the aggregate £20,000,000 of gold as necessary to be procured from foreign countries within the space of four years from 1819. The bank cancelled their own small notes in 1821, (two years before the time limited by Parliament.) In 1822, being three years prior to the time fixed by Parliament, they were in a situation to furnish the gold for paying off the country small notes, (that is, they had procured the whole 20 millions in gold, near 100 millions of dollars, from foreign countries in three years,) when, without any communication with the bank, the Government thought proper to authorize a continuance of the circulation of the country small notes until 1833."

Mr. B. said it was here seen that the governor of the Bank of England complained that, when the Bank of England had procured twenty millions sterling in gold in three years, (equal to near one hundred millions of dollars,) and had suppressed its own small notes, and had gold enough to supply the place of all the country banks' small notes, that these country banks got the time extended for the suppression of theirs—got it done in Parliament, without consultation with the Bank of England—and extended up to the year 1833. This is the testimony of the governor of the bank, and the point of it is this: that the Parliament lost the golden moment of doing the great work, and lost it by conforming to the interest of the small country banks, whose friends were numerous and powerful in Parliament, in opposition to the interest of the empire, and against the wishes of the Bank of England. The rest is matter of history. That history is, that these country banks never enjoyed the seven years which Parliament granted them. Having seven years to go upon, they resolved to make hay while the sun was shining. So to work they went, and put out more small notes than ever. The consequence was, the vast and disastrous explosion of the paper system which took place in 1825, an explosion which covered all England with the wrecks of broken fortunes, and in which so many families who thought themselves affluent were suddenly sunk, without any fault of their own, and, as if by magic and enchantment, from the enjoyment of wealth and happiness, to the sufferings of poverty, misery, and despair. History, said Mr. B., is said to be philosophy teaching by example. But how many of her lessons are lost upon the world! Here is a great lesson given to us in our own time, and by the nation from whom we have borrowed our whole system of banking. Yet this lesson is lost upon us; and we must go through her sufferings, and learn it ourselves, as she did, before we can know it. Our circumstances are the same; we have accumulated upwards of 70 millions of gold and silver; it is increasing every day; we are ready for the operation of drawing in small notes, and putting out hard money; the strong and respectable banks wish us to do it; the public interest requires it to be done; the policy of President Jackson's administration prescribes it; yet we lose the golden opportunity; we put it off for five years! and instead of adopting an efficient course to act upon masses of banks, and upon every variety of their circulation under twenty dollars, we take an impotent, inefficient course, and to act upon units, and upon the notes which they issue only, and by way of bargain, which either party may terminate when it pleases, a bargain which must be fatal to our Treasury if the banks accept it!

Mr. B. having gone over these objections to the committee's bill, would now ascend to a class of objections of a higher and graver character. He had already remarked that the committee had carried out a resolution, and had brought back a bill; that the committee proposed a statutory enactment, where the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] and the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] had only proposed a joint resolution; and he had already further remarked, that in addition to this total change in the mode of action, the committee had added what neither of these Senators had proposed, a clause, under a proviso, to enact paper money into cash—to pass paper money to the credit of the United States, as cash—and to punish, by the loss of the deposits, any deposit bank which should refuse so to receive, so to credit, and so to pass, the notes "receivable" under the provisions of their bill. These two changes make entirely a new measure—one of wholly a different character from the resolutions of the two Senators—a measure which openly and in terms, and under penalties, undertakes to make local State paper a legal tender to the Federal Government, and to compel the reception of all its revenues in the notes "receivable" under the provisions of the committee's bill. After this gigantic step—this colossal movement—in favor of paper money, there was but one step more for the committee to take, and that was to make these notes a legal tender in all payments from the Federal Government. But that step was unnecessary to be taken in words, for it is taken in fact, when the other great step becomes law. For it is incontestable that what the Government receives, it must pay out; and what it pays out becomes the currency of the country. So that when this bill passes, the paper money of the local banks will be a tender by law to the Federal Government, and a tender by duress from the Government to its creditors and the people. This is the state to which the committee's bill will bring us! and now, let us pause and contemplate, for a moment, the position we occupy, and the vast ocean of paper on which we are proposed to be embarked.

We stand upon a constitution which recognises nothing but gold and silver for money; we stand upon a legislation of near fifty years, which recognises nothing but gold and silver for money. Now, for the first time, we have a statutory enactment proposed to recognise the paper of a wilderness of local banks for money, and in so doing to repeal all prior legislation by law, and the constitution by fact. This is an era in our legislation. It is statute law to control all other law, and is not a resolution to aid other laws, and to express the opinions of Congress. On this point he must be permitted to refer to what he had said in a former part of this debate, when he dwelt upon the difference between an act of Congress and a resolution of Congress, and congratulated himself that no act of the national Legislature had ever attacked the great fundamental acts for the collection of the revenues in the gold and silver money of the constitution. This is what he then said:

"The exclusion of paper money was as carefully enforced by the constitution as the adoption of gold and silver was sedulously guarded. The words of the constitution and the history of the times, and especially the 44th No. of the Federalist, written by Mr. Madison, all prove this. The early legislation of Congress conformed to the words and spirit of the constitution, and adopted the plainest and strongest language to guard the currency which it had adopted. The two acts fundamental for the collection of the two great branches of the revenue—lands and customs: that of 1739 for the latter, and 1800 for the former—were express that gold and silver coin only should be received for the customs, and specie and evidences of the public debt only, for the public lands. These two great acts, being faithful interpreters of the constitution, have never been openly attacked in either House of Congress. In all the changes which subsequent legislation has made in the laws, of which the hard-money enactments are part, these clauses have been retained in the same, or equivalent, expressions; so that a hard-money currency still remains the constitutional and the statutory currency of the Federal Government. Temporary enactments in favor of Treasury notes, and United States Bank notes, have ceased; and the joint resolution of 1816 neither does nor can repeal a law. Resolutions, whether joint or several, are not the mode of national legislation. They are only declaratory of facts or principles, or expressive of the opinions and purposes of the House or Houses from which they emanate. The joint resolution differs from the single in nothing but in being the declaration, the opinion, or the purpose, of both Houses, instead of one. This being the case, and the two fundamental enactments of 1739 and 1800 being still in force, as retained in subsequent alterations of the laws to which they belong, the question is, how comes it that they have been treated as dead letters on the statute book, and paper money received in place of the hard money which they imperatively required? The answer to this question," &c.

This is what was said four or five weeks ago, said Mr.

B.; and strong as he felt in the correctness of what he then said, he would yet now reinforce it with authority—authority drawn from different sources—but both entitled to deference in this debate. The first was from Mr. Jefferson's Manual, and to show the nature of a resolution, and wherein it differed from a statute. Mr. Jefferson says, of the two Houses of Congress: "Facts, principles, their own opinions and purposes, are expressed in the form of resolutions." Here, then, is the office and nature of a resolution: it is to declare a fact, or a principle, or to express an opinion or purpose of the House or Houses. In these senses innumerable resolutions have been passed by Congress, and in the third of these senses, that of expressing an opinion, the joint resolution for the better collection of the revenues was passed in 1816. It was a resolution in aid of the constitution and the hard-money statutes, and not in derogation, or repeal, of them. On the next point, that no open attack had ever been made, in the legislation of Congress, on the hard-money statutes, he would quote the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] whose speeches on this subject he had often read with satisfaction and profit. He quoted from a speech of 1816, on the bill to charter the late Bank of the United States:

"No nation had a better currency than the United States. There was no nation which had guarded its currency with more care; for the framers of the constitution, and those who enacted the early statutes on this subject, were hard-money men; they had felt, and therefore duly appreciated, the evils of a paper medium; they therefore sedulously guarded the currency of the United States from debasement. The legal currency of the United States was gold and silver coin: this was a subject in regard to which Congress had run into no folly."

This (said Mr. B.) settles the question up to 1816. It shows that up to that time Congress had run into no folly on this subject; it had passed no act to impair the constitutional currency—done nothing to derogate from the early hard-money statutes, and the hard-money clauses of the constitution. All was safe on the statute book up to 1816; and the joint resolution of that year, as he had often said, was in aid, and not in derogation, of these early statutes. The legislation since 1816 is within our own knowledge. Leaving out temporary enactments in favor of scrip, Treasury notes, &c., and the term used is always the same, or the equivalent, of what is found in the constitution. The act of 1820, for reducing the price of the public lands, directs them to be sold for "cash." The word "cash" is there used as ready money, and that the hard money of the constitution. The framers of that act were also hard-money men, for they had just got a tremendous lesson from the paper system. They had just gone through the paper agonies of the late war. Hard money, then, by our constitution, and by all our statute laws, is still on the statute book the only legal currency of the Federal Government; and now, for the first time in near fifty years, is a statute proposed to repeal all these hard-money statutes, and to make the paper of a myriad of banks, known and unknown, born and to be born, the legal currency of the Federal Government. And, at what a time is this proposition made? At the time when the country contains more specie than it ever saw before; when banks of the highest character are for checking paper money; and while that President is still alive, and in power, who has made it the pride and glory of his administration to revive and extend the gold and silver currency.

Mr. B. said, the effects of this statute would be, to make a paper government—to insure the exportation of our specie—to leave the State banks without foundations to rest upon—to produce a certain catastrophe in the whole paper system—to revive the pretensions of the United States Bank—and to fasten, for a time, the Adam Smith system upon the Federal Government and the whole Union.

Mr. B. then inquired, emphatically, what was the system of Adam Smith? and then said that Dr. Smith should answer this question himself, and that he would read the extracts from his works which would exhibit his response. This inquiry was rendered the more necessary, because, having named Dr. Smith as the founder of the paper system in England, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Rives] had thought him mistaken, and maintained the contrary. He then read the following extracts:

"The substitution of paper in the room of gold and silver money replaces a very expensive instrument of commerce with one much less costly, and sometimes equally convenient. Circulation comes to be carried on by a new wheel, which it costs less to erect and maintain than the old one. There are several different sorts of paper money; but the circulating notes of banks and bankers are the species which is best known, and which seems best adapted for this purpose. When the people of any particular country have such confidence in the fortune, probity, and prudence, of a particular banker, as to believe that he is always ready to pay, upon demand, such of his promissory notes as are likely to be presented to him, those notes come to have the same currency as gold and silver money, from the confidence that such money can at any time be had for them. A particular banker lends among his customers his own promissory notes, to the extent we shall suppose of £100,000. As these notes serve all the purposes of money, his debtors pay him the same interest as if he had lent them so much money. This interest is the source of his gain. Though some of these notes are continually coming back upon him, part of them continue to circulate for months and years together. Though he has generally in circulation, therefore, notes to the extent of £100,000, yet £20,000 in gold and silver may frequently be a sufficient provision for answering occasional demands. By this operation, therefore, £20,000 in gold and silver perform all the functions which £100,000 could otherwise have performed; £80,000 of gold and silver, therefore, can, in this manner, be spared from the circulation of the country; and if different operations of the same kind should, at the same time, be carried on by different banks and bankers, the whole circulation may thus be conducted with a fifth part only of the gold and silver which would otherwise have been requisite. Four fifths, therefore, of a full circulation of gold and silver may be exported. But though so great a quantity of gold and silver is thus sent abroad, we must not imagine that it is sent abroad for nothing, or that its proprietors make a present of it to foreign nations. They will exchange it for foreign goods of some kind or another, in order to supply the consumption either of some other foreign country, as their own."—Vol. 1, pages 434, '5, '6, '7.

"A paper money consisting in bank notes, issued by people of undoubted credit, payable upon demand without any condition, and in fact always readily paid as soon as presented, is, in every respect, equal to gold and silver money; since gold and silver money can at any time be had for it. Whatever is either bought or sold for such paper must necessarily be bought or sold as cheap as it could have been for gold and silver. The increase of paper money, it has been said, by augmenting the quantity and consequently diminishing the value of the whole currency, necessarily augments the money price of commodities. But as the quantity of gold and silver which is taken from the currency is always equal to the quantity of paper which is added to it, paper money does not necessarily increase the quantity of the whole currency."—Vol. 1, p. 490.

"The Bank of England is the greatest bank of circulation in Europe. It was incorporated, in pursuance of an act of Parliament, by a charter under the great seal, dated the 27th of July, 1694. It at that time advanced to Government £1,200,000 for an annuity of £100,000, or for an annuity of £96,000 a year interest, at the rate of 8 per cent., and £4,000 a year for the expense of management. The stability of the Bank of England is equal to that of the British Government. All that it has advanced to the Government must be lost before its creditors can sustain any loss."—Vol. 1, p. 479.

The bank has lent its whole capital, now about fourteen and a half millions sterling, to the Government; so that the Government stands security for the bank to that amount, being near seventy millions of dollars.

"Joint stock companies are well adapted to carry on the trade of banking. The constitution of joint stock companies renders them in general more tenacious of established rules than any private copartnery. Such companies, therefore, seem extremely well fitted for this trade. The principal banking companies in Europe, accordingly, are joint stock companies, many of which manage their trade very successfully, without any exclusive privilege."—Pages 146, 148, vol. 3.

"If bankers are restrained from issuing any circulating bank notes, or notes payable to the bearer, for less than a certain sum, (£5 sterling,) and if they are subjected to the obligation of an immediate and unconditional payment of such bank notes as soon as presented, their trade may, with safety to the public, be rendered, in all respects, perfectly free. The late multiplication of banking companies, in both parts of the United Kingdom, an event by which many people have been much alarmed, instead of diminishing, increases the security of the public. In general, if any branch or any division of labor be advantageous to the public, the freer and more general the competition, it will always be the more so."—Vol. 1, pages 498, '9.

This, said Mr. B., is the answer of Dr. Smith; and if it does not constitute him a paper-system man, there is certainly no virtue in language, and no power in words. He is for the Bank of England, he is for joint stock banks, he is for individual bankers, and he is for making the banking trade, on condition of issuing no notes under £5, and promising to pay them on demand, as free as any other trade in the country; and he thinks the greater the number of banks, the greater the security of the public. He is for a currency, four parts paper and one part gold; and he is in favor of exporting every four guineas out of five, and of supplying the place of the exported gold by paper money issued by the Bank of England, by joint stock companies, by individual bankers, and by any person that chooses to issue paper, and promises to pay it on demand in gold, and agrees not to issue any note below £5. This is his system; a paper system out and out, and without one mitigating feature in it except the £5 limit, which to us looks like a restriction, but was in reality an enlargement of the banking privilege; for at the time that Dr. Smith wrote, above fifty years ago, the Bank of England issued no note of less denomination than £10. This is the system of Dr. Smith; a system that has blown up in England three times in twenty-five years; which is now upon the eve of another catastrophe, and requiring and receiving the interposition of the British Government to save it; which is now in all that concerns banks of issue, except the issues of the Bank of England, condemned even by his own political school in England; and which system, brought into our country by General Hamilton, above forty years ago, maintaining a struggle with our institutions ever since, it is now proposed to fasten upon the Federal Government by law.

Mr. B. proceeded to other objections to the committee's bill. It gave the Secretary of the Treasury, in the first section, a boundless discretion to do what he thought necessary to effect the collection of the revenues in the currencies specified in the section; and it gave him, in the second section, a supervisory power and control over the receivability of all local bank paper; and it gave him, in the proviso to that section, a power to punish any deposite bank which should refuse to receive and pass, as cash, to the credit of the United States, the notes "receivable" under that act, and received in the ordinary course of its business, on general deposite. This was a power which he did not wish to see any Secretary of the Treasury possess. He did not wish to see any one vested with power to operate upon the hopes and fears of a thousand banks; nor did he wish to see a thousand banks invested with claims, and placed in a position to operate upon the hopes and fears of any Secretary. He did not wish to see the members of Congress, who possessed an interest or took an interest in local banks, marching in columns upon the Treasury Secretary, and soliciting him to admit the banks which they represented to be admitted to the favor of furnishing a national currency for the Federal Government. Such things gave a Secretary too much power over banks and members, or they might give the banks and the members too much power over him. Mr. B. was the friend of the new administration; had assisted to create it, and, of course, had confidence in it; but he objected to vesting it with this extraordinary power. He wanted law, and not executive or departmental grace or discretion, for the tenure of his rights. Wherever law could be applied, he wanted it applied. This was a case in which it could be applied. It was a case in which it was easy to apply it. It was only to let the old statutes, and the constitution, remain in force, and follow out the policy of President Jackson, and gold and silver would remain the sole currency for the receipts and expenditures of the Federal Government. Besides his objections to the power which this bill would give to the Secretary, he should be sorry personally to see any friend of his subjected to the exercise of that power. He had seen Mr. Crawford subjected to the exercise of a small part of it; and he had seen him assailed, defamed, vilified and persecuted, on account of the manner in which he had exercised that power, when he was certain that no man could act with more honesty, impartiality, and patriotism, than he had done.

Treasury Circular.

Mr. B. objected to the bill, for want of certainty in the kind of money which was to be received in the land offices. The whole question was left afloat. Nothing was fixed; nothing was stationary. What was land-office money to-day might not be so to-morrow. The orders for the reception and rejection of different paper, or the same paper, might vary from day to day. A farmer hears that the notes of a particular bank are receivable; he supplies himself with those notes, and goes to the office. When he gets there, he may meet an order to exclude them; and then be turned over to a money dealer to furnish himself with other notes, no better than those he had, but at a cost of five, ten, or fifteen per cent. to him to effect the exchange. Far better would it be for the farmers and settlers to have the permanency and uniformity of gold and silver only for land-office payments; then they would always know what they had to rely upon, and would be free from disappointments and impositions.

Mr. B. further objected to the receivability of paper money at the land offices, on account of the advantages which it gave to bankers and their favorites over the rest of the community. To a banker, or his favorite, it was pretty immaterial whether he gave a quire or a ream—a handfull, or an armfull—of his paper, for a parcel of land; and whether this paper was speckled over with figures for five dollars or fifty dollars, or five hundred dollars. It was all pretty much the same thing to him. To a farmer, however, who had to give labor, or produce, or property, for every dollar he obtained, it was quite another affair; and it was impossible for him to stand the competition with the man of quires, with his machine to impress letters and figures, for as many dollars as he pleased, on the little oblong slips of paper which constituted bank notes. It was a shame in the Government to put the farmer in competition with such wholesale manufacturers of paper dollars.

Mr. B. further objected to this bill, because its tendency was to inundate the new States with strange and unknown bank paper. In the new States, whatever was land-office money was current money. It was current, not only at the land office, but in every place, and all over the State. It was a Government endorsement, which gave credit to the whole issue of the bank. Taking advantage of this, it was quite usual for enterprising banks to get their paper made receivable in the land offices; then go to the new States, and lay out immense quantities of it in the purchase of produce, or property; and then leave it to be shaved out of the hands of the people when it ceased to be land-office money, or when specie was wanted for it.

Finally, Mr. B. objected, totally, to the idea of continuing to receive paper money for the dues of the Federal Government. This bill was intended to be a permanent law; there was no limitation of time in it. It was intended to continue paper money forever as the currency of the Federal Government. There was no longer any plea of necessity to justify such a gross departure from the constitution. It is not now as it was in 1816, when the joint resolution of that year was passed. Then there was less specie in the country than ever was known; now there is more than ever was known. The joint resolution of 1816 was a great advance upon the existing state of things at that time; the same resolution would be a retrograde movement, and a great falling back, at the present day. We have now near eighty millions of specie. The Secretary of the Treasury computed it at seventy-three millions two months ago, and it has been increasing ever since. A New Orleans paper computes it at eighty millions. Say the amount is seventy-five millions; that sum is far beyond any possible demand that the collection of the revenues in specie could create. On this point, Mr. B. spoke with data in his hand, and could demonstrate and prove up what he said. He had two different data to go upon, either of which would be sufficient, and both of which, together, would be conclusive. First, as to the amount of money which it requires to effect a given amount of payments in transacting the business of the country. Every body knows that it does not require an amount of money equal to the whole amount of annual payments, to make those payments. This might be the case if every creditor ate all the money which he received; but as he does not eat it, but pays it over to somebody else, it follows that the same piece of money performs many payments in the course of the year; and, consequently, that a sum far below the amount of annual payments will be sufficient to effect all those payments. A proportionate supply, then, is all that is wanted; and that proportion is fixed by political economists at the one tenth. Thus, annual payments to the amount of ten millions may be effected by means of one million; and so on in the same proportion, for any amount. Upon this data it would require but a small part of our seventy odd millions to effect all the annual payments to the Federal Government. Then, try another data. Take the experience of the Bank of the United States. During the time that that bank was the fiscal agent of the Government, nothing was received by the Federal Government but its own notes and silver, for there was then no gold in circulation. The amount of United States Bank notes in circulation, though pushed up a few times to twenty odd millions, were generally below twenty; but take that for the average, and add the silver, which was computed in 1832, by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] in the debate on the renewal of the bank charter, at from twenty to twenty-two millions; put these two sums together, and you have about forty millions, or little more than half the gold and silver now in the country. Here, again, the result is satisfactory, and shows that we have more than enough for this purpose. But there is still a third way to arrive at the same result. It is by looking to the actual amount that will be required for the great sources of Government demand—lands, customs, and Post Office. The lands, whether sales are restricted to settlers, or limited to hard-money payments, which would itself be a restriction of sales to settlers, it is certain not more than five or six millions of dollars' worth would be sold; and, as the Government would not eat these five or six millions, but pay them back as fast as received, it would follow that a part only of it would be sufficient to make the whole payment. Then, as to the customs: they may amount to about twenty millions, but would, in reality, require but little specie; for the payments through the customs are seldom made by counting money, but by a transfer of credit on the books of a bank. An order to pay the customs in hard money would make very little difference in the payments as now made. This, every merchant and business man fully understands. Next, as to the Post Office; here the receipts are upwards of four millions per annum; but the Postmaster General does not eat the money, but pays it out immediately, and sends it back into the mass of circulation, in payment for services rendered to the Department by contractors, agents, deputy postmasters, &c., who immediately disburse it among the community.

Finally, Mr. B. had positive proof that, so far as the lands were concerned, and that was the main point, there was specie enough to answer the demand. He would read a letter from the chief clerk in a land office which is selling more land than any office in the Union, and which would be conclusive on the wisdom, justice, and necessity, of the Treasury circular. It came to him yesterday, unsolicited by him, and was delivered through the hands of the Senator from Michigan who sits farthest on the other side of the chamber, [Mr. LEX,] and who, as well as his colleague, [Mr. NORVELL,] he rejoiced to see in the seats to which they had been so long entitled, and from which they had been so long debarred. He rejoiced that Michigan was at last released from the position of a stranger at the gate, cooling her heels at the door of the Capitol, while she had a right to a place within it. As a Missourian, he could feel keenly for her; for it was the fortune of Missouri to have to wait, and cool her heels, in the same manner, for a whole winter, before she could be admitted. Mr. B. then read the following extract from the letter:

[EXTRACT.]

"I am chief clerk in the land office at Kalamazoo, where land, during the year 1836, has been sold to the amount of $2,050,000, being one tenth of the aggregate sales of all the land offices in the United States—sixty-four, I believe, in number. The great business done at this office has afforded signal opportunities for observation as to the expediency and consequences of the Treasury circular. We are all convinced of the wisdom of the measure, and it is but just that we should endeavor to sustain its propriety by our testimony.

"The public lands were fast falling into the hands of speculating bankers. We have seen a president of one of the banks in Massachusetts visit Kalamazoo with blank notes in the sheet; and we have seen that same president lay his monopolizing grasp on miles of the public domain, for which those blanks, filled up at his leisure, were taken as equivalent. This instance was merely e pluribus. This wholesale speculation has been estopped by the specie circular. The land is sought after with the same avidity since as before the issue of that order, but by a very different set of purchasers. The actual cultivators of the soil are now selecting farms, which, so soon as entered, they begin to clear, fence, and improve. I am writing this on the 10th of January, 1837; and, at this very time, the office is thronged with hard-handed yeomen from the far East, who have come to settle amongst us in the far West. Nine tenths of the lots now entered are for those who intend to work them; and the 'accustomed' faces of land speculators, which continually haunted the office, have vanished. It is not my business, when so many sagacious statesmen are cogitating it, to offer any opinion as to the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the specie circular, but I merely venture to set forth its consequences, as daily exhibited to our eyes.

"REGISTER'S OFFICE,
Kalamazoo, Mich., Jan. 10, 1837.

Mr. B. said this letter had been written nearly a month after the order had gone into effect for the total exclusion of paper money from the land offices. It annihilated all the speeches against that order, made and to be made on this floor. It vindicated the Treasury order in all its practical bearings, and under all its practical aspects. He wished to have had answers from all the land offices on these points; and the Senate, at his motion, had instructed the Committee on Public Lands to address to them the proper interrogatories. The committee chose to report a bill without seeking the information. They did more; they chose to send to a committee, of which he was a member, the same motion for interrogatories, after they had reported. This might look like a good joke. It was like saying, "We will report the bill, and pass it, and he may carry on the examinations afterwards;" a sort of ex post facto or post mortem examination not common in legislation. Very well, said Mr. B. The examinations will go on; and although the proofs will not be here in time to prevent the passage of this bill, yet they may come in time to convince the country that it ought never to have been passed! Mr. B. returned to the amount of specie in the country, and its sufficiency to meet the collections of the Federal Government. He said it was more than sufficient, far more. Put all the collections together, lands, customs, and Post Office, and the whole will not amount to one half of the specie in the country. Where, then, is the pretext for saying there is not specie enough for the receipts and expenditures of the Federal Government? The fact is that this Government will not require enough to exercise a sufficient influence over the moneyed system of the Union. Auxiliary means, as the suppression of notes under twenty dollars through the deposite banks, a supervision over the amount of their specie, and prompt settlements with all the banks whose notes they take, will have to be resorted to. The federal collections alone will not be sufficient; and in this the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] was perfectly right, a few days ago, when he took this very point as an objection to the ability of the Federal Government to regulate the currency through its collections of revenue. He was right in the objection, and Mr. Gallatin, who made it before him, was right in the same objection! Specie collections alone will not be sufficient; but they will do a great deal towards it, and, with the aid of auxiliary measures, will accomplish it. Let it not be forgotten that the whole skill and the whole power of the Bank of the United States, in her boasted services of regulating the local banks, were limited to two simple and obvious measures: first, to receive the notes of no bank in payment of federal dues, unless it was situated in the same town or city which contained her branch; second, to return the notes of all the local banks which she received, for immediate settlement and payment. This is what the Bank of the United States did. Let us also exclude local paper, require prompt settlements between our deposit banks and other banks, enforce the provision in the deposit act, which is a supervision over the amount of specie in the deposit banks, and suppress notes under twenty dollars.

Mr. B. said now was the time for the Government to act as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] urged it to act in 1816. This was his language at that time:

"If Congress were to pass forty statutes on the subject, he said, they would not make the law more conclusive than it now was, that nothing should be received in payment of duties to the Government but specie; and yet no regard was paid to the imperative injunctions of the law in this respect. The whole strength of the Government, he was of opinion, ought to be put forth to compel the payment of the duties and taxes to the Government in the legal currency of the country."

Mr. B. was free to declare that he concurred fully in the sentiments just quoted, that forty statutes could not make the law in favor of specie payments stronger than it was, and that the whole power of the Government ought to be exerted, to compel the collection of the revenues in the constitutional currency. The commencement of operations by the three new branch mints was the latest moment, in his opinion, at which universal hard-money payments to and from the Federal Government ought to be delayed. He concurred in the sentiments quoted, and would now quote other sentiments delivered by the same gentleman, at the same time, and, without fully concurring in them, he would claim the advantage of them on this occasion, when the whole tenor of the bill before us, and especially the proviso, goes to change this Federal Government from a hard-money to a paper-money Government, and to surrender the federal Treasury to the general reception of State and local bank notes.

"Congress can alone coin money; Congress can alone fix the value of foreign coins. No State can coin money; no State can fix the value of foreign coins; no State, not even Congress itself, can make any thing a tender but gold and silver in the payment of debts; no State can emit bills of credit. The exclusive power of regulating the metallic currency of the country would seem to imply, or, more properly, to include, as part of itself, a power to decide how far that currency should be exclusive, how far any substitute should interfere with it, and what that substitute should be. The generality and extent of the power granted to Congress, and the clear and well-defined prohibitions on the States, leave little doubt of an intent to rescue the whole subject of currency from the hands of local legislation, and to confer it on the General Government. But, notwithstanding this apparent purpose in the constitution, the truth is that the currency of the country is now, to a very great extent, practically and effectually, under the control of the several State Governments; if it be not more correct to say that it is under the control of the banking institutions created by the States; for the States seem first to have taken possession of the power, and then to have delegated it. Whether the States can constitutionally exercise this power, or delegate it to others, is a point which I do not intend, at present, either to concede or to argue. It is much to be hoped that no controversy on the point may ever become necessary."

Mr. B. quoted these sentiments for the purpose of invoking the aid of their author in rescuing the currency of the federal constitution from the control which this bill, and especially the proviso to the second section, gives to the banking institutions of the several States over it, a control which will enable them to expel that currency from the country, and to enthrone their own in its place.

Mr. B. said that this bill, though in its terms a general measure, and professing to act only on coming events, yet was, in reality, a measure rescinding the Treasury order of July last; and, as such, was greeted and saluted by the friends of the rescision on this floor. They openly celebrate the advent of the bill as the triumph of their movement, and announce its passage as a welcome victory. This may be. They may carry the bill, but they cannot carry the argument. They may rescind the order, but they cannot verify Mr. Biddle's prediction of the distress it was to create, nor invalidate President Jackson's statement of the good it had produced. In the month of November, Mr. Biddle predicted a world of wo—all to take place by the time that Congress met, and all to result from the Treasury order, and the manner of executing the deposit act—"intense pecuniary distress; derangement of exchanges; loss of confidence; destruction of the public prosperity; scarcity of money; fall of prices; ruin of the currency;" and he averred that the instant repeal of the Treasury order, under the command of Congress, if the Secretary would not do it voluntarily, would restore confidence in twenty-four hours, and put an end to all this mass of wo in twenty-four days. On the other hand, the President informed us, in his annual message, that the same Treasury order had produced many salutary consequences. He says it has checked the career of the Western banks, and given them additional strength to meet approaching difficulties; that it has cut off the means of speculation in the public lands; that it has saved the new States from the evils of a non-resident proprietorship; that it has kept open the public lands to the entry of cultivators, and saved them from competition with those who are favored with bank facilities; that it has caused gold and silver to flow into the new States, and placed the business of the whole country on a safer and more solid basis. This is the representation of the President; and which is the true picture? his statement, or Mr. Biddle's prediction? Surely the state of the country will answer the question! Certainly the personal knowledge of every individual will enable him to answer it! The whole prediction for the panic and pressure has failed! the edict for the distress has failed! It was to no purpose that the distress was commenced at several places; that many presses, and several speakers on this floor, announced and proclaimed it. The seventy odd millions of hard money which had been brought into the country was death to the operation; and, after a few vain efforts to renew the scenes of 1833, after a few abortive demonstrations to alarm the public, the whole contrivance was abandoned, or, rather, the performance was postponed; for it is never to be forgotten that panic and pressure is part of the permanent system of the denationalized national bank, and will be brought to bear, whenever opportunity will permit, until it shall be proved to the people that they cannot live without a national bank. The edict for the distress, then, has failed; and the failure of that scheme is itself the proof of the truth of President Jackson's statement of the good effects of the order. That order has been attended by every good effect which he has mentioned, and this is universally known in the West, and is proved negatively by the total absence of all complaint from that quarter. Nobody in the new States complains to us; no one in the new States sends here to demand the rescision of the order. That demand comes from Philadelphia, where there are no public lands; from Kentucky, where there are none; from Ohio, where there are next to none; and from members on this floor, who are backed by no memorials from home. The letter from the clerk in the land office at Kalamazoo covers the whole ground, and proves the wisdom, the beneficence, and the necessity, of that order. The diminution of the sales after the issuing of the order is a further proof to the same effect. Before the sales, that is to say, in the months of May and June, two months in which the amount of sales should have been least, they amounted to the sum of six millions and a quarter; the months of October and November, the two months in which the sales should have been greatest, the amount was three millions one hundred thousand. The month of December, though the returns are not complete, shows a still further decline; and if gentlemen had patience to wait for the returns of January, the first month in which the order had full effect, they would, no doubt, find it bringing down the sales to a moderate amount, and effecting a diminution of income, from that source of revenue, to as small a degree as could be desired, and in a manner the most simple, the most regular, the most effectual, and the most satisfactory that can be devised by the wit of man.

Every good consequence stated by the President had resulted from the operation of the order; and the evidence of this was too public and notorious to require illustration, or to admit of enumeration. But there was one point of his statement which was an exception to this remark, and on which it would be profitable to go into some detail; for it concerned not only the lands, but the far more important subject of the currency itself; he alluded to that part of the President's message in which he stated that this order had checked the career of the Western banks, and compelled them to strengthen themselves against the revulsions consequent upon every expansion of the bank issues. This was true to a degree of which no one had a conception but those who had access to a knowledge of the condition of all the banks, and who availed themselves of that right of access to examine into the condition of these banks, and to compare that condition with the approved principles of what is considered safe and sound banking.

Mr. B. said that, among those things which were considered as settled in the science and mystery of banking, there was one principle which required the immediate means of the bank to bear a certain proportion to its immediate liabilities; below which proportion it was not safe for the bank to descend. The immediate means of the bank are its specie on hand; its immediate liabilities are the circulation and the deposits; and the proportion which these ought to bear to each other has been fixed, at the Bank of England, after an experience of one hundred and forty years, at the one third. Mr. B. deemed the verification of this principle so material that it deserved to be proved as well as stated. He would therefore produce the sworn testimony on this point taken before Lord Althorp's committee in 1832, and should confine himself to the evidence of the governor of the bank and one of its directors. The testimony of Mr. Horsley Palmer, the governor of the bank, is this: "The average proportion, as already observed, of coin and bullion which the bank thinks it prudent to keep on hand, is at the rate of a third of the total amount of all her liabilities, including deposits as well as issues." Mr. George Ward Noeman, a director of the bank, states the same thing in a different form of words. He says: "For a full state of the circulation and the deposits, say twenty-one millions of notes and six millions of deposits, making in the whole twenty-seven millions of liabilities, the proper sum in coin and bullion for the bank to retain is nine millions." Thus, the average proportion of one third between the specie on hand and the circulation and deposits, must be considered as an established principle at that bank, which is quite the largest, and amongst the oldest in the world. It might be well also to remark that the same proportion, very nearly, prevailed in the Bank of the United States at the time of the removal of the deposits in October, 1833; it was, of specie on hand, $10,663,441; of circulation and deposits, $37,105,465; being at the rate of between one third and one fourth of specie in hand for immediate liabilities. The proportion of about one third being then established as the principle of safety in banking, let us apply that principle to some of our Western deposit banks in July last, to see what was their condition at that time; and in November, to see whether that condition was improved, as stated by the President.

Mr. B. said such was the condition of some of the Western deposit banks in July last, and such their condition in November; very far below the Bank of England standard at both periods, but greatly improved by the operation of the specie order, and doubtless much more improved by its continued operation to this time. There were many others of these banks also falling far below the Bank of England standard in July and November, and still below it. Mr. B. was ready to admit, what every business man must understand, that all these banks have a list of debts, and of bills of exchange, falling due from day to day, and amounting in the aggregate to more than all their liabilities; but he must be permitted to remark, that the Bank of England also has her list of debtors, and that nearly the whole of these debtors are in the city of London, within thirty minutes' run of the bank; that she is situated in the moneyed metropolis of the universe; that she is supported by the richest and most numerous body of merchants upon the earth, and backed by the whole power of the British Government, which stands her security for seventy millions of dollars, and lends her exchequer bills to the amount of millions, and increases their interest to facilitate their sale when necessary; and that, with all these resources, such as no bank in our America can pretend to, she yet deems it necessary to have always on hand, in coin and bullion, the one third of the amount of her circulation and deposits. What, then, must be thought of the condition of some of the banks referred to, and others which might be referred to, in July last? Instead of one third specie in hand to meet their immediate liabilities, the actual proportion in hand was the one twentieth, the one thirtieth, the one fortieth, and the one fiftieth! Mr. B. said it was beyond all human doubt, that if the Treasury order had not been issued, that the Western deposit banks would have exploded in the course of the last fall, and that we should now have been sitting here amidst the wrecks of the paper system. That order prevented this catastrophe; and it is precisely because it did prevent it, that it has excited the rage of Mr. Biddle, and of the whole political party imbodyed under the oriflamme of the denationalized national bank. It balked their present hopes of reascension to power through the ruin of the finances; and in their rage for this disappointment, they denounce the President for a violation of the laws and constitution; they charge him with ruining the country; they attempt a new panic and pressure; and they call upon Congress to repeal the order.

Mr. B. said it was curious, and at the same time instructive, to observe the change which had come over the whole United States Bank party in speaking of the local banks, and especially of the deposit banks. At the veto session of 1832, they were considered unfit to be trusted with the custody of the public moneys, or to furnish any currency; at the panic session of 1833-'34, they were stigmatized with every opprobrious epithet, and all the public money was given up as lost that ever entered their vaults; now, at the expunging session, all this is changed, and nothing so kind and coaxing as the manner in which these former scorners now speak of the late despised pets. They absolutely seem to love them! and this great change, now observable to all on this floor, seems to have taken its start in that famous Philadelphia letter, of which repeated mention has so frequently been made. This is the part of the letter which gives the signal for this new change:

"The Bank of the United States has not ceased to exist more than seven months, and already the whole currency and exchanges are running into inextricable confusion, and the industry of the country is burdened with extravagant charges on all the commercial intercourse of the Union. And now, when these banks have been created by the Executive, and urged into these excesses, instead of gentle and gradual remedies, a fierce crusade is raised against them, the funds are harshly and suddenly taken from them, and they are forced to extraordinary means of defence against the very power which brought them into being. They received, and were expected to receive, in payment for the Government, the notes of each other and the notes of other banks, and the facility with which they did so was a ground of special commendation by the Government; and now that Government has let loose upon them a demand for specie to the whole amount of these notes. I go further. There is an outcry abroad, raised by faction, and echoed by folly, against the banks of the United States. Until it was disturbed by the Government, the banking system of the United States was at least as good as that of any other commercial country. What was desired for its perfection was precisely what I have so long striven to accomplish—to widen the metallic basis of the currency by a greater infusion of coin into the smaller channels of circulation. This was in a gradual and judicious train of accomplishment. But this miserable foolery about an exclusively metallic currency is quite as absurd as to discard the steamboats, and go back to poling up the Mississippi."

Mr. B. said that the views and sentiments disclosed in this extract were of great moment, and ought to be carefully considered by all whose duty it is, here or elsewhere, to legislate, or to act, upon the subject of the currency. The design is here disclosed to stir up the local banks against the Federal Government, to make alliance with them, and to force the Government to receive their paper in payment of all federal dues. This is the design disclosed; and with what motive? Certainly to ruin the finances of the Federal Government! Certainly to compel the administrations of General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren to repeat the fatal error of Mr. Madison's administration, that of undertaking to make a national currency out of local bank notes. Warned by that fatal error of those who put down the first national bank, those who put down the second one determined to avoid it, and for that purpose to re-establish for the Federal Government the currency of the constitution. When this design was announced, our opponents treated it with derision. They said it could not be done; that a gold and silver currency could not be revived. They ridiculed the attempt; but what is the answer which four years has given to their ridicule? It is the actual revival of the gold currency, of which near twenty millions of dollars are now in the country; it is in the actual increase of our specie from twenty or twenty-two millions, as computed by the President of the Bank of the United States himself when the charter for that institution was applied for in 1832, to near eighty millions, which it is now known to be. The experiment of getting the gold and silver into the country has succeeded; ridicule has failed of its office. The gold and silver is here, enough, and more than enough, to make all the payments to and from the Federal Government. Ridicule will no longer answer; stronger measures must be resorted to, and legislation has become indispensable to the overthrow of the constitutional currency. To prevent the specie in the country from being used, is now the design; and, to accomplish that purpose, it becomes necessary to force the local paper of the States upon the Federal Government. The passage of this bill is indispensable to the success of Mr. Biddle's design, disclosed in the letter from which an extract had been read. He wants the question made between a national currency of United States Bank notes, and a national currency of local bank notes. He knows that between these two the United States Bank notes will prevail; that they will conquer, that they will whip, yes, whip like a dog, your national currency of local bank notes. We, on the other hand, want the question made between paper and gold, knowing that the country will sustain gold against paper; and these are the questions which are now to be decided by this bill. This bill will make the question in the form wished by the friends of the Bank of the United States, and will insure them the triumph to which they look for the re-establishment of the Bank of the United States and restoration of its political friends to power. Mr. B. appealed to gentlemen on the other side of the House to rise above the character of partisans, and to act as patriots on this occasion. He and they had always agreed in condemning local bank notes as a national currency; and why not agree together in their votes now in rejecting them. He knew that, as a party, their interest led them to the support of this bill; as patriots, and according to their declared principles, their duty led them to oppose it. He beseeched them to follow up their principles, so often declared on this floor, and to reject the bill which elevated into a national currency the kind of paper which they have so long, so publicly, and, in his opinion, so justly condemned. He besought and obtested them to join him, but, he feared, in vain. There is an ominous silence in their ranks upon the condition of our deposit banks. At the last session, when that condition was so much better than at this, there was a perpetual assault upon them. Then, when the average proportion of specie to their circulation and deposits was as one to seven or eight, then this proportion was constantly pointed out; now, when it is so much greater, not a word is said; now, when the President has attempted to improve their condition, he is assailed as he was at the panic session, and as great efforts made to compel the repeal of the Treasury order as there then was to compel the restoration of the deposits. Mr. B. said the objection to the inadequacy of the specie supplies in the deposit banks was no new objection with him. He had made it at the last session, and, with the leave of the Senate, would refer to some passages on this point in the speech which he then made in opposition to the deposit bill—that bill against which it was his pride to speak and to vote, though he spoke and voted in a small minority of some half dozen Senators. The following are the passages referred to:

"The other part of the deposit bill proper, to which I object, is the want of a clause requiring the deposit banks to keep on hand a certain amount of specie, bearing some reasonable, average, fixed proportion to their immediate liabilities. The bill was drawn with such a clause; but it was the will of the majority to strike it out, and to substitute the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury for the time being for the proposed legal enactment. The proportion of specie on hand, in the several deposit banks, is now to be whatever may be satisfactory to the officer at the head of the Treasury. To this I object; because, without reference to the opinions of any Secretary, I hold it to be a case in which the inflexible rule of law; and not the variable dictate of individual discretion, should prevail. It concerns the currency of the country, and law should govern the currency. It is a case in which discretion is subordinate to systems, as well as to personal temperament. A hard-money Secretary would require a heavy proportion of specie; a paper-system Secretary would be content with a very light proportion. Besides, some of the deposit banks need regulation upon this point at present. Some of them are far in arrear of what would be deemed a safe proportion of specie, and threatening the Treasury with another edition of 'unavailable funds.' As a whole, they are far behind the point of specie responsibility at which the Bank of the United States stood at the time of the removal of the deposits, though some are up to that mark, or above it; but, as a whole, (and it is in that point of view that the public is concerned,) they are far behind it. On the 1st day of October, 1835, when the deposits were removed, the immediate liabilities of the United States Bank, in public and private deposits, and in its circulation, was $37,105,465, and the specie on hand was $10,663,441; being at the rate of more than one to four.

"At the close of the last month, which is the date of the latest returns of the deposit banks, their immediate liabilities in the same items—public and private deposits, and circulation—was $84,401,880, and the gold and silver on hand was $10,202,245; being at the rate of less than one to eight. This certainly is a progress in the wrong direction for us, who have undertaken to strengthen the gold and silver foundations of the currency. It is travelling on the wrong end of the road, and that rather fast. The rejection from the bill of the clause which was intended to hold the deposit banks up to the possession of a certain fixed proportion of specie looks like an abandonment of our hard-money professions, and a relapsing tendency into the wide and bottomless ocean of paper. It is certainly a great decline from the doctrines of President Jackson's message of December last—those doctrines which were then hailed with approbation by an immense majority of the American people, and received as landmarks in the whole democratic camp, and in which the President expressly treated the regulation of the deposits as the regulation of the currency, and looked to the increased circulation of gold and silver, and the suppression of all bank notes under twenty dollars, as two of the great results which were to flow from the connexion of the federal Treasury with the local banks, and the consequent influence of the Government over the currency. Hear his words:

"'Connected with the condition of the finances and the flourishing state of the country in all its branches of industry, it is pleasing to witness the advantages which have already been derived from the recent laws regulating the value of the gold coinage. These advantages will be more apparent in the course of the next year, when the branch mints authorized to be established in North Carolina, Georgia, and Louisiana, shall have gone into operation. Aided, as it is hoped they will be, by further reforms in the banking systems of the States, and by judicious regulations on the part of Congress, in relation to the custody of the public moneys, it may be confidently anticipated that the use of gold and silver as a circulating medium will become general in the ordinary transactions connected with the labor of the country. The great desideratum in modern times is an efficient check upon the power of the banks, preventing that excessive issue of paper whence arise those fluctuations in the standard of value which render uncertain the rewards of labor.' * * * 'It has been seen that, without the agency of a great moneyed monopoly, the revenue can be collected and conveniently and safely applied to all the purposes of the public expenditure. It is also ascertained that instead of being necessarily made to promote the evils of an unchecked paper system, the management of the revenue can be made auxiliary to the reform which the Legislatures of several of the States have already commenced in regard to the suppression of small bills and which has only to be fostered by proper regulations on the part of Congress to secure a practical return, to the extent required for the security of the currency, to the constitutional medium.'

"'The collection and custody being a source of credit to them, will increase the security which the States provide for a faithful execution of their trusts, by multiplying the scrutinies to which their operations and accounts will be subjected. Thus disposed, as well from interest as the obligations of their charters, it cannot be doubted that such conditions as Congress may see fit to adopt respecting the deposits in these institutions, with a view to the gradual disuse of the small bills, will be cheerfully complied with; and that we shall soon gain, in place of the Bank of the United States, a practical reform of the whole paper system of the country. If by this policy we can ultimately witness the suppression of all bank bills below twenty dollars, it is apparent that gold and silver will take their place, and become the principal circulating medium in the common business of the country. The attainment of such a result will form an era in the history of our country, which will be dwelt upon with delight by every true friend of its liberty and independence. It will lighten the great tax which our paper system has so long collected from the earnings of labor, and do more to revive and perpetuate those habits of economy and simplicity, which are so congenial to the character of republicans, than all the legislation which has yet been attempted.'

"The rejection of the clause referred to, continued Mr. B., has lost the advantages so confidently looked to by the President in this wise and patriotic message. Nothing is done in this deposit bill to fulfil his enlightened and noble views; nothing to enlarge and extend the specie basis; nothing to promote the diffusion of gold; nothing to effect the suppression of notes under twenty dollars; nothing to check the paper system; nothing to regulate the currency; on the contrary, we have a virtual abandonment of all control over the moneyed system, and a virtual surrender of the constitutional power and the constitutional duty of Congress over the currency to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the private and interested arrangements of the deposit banks."

Mr. B. said these were his sentiments delivered eight months ago, and all subsequent events confirmed him in their correctness? Some of our deposit banks have got into far worse condition since that time; many of them were running a wild and mad career, when the Treasury circular checked their course. There are many whose condition is good, having a large amount of specie; several above half a million; some above a million; one a million and a half. On the other hand, there are some whose specie demonstration makes, indeed, a sorry figure; there were above a dozen of them whose specie, even in November, ranged downwards through a regular and gradual descent, from the small sum of twenty-five thousand dollars, to the far smaller sum of two thousand five hundred and ninety-six dollars and ninety-two cents! The Treasury order was intended to improve this condition of things, and has improved them; and if let alone, or, still better, if specie payments are made universal in all the receipts and disbursements of the Federal Government, they will go on to improve, and may be able to ride out the storm which every discerning mind must see ahead.

Mr. B. thought not only the condition of many of the deposit banks needed improvement, but that the deposit act itself needed amendment. He was for limiting the deposits to banks of strength and character; such as kept, at least, average supplies of a quarter of a million of specie; he was for prescribing the conditions proposed by the President of the Manhattan Bank, for the suppression of notes under twenty dollars; he was in favor of fixing the proportion between their specie on hand and their liabilities in circulation and deposits, and fixing it at the proportion required at the Bank of England; he was for requiring from them weekly settlements, at least, with all the banks whose paper they received, and the prompt liquidation of all balances in specie, and a part payment of all demands in gold. In return for these requisitions, he would be willing to be as liberal as the public interest would admit, and to remit the interest which was now exacted on deposits.

Mr. B. said a question had been raised on this floor as to the honor of originating the first movements against the small-note currency; and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] who had moved that question here, had claimed it for the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER] and this was in conformity to Mr. Biddle's letter of November last, who claimed the same honor for the Bank of the United States and its friends. Mr. B. should never have thought it worth the time of the Senate to examine into the paternity of this little honor; he had not, in his former speech, stopped the current of debate to examine into the justice of the same claim, as set up by the President of the Bank of the United States; but since the question had been raised on this floor, it might be as well to devote a moment to the settlement of the affair, according to the right of the case and the evidence of the record. Suum cuique tribuito—let every one have his own—was a fair maxim at all times, and might find a fair occasion for its application at the present time. He remembered the whole history of the movements against the small-note currency, and in looking over the journals of the Senate and the Register of Debates, he found his recollection confirmed in every particular. The first speech made in the Senate upon the subject was made by himself; it was on the 20th of January, 1832, and on his resolution to suppress the issue of the branch bank drafts issued by the branches of the Bank of the United States. Among other objections to those drafts were these: that they were mostly issued for small sums, five and ten dollars, and thus usurped the place of gold and silver, which was carried off from the States to Philadelphia, and thence exported to foreign countries; and also that they filled the country with counterfeits; the five and ten dollar drafts being those which offered the greatest inducements for counterfeiting. The next speech upon the subject was by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] on the 24th of May of the same year, (1832,) on the bill to recharter the Bank of the United States, in which he spoke at large, and much to the gratification of him, (Mr. B.,) against the evils of a small-note currency, and on the necessity of suppressing it, in order to increase the amount of the specie circulation. So much for speeches: now for motions. Gales & Seaton's Register for the session 1831-'2 shows that on Saturday, the 26th of May, of that session, Mr. BENTON (then opposing the recharter of the Bank of the United States) read fourteen amendments at one time, the thirteenth of which ran in these words: "To issue no note of a less denomination than twenty dollars, nor to receive or pay out a State bank note of less amount!" The same Register shows that two days thereafter, namely, on Monday, the 28th of the same month of May, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] moved two amendments to the bill rechartering the bank, the second of which was in these words: "That it should not be lawful for the bank, after the 4th of March, 1836, to issue any notes of a less denomination than ——— dollars."

The Register then goes on:

"Mr. Webster said a few words in defence of his second amendment, which imposed no restriction until after the expiration of the present charter. The effect of his proposition would be to introduce more specie into circulation, and to banish the small notes, with which the country is inundated. He moved to fill the blank with ten dollars; but expressed his willingness to vote for a higher restriction, if any Senator should move it.

"Mr. Benton would propose twenty dollars. He wished the basis of circulation throughout the country to be in hard money. Farmers, laborers, and market people, ought to receive their payments in hard money. They ought not to be put to the risk of receiving bank notes in all their small dealings. They are no judges of good or bad notes. Counterfeits are sure to fall upon their hands; and the whole business of counterfeiting was mainly directed to such notes as they handle—those under twenty dollars."

Mr. B. said the Register further showed that Messrs. Foot, Smith of Maryland, Clay, and Chambers, expressed their sentiments on the proposition, and against the twenty-dollar limit; but that, on taking the question, the blank was filled with twenty dollars, and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, thus shaped, was concurred in. Mr. B. said it was apparent, from this history of the first attempt made in the Senate to introduce the twenty-dollar limit on the minimum issues of banks, that he himself was the mover of it; but he was free to say that, without the aid of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] the limit would not have been introduced. He remembered the gentleman's speech very well, and his quotation from Mr. Canning, and could repeat the whole now from memory; much more fully and correctly than he now found it in the Register. So far so good, said Mr. B. The Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Massachusetts were for once found together in a vote which concerned the Bank of the United States; but they did not long remain together! It was in quasi committee that the twenty-dollar limit was proposed and adopted. When the amendment came to be considered in the Senate, the Senator from Massachusetts dissented! and the prohibition to issue notes below twenty dollars was diluted into an authority, reserved by Congress, to impose a restriction to that effect, after the 31 day of March, in the year 1836! and thus it now stands on the journal of the Senate, in the bill of recharter vetoed by the President! The restriction voted on the 28th of May was, a few days thereafter, metamorphosed into a reservation of authority to impose a future restriction—a change which Mr. B. considered as defeat and mockery—for he knew full well that wherever a bank was strong enough beforehand to prevent a limitation upon its issues from being prescribed as a condition, it will be sure to be strong enough, after it gets the charter, to prevent the same limitation from being imposed as a restriction.

Mr. B. had thus corrected the error of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] in claiming the paternity of the first movement for the twenty-dollar limit on the floor. In the correction of that error, he had to exhibit himself as the author of the movement; but he attached but little consequence to priority of movement on such a subject, or on any subject. It was the gift of continuance which he valued. It was the faculty of holding on which he loved. It was the Cynegiras stick-to-it which he admired; that sticking to it which lays hold with the right hand, and when that is cut off, lays hold with the left; and when that is cut off, lays hold with the teeth, and hangs on by the teeth until the head is cut off. This is what he called the gift of continuance, and which he valued above all gifts. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WENDELL] did not seem to have been endowed with this gift in respect to this twenty-dollar limit. His speech, indeed, was good; his first vote was good; but his second was bad, for it nullified the first; and his speech had never been backed by another. On the other hand, he (Mr. B.) must be allowed to say that he had himself shown a little of the Cynegiras blood in relation to this limit. He began it five years ago, and had been sticking to it ever since. In Congress and out of Congress, in season and out of season, he had been still harping upon these small notes. Not to worry the Senate with tedious recitals, and yet to vindicate his adhesion, and to make good, at least, a continued claim to this work, he would refer to a few of the evidences which attested the fidelity of his exertions to accomplish this object. Mr. B. then read from the Senate journal, as follows:

"Wednesday, April 9, 1834, the following motion, submitted by Mr. Benton, was considered:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of the Senate, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to consider and report to the Senate and to the House, respectively, what alterations, if any, are necessary to be made:

"1. In the value of the gold coined at the mint of the United States, so as to check the exportation of that coin, and to restore it to circulation in the United States.

"2. In the laws relative to foreign coins, so as to restore the gold and silver coin of foreign nations to their former circulation within the United States.

"3. In the joint resolution of 1816, (for the better collection of the revenues,) so as to exclude all bank notes under twenty dollars from revenue payments after a given period, and to make the revenue system of the United States instrumental in the gradual suppression of the small-note circulation, and the introduction of gold and silver for the common currency of the country.

"On motion of Mr. King of Alabama,

"Ordered, That the said resolution be laid on the table."

Mr. B. also read from the journal of the same session a resolution submitted by him, as follows: "That the President of the United States be requested to cause inquiries to be made of the deposite banks, and of other banks of good credit, to ascertain when any of said banks, in consideration of being made or continued depositories of the public money, will agree to enter into arrangements to discontinue the use and circulation of all paper currency of less denomination than twenty dollars; and, also, to promote the circulation of gold, by paying all the currency issued by it in gold and silver; the proportion of each at present according to the best ability of the bank, and eventually one half of each, the demander to have the option of one half of either metal, and the bank the other half." Laid on the table, on the motion of Mr. Mangum.

He also read from the journal of the session of 1835-'6 a set of instructions for amending the charters for the banks in the District of Columbia, of which the fourth instruction was this: "The banks to issue no notes of less denomination than twenty dollars; and all notes below that denomination, issued by other banks, to be prohibited from circulation within the District;" which was rejected by the Senate—10 yeas, 28 nays. He also referred to the twenty-dollar limit on payments from the Government, which he moved at the last session, and which, in a modified form, was adopted; and he referred to a bill which he had introduced at the last session of Congress, "to re-establish the currency of the constitution for the Federal Government;" and alluded to his constant efforts to limit, restrain, and circumscribe, the circle of paper circulation, and to extend and increase that of the gold and silver circulation.

Mr. B. said there were many other motions on the journals to the same effect; but he would not consume time in reading them. Much less would he read from his speeches, running through a period of five years, and dwelling so much on this particular point. He would only refer to one of these speeches, the one on the District banks, of the last session, in which the reasons for suppressing the small-note currency were largely gone into. He would read a paragraph only, to show the heads of the argument which he then used:

"Mr. B. said that the proposed limit of twenty dollars for the minimum size of bank notes was not an arbitrary assumption, or a fanciful designation, but was a limit ascertained by experience, and proven by results, to be the lowest that would suffice to accomplish the ends intended. These ends are: 1. To re-establish the gold currency; 2. To make gold and silver the common currency for all the small dealings of the country; 3. To extend and enlarge the specie basis of the paper circulation; 4. To save the laboring and small dealing part of the community from the effects of contractions and expansions from bank issues; 5. To save them from the impositions of counterfeiters, from losses when banks fail, and from bearing the whole burden of the wear and tear of small notes; 6. To save hard money enough in the country to make it safe to have such paper currency as commerce and large dealings may require. These are the objects to be accomplished, and less than twenty dollars will have no adequate effect; far better would be the limit of $100, as it is nearly in France, and where that limit insures a circulation of nine tenths gold and silver, and one tenth paper; namely, upwards of five hundred millions of dollars of one, and fifty millions of the other."

From this brief but authentic history of the movements in this chamber against the small note currency, Mr. B. said it would be seen how fallacious was the claim set up by Mr. Biddle, in his panic letter of November last, to the honor of commencing these movements. So far from it, it was now established that it was the conduct of the Bank of the United States, in deluging the country with a small-note currency, and eviscerating the States of their specie, and exporting it to Europe, that caused him to move first upon the subject; and that that movement, after being apparently acquiesced in by the bank, to aid in getting the renewed charter, was defeated and made ridiculous by being diluted into a reserved authority to do afterwards what the bank would not permit to be done then. Mr. B. averred that it was the conduct of the Bank of the United States in inundating the States with small trash, in the shape of branch drafts, that first put him upon the idea of suppressing small notes. It showed him the evils of that circulation, and subsequent inquiries proved its extent. Subsequent inquiries showed that the Bank of the United States had abducted about forty-two millions of specie from the States, and exported it to foreign countries, leaving in the whole Union, at the time of the application for a recharter, in 1832, no more than twenty or twenty-two millions of specie. This was her conduct; and what has been the conduct of President Jackson's administration? It has been to increase that twenty millions, in about four years, to about eighty millions; and to do this against the constant and strenuous opposition of the Bank of the United States and all its friends. After this, what a power of face it requires in the president of the Bank of the United States to claim for that institution, and its friends, the honor of fighting down small notes, and fighting up gold and silver? But why go back to past events? The present are sufficient. Did not that bank obtain from Pennsylvania a charter to issue notes below twenty dollars, namely: notes of ten dollars? And does she not daily and openly violate even this limitation by issuing notes and drafts of five dollars?

Mr. B. had felt himself forced into this episode upon the suppression of the small-note currency. It was the first time that he had troubled the Senate with a detail personal to himself, and hoped it would be the last. The suppression of small notes, though a novelty here, is an old operation elsewhere. In France, where paper money during the revolution was reduced to its smallest denominations, even to ten sous, he believed, all had been suppressed, as far back as the consulship of Bonaparte, under five hundred francs. In England, where one and two pound notes prevailed for above twenty years, a general suppression took place years ago. About the year 1819 was the commencement of the great movement in England. It was then Mr. Canning cited the letter which Mr. Burke had written to him twenty years before, and from his deathbed. It was then also he delivered that sentiment, which was among the few which ever produced, in the British House of Commons, an expression of applause in the galleries; an applause which was elicited, not by the theatrical exhibition of the orator, but by the sentiment of the statesman; and which was followed by a national effect all over the British empire. It was that sentiment in which Mr. Canning hoped that the day was at hand when every laborer, returning from his work at the end of the week, would feel the weight and hear the jingle of his wages in his breeches pocket; and it was this sentiment, taken up by the body of the people, and acted upon by them, which led to the immediate suppression of the one and two pound notes in several parts of England, and to their eventual suppression all over the empire.

Mr. B. wished to point out to the Senate the great similitude which existed between the present state of things in our country, and that which existed about twenty years ago. There was instruction to be derived from the retrospect, and he would use the highest authority for the fidelity of the picture which he proposed to recall. He would have recourse to the highest official papers—the messages of Presidents to Congress; and would read the parts which were applicable to his purpose. He read:

"It has been estimated that, during the year 1816, the actual receipts of revenue at the Treasury, including the balance at the commencement of the year, and excluding the proceeds of loans and Treasury notes, will amount to about the sum of $47,000,000; that during the same year, the actual payments at the Treasury, including the payment of the arrearages of the War Department, as well as the payment of a considerable excess beyond the annual appropriations, will amount to about the sum of $38,000,000; and that, consequently, at the close of the year, there will be a surplus in the Treasury of about $9,000,000."

Extract from President Monroe's annual message, the first Monday of December, 1817.

"A considerable and rapid augmentation in the value of all the public lands, proceeding from these and other obvious causes, may, henceforward, be expected. * * * The public lands are a public stock, which ought to be disposed of to the best advantage for the nation. The nation should, therefore, derive the profit from the continual rise in their value."

Extract from President Monroe's annual message, the third Monday in November, 1818.

"The sale of the public lands during the year has also greatly exceeded, both in quantity and price, that of any former year; and there is just reason to expect a progressive improvement in that source of revenue."

This is the picture for 1816-17-'18; and a glowing one it is. The Treasury full and overflowing; forty-seven millions of revenue in one year; thirty eight millions paid out; nine millions of surplus on hand; public lands selling with unprecedented rapidity; the sales for 1818 being seventeen millions of dollars; which, in proportion to the population, were larger sales than those of the last year, when twenty-five millions were received. At the end of the year 1818, this gorgeous picture of prosperity still augmenting, and the President so elated with the prospect of income from the lands, that he advises their price to be raised from two dollars per acre, which was then the minimum, to a sum not stated in his message, but understood to be five dollars; and concludes with expressing his opinion that there was just reason for expecting a progressive improvement in the sales of these lands. Now, said Mr. B., let us resume our readings, and see what manner of picture is presented by the same President in the ensuing messages. He read:

"Although the pecuniary embarrassments which affected various parts of the Union, during the latter part of the preceding year, have, during the present, been considerably augmented, and still continue to exist, the receipts into the Treasury to the 30th of September last have amounted to $19,000,000. * * * The causes which have tended to diminish the public receipts could not fail to have a corresponding effect upon the revenue which has accrued upon imposts and tonnage during the first three quarters of the present year. *

* * * The great reduction in the price of the principal articles of domestic growth, which has occurred during the present year, and the consequent fall in the price of labor, apparently so favorable to the success of domestic manufactures, have not shielded them against other causes adverse to their prosperity. The pecuniary embarrassments which have so deeply affected the commercial interests of the nation have been no less adverse to our manufacturing establishments in several sections of the Union. The great reduction of the currency, which the banks have been constrained to make in order to continue specie payments, and the vitiated character of it where such reductions have not been attempted, instead of placing within the reach of these establishments the pecuniary aid necessary to avail themselves of the advantages resulting from the reduction in the prices of the raw materials and labor, have compelled the banks to withdraw from them a portion of the capital heretofore advanced to them. That aid which has been refused by the banks has not been obtained from other sources, owing to the loss of individual confidence, from the frequent failures which have recently occurred in some of our principal commercial cities."

And recommends encouragement to manufactures.

"The receipts into the Treasury from every source (including a loan of three millions) to the 30th of September last, amount to $16,794,107; whilst the public expenditures to the same period amount to $16,871,534. The sum of three millions, authorized to be raised by loan, by act of the last session of Congress, has been obtained on terms advantageous to the Government. It is proper to add, that there is now due to the Treasury, for the sale of the public lands, $22,996,545. In bringing this subject to view, I consider it my duty to submit to Congress whether it may not be advisable to extend to the purchasers of these lands, in consideration of the unfavorable change which has occurred since the sales, a reasonable indulgence. It is known that the purchases were made when the price of every article had risen to its greatest height, and that the instalments are becoming due at a period of great depression. It is presumed that some plan may be devised by the wisdom of Congress, compatible with the public interest, which would afford great relief to these purchasers."

What a change of language, (said Mr. B.) It looks like enchantment! and all to take place between the meeting of one session of Congress and the meeting of the next. What a change! No more forty-seven millions of income; no more surpluses; no more seventeen millions from public lands; no more propositions to raise their price; no more of all this glowing picture! But the income from customs fallen down to thirteen millions; the income from lands to less than one million; a loan of three millions authorized to carry on the Government; all the public expenditures cut down to the lowest point; universal distress; banks failing; currency deranged; prices depressed; manufactures sinking; and calling for a new tariff; relief to them recommended; the purchasers of the public lands twenty-three millions in debt to the Government, unable to pay, calling for relief, and relief recommended, and granted; the twenty-three millions of debt for lands either released, or payment deferred on extended credit; and the minimum price, instead of being raised to five dollars per acre, reduced to one dollar and twenty-five cents. Such was the change of picture which it was the fate of the same President to present in the short interval which elapsed between two sessions of Congress! and what is the instruction which we should derive from it? Certainly, that similar effects follow similar causes; and that the past should be a lesson and a warning for the future. We are now in the circumstances of 1816, '17, '18; overflowing Treasury, large surpluses, great sales of the public lands, the price of every thing high. And what made that state of things? Bank issues, bank expansions, bank loans, bank facilities! And what made the cruel reverse which took place in 1818-'19? Contraction of bank issues, contraction of expansions, curtailment of loans, withdrawal of facilities, and the explosion of innumerable banks! The paper system, the paper system was the real and sole cause of the illusive and deceptive prosperity which, for a while, smiled treacherously upon the country, and was so suddenly followed by a sad and real distress. And are we not at this moment, and from the same cause, realizing the first part, the deceptive, the illusive, the treacherous part, of this picture? and must not the other part, the sad and real sequel, inevitably follow? Mr. B. said it must follow, and went over several reasons to show it to be more certain now than in 1818-'19. In the first place, there were three times more banks now than then, and increasing much faster now than they did then, and dealing in millions now for hundreds of thousands then. In the next place, there is now a great political party, confederated with a powerful moneyed institution, to produce derangements of the currency, and pecuniary distress in the country, and to lay it upon the Government, when no such party existed in 1816, '17, '18. In the third place, the business of banking is now carried on in a more complex and critical form than formerly, by institutions using each other's notes as cash; issuing notes at one place payable at another and a distant place, and entering into temporary and voluntary arrangements for keeping up the credit and circulation of their notes at places where payments of them are not exigible by law. These are points in which the present trade of banking is more dangerously exposed, and more critically situated, than it was twenty years ago. On the other hand, there are some safeguards now which did not exist then; first, the great amount of specie, now near eighty millions of dollars, which the wisdom of President Jackson's administration has accumulated in the country; secondly, the avoidance, thus far, of the error of former administrations in using local paper for a national currency; thirdly, the Treasury order of 11th July, 1836, which saved the Western banks last fall, and which it is the object of this bill to rescind and supersede. Two of these safeguards are in danger of being removed by law—the second and the third of them. The first will remove itself whenever the premium on foreign exchange rises to 10½, (at which point it is profitable to export specie,) and that premium is now at near 10, and rising; and it will remove itself whenever the Federal Government, relapsing into the fatal error of receiving and paying out paper money, shall cease to create a home demand for the employment of gold and silver. The day of revulsion (said Mr. B.) may come sooner or later, and its effects may be more or less disastrous; but come it must, and disastrous, to some degree, it must be. The present bloat in the paper system cannot continue; the present depreciation of money, exemplified in the high price of every thing dependent upon the home market, cannot last. The revulsion will come, as surely as it did in 1819-'20. But it will come with force if the Treasury order is maintained, and if paper money shall be excluded from the federal Treasury. But, let these things go as they may, and let reckless or mischievous banks do what they please, there is still a refuge for the wise and good; there is still an ark of safety for every honest bank and for every prudent man; it is in the mass of gold and silver now in the country—the seventy odd millions which the wisdom of President Jackson's administration has accumulated—and by getting their share of which, all who are so disposed can take care of themselves.

Sir, (said Mr. B.) I have performed a duty to myself, not pleasant, but necessary. This bill is to be an era in our legislation and in our political history. It is to be a point upon which the future age will be thrown back, and from which future consequences will be traced. I separate myself from it; I wash my hands of it; I oppose it. I am one of those who promised gold, not paper. I promised the currency of the constitution, not the currency of corporations. I did not join in putting down the Bank of the United States, to put up a wilderness of local banks. I did not join in putting down the paper currency of a national bank, to put up a national paper currency of a thousand local banks.

APPENDIX.

No. 1.—Extract from Debates in Congress.

But, Mr. President, so important is this object, that I think that, far from diminishing, we ought rather to increase and multiply, our securities; and I am not prepared to say that, even with the continuance of the bank charter, and under its wisest administration, I regard the state of our currency as entirely safe. It is evident to me that the general paper circulation has been extended too far for the specie basis on which it rests. Our system, as a system, dispenses too far, in my judgment, with the use of gold and silver. Having learned the use of paper as a substitute, we use that substitute, I fear, too freely. It is true that our circulating paper is all redeemable in gold or silver. Legally speaking, it is all convertible into specie at the will of the holder. But a mere legal convertibility is not sufficient. There must be an actual, practical, never-ceasing convertibility. This, I think, is not, at present, sufficiently secured; and it is a matter that well deserves the serious consideration of the Senate. The paper circulation of the country is, at this time, probably 75 or 80,000,000 of dollars. Of specie we may have 20 or 22,000,000, and this, principally, in masses in the vaults of the banks. A circulation, consisting in so great a degree of paper, is easily expanded, to furnish temporary capital to such as wish to adventure on new enterprises in trade; and the collection in the banks of most of what specie there is in the country affords all possible facility for its exportation. Hence, over-trading does frequently occur, and is always followed by an inconvenient, sometimes by a dangerous, reduction of specie. It is in vain that we look to the prudence of banks for an effectual security against over-trading. The directors of such institutions will generally go the length of their means in cashing good notes, and leave the borrower to judge for himself of the useful employment of his money. Nor would a competent security exist against over-trading, if the banks were to confine their discounts strictly to business paper, so denominated; that is, to notes and bills which represent real transactions, having been given and received on the actual purchase and sale of merchandise, because these transactions themselves may be too far extended. Men naturally have a good opinion of their own sagacity. He who believes merchandise is about to rise in price will purchase merchandise if he has money or can obtain credit. The fact of actual purchase, therefore, is not a proof of really subsisting want; and of course the amount of all purchases does not correspond always with the entire wants of the community. Too frequently it very much exceeds that measure. If, then, the discretion of the banks, exercised in deciding the amount of their discounts, is not a proper security against overtrading; if facility in obtaining bank credits naturally fosters that spirit; if the desire of gain and love of enterprise constantly cherish it; and if it find specie collected in the banks, inciting exportation, what is the remedy suited and adequate to the case? Now, I think, sir, that a closer inquiry into the direct source of the evil will suggest a remedy. Why have we so small an amount of specie in circulation? Certainly the reason is, we do not require more. We have but to ask its presence, and it would return. But we voluntarily banish it, by the great amount of small bank notes. In most of the States, the banks issue notes of all low denominations, down even to a single dollar. How is it possible, under such circumstances, to retain specie in currency? All experience shows it to be impossible. The paper will take the place of the gold and silver. When Mr. Pitt, in the year 1797, proposed in Parliament to authorize the Bank of England to issue one-pound notes, Mr. Burke lay sick at Bath, of an illness from which he never recovered; and he is said to have written to the late Mr. Canning, "Tell Mr. Pitt, if he consents to the issuing of one-pound notes, he must never expect to see a guinea again."

The one-pound notes were issued, and the guineas disappeared. A similar cause is now producing a precisely similar effect with us. Small notes have expelled dollars and half dollars from circulation in all the States in which such notes are issued. On the other hand, dollars and half dollars abound in those States which have adopted a wiser policy. Virginia, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Louisiana, and some others, I think seven in all, do not allow their banks to issue notes under five dollars. Every traveller notices the difference, when he passes from one of these States into one where small notes are allowed. The evil, then, is the issuing of small notes by State banks. Of these notes, that is to say, notes under five dollars, the amount now in circulation is eight or ten millions of dollars. Can these notes be withdrawn? If they can, their place will be immediately supplied by a specie circulation of equal amount. The object is a great one, as it is connected with the safety and stability of the currency, and may well justify a serious reflection on the means of accomplishing it. May not Congress and the State Governments, acting, not unitedly, but severally, to the same end, easily and quietly attain it? I think they may. It is but for other States to follow the good example of those which I have mentioned, and the work is done. As an inducement to the States to do this, I propose, in the present bill, to reserve to Congress a power of withdrawing from circulation a pretty large part of the issues of the United States Bank. I propose this, so that the State banks may withdraw their small notes, and find their compensation in a larger circulation of a higher denomination. My proposition will be, that, at any time after the expiration of the existing charter of the bank, that is, after 1836, Congress may, if it see fit, restrain the bank from issuing for circulation notes or bills under a certain sum—say ten or twenty dollars. This will diminish the circulation, and consequently the profits of the bank; but it is of less importance to make a bank a highly profitable institution to stockholders, than that it should be safe and useful to the community. It ought not, certainly, to be restrained from the enjoyment of all the fair advantages to be derived from the discreet use of its capital, in banking transactions; but the leading object, after all, in its continuance, is, and ought to be, not private emolument, but public benefit.

It may perhaps strike some gentlemen that the circulation of small notes might be effectually discouraged, by refusing to receive all such small notes, and all notes of such banks as issued them, at the custom-houses, land offices, post offices, and other places of public receipt, and by causing them to be refused, also, either in payment or deposit at the Bank of the United States.

But the effect of such refusal may be doubtful. It would certainly in some degree discredit such notes, but probably it would not drive them out of circulation altogether; and if it did not do this, it might increase their circulation. If in some degree they become discredited, they would become cheaper than other notes; and experience proves that of two things which may be current, the cheaper will always expel the other. Thus silver, because it is proportionally cheaper with us than gold, has driven the gold out of the country. Thus, as we can pay our debts cheaper in silver than in gold, we use nothing but silver, and the gold goes where it is more highly valued. The same thing always happens between two sorts of paper which are found at the same time in circulation. That which is cheapest, or of less value than the other, always drives its more respectable associate out of its company.

No. 2.

A fourth improvement which Mr. B. had proposed was to limit the notes issued by the banks to the minimum size of twenty dollars, and to exclude all notes under that minimum, issued by other banks, from circulation within the District. He confessed that he felt an extreme degree of mortification in making a motion in the Congress of the United States to limit the size of bank notes, when this Congress was sitting here, and held its existence by virtue of a constitution which recognised nothing for currency but gold and silver; but he feared he might be subject to a still greater mortification in witnessing the failure of his motion, and the triumph of the paper system over this small attempt to check one of its greatest abuses. The limit of twenty dollars was the lowest that could be taken to accomplish the great objects in view; and that limit was not assumed arbitrarily, but from a careful observation of the effect of different limits, in different countries, upon the nature and amount of the circulating medium.

The great evils of a small paper currency are: 1. To banish gold and silver; 2. To encourage counterfeiting; 3. To destroy the standard of values; 4. To throw the burdens and the evils of the paper system upon the laboring and small dealing part of the community.

The instinct of banks to sink their circulation to the lowest denomination of notes which can be forced upon the community is a trait in the system universally proved to exist wherever banks of circulation have been permitted to give a currency to a country; and the effect of that instinct has always been to banish gold and silver. When the Bank of England was chartered, in the year 1694, it could issue no note less than £100 sterling; that amount was gradually reduced, by the persevering efforts of the bank, to £50; then to £20; then to £15; then to £10; at last to £5; and, finally, to £2 and £1. These last denominations were not reached until the year 1797, or until one hundred and three years after the institution of the bank; and as the several reductions in the size of the notes, and the consequent increase of paper currency, took place, gold became more and more scarce; and with the issue of the one and two pound notes, it totally disappeared from the country.

This effect was foretold by all political economists, and especially by Mr. Burke, then aged and retired from public life, who wrote from his retreat to Mr. Caning, to say to Mr. Pitt, the prime minister, these prophetic words: "If this bill for the one and two pound notes is permitted to pass, we shall never see another guinea in England." The bill did pass, and the prediction was fulfilled; for not another guinea, half guinea, or sovereign, was seen in England, for circulation, until the bill was repealed, two-and-twenty years afterwards! After remaining nearly a quarter of a century without a gold circulation, England abolished her one and two pound notes, limited her paper currency to £5 sterling, required all Bank of England notes to be paid in gold, and allowed four years for the act to take effect. Before the four years were out, the Bank of England reported to Parliament that it was ready to begin gold payments; and commenced accordingly, and has continued them ever since. The one and two pound notes in England correspond with the five and ten dollar notes in the United States, and the five-pound note is only four dollars above our twenty dollars; so that the analogy is perfect, and the effect must be similar upon our fives, tens, and twenties, that it was in England from the issue and suppression of the one and two pound notes, and the limitation to £5, with the compulsory obligation to pay it.

The encouragement of counterfeiting was the next great evil which Mr. B. pointed out as belonging to a small-note currency; and of all the denominations of notes, he said, those of one and two pounds in England, corresponding with fives and tens in the United States, were those to which the demoralizing business of counterfeiting was chiefly directed! They were the chosen game of the forging depredator! and that, for the obvious reasons that fives and tens were small enough to pass currently among persons not much acquainted with bank paper, and large enough to afford some profit to compensate for the expense and labor of producing the counterfeit, and the risk of passing it! Below fives, the profit is too small for the labor and risk. Too many have to be forged and passed before an article of any value can be purchased; and the change to be got in silver, in passing one for a small article, is too little. Of twenty and upwards, though the profit is greater on passing them, yet the danger of detection is also greater. On account of its larger size, the note is not only more closely scrutinized before it is received, and the passer of it better remembered, but the circulation of them is more confined to business men and large dealers, and silver change will not be given for them in buying small articles. The fives and tens, then, in the United States, like the £1 and £2 in England, are the peculiar game of counterfeiters; and this is fully proved by the criminal statistics of the forgery department in both countries. According to returns made to the British Parliament for twenty-two years—from 1797 to 1819, the period in which the one and two pound notes were allowed to circulate—the whole number of prosecutions for counterfeiting, or passing counterfeit notes of the Bank of England, was 998; in that number there were 313 capital convictions, 530 inferior convictions, and 155 acquittals; and the sum of £249,900, near a million and a quarter of dollars, was expended by the bank in attending to prosecutions. Of this great number of prosecutions, the returns show that the mass of them were for offences connected with the one and two pound notes. The proportion may be distinctly seen in the number of counterfeit notes of different denominations detected at the Bank of England in a given period of time—from the 1st of January, 1812, to the 10th of April, 1818—being a period of six years and three months, out of the twenty-two years that the one and two pound notes continued to circulate. The detections were, of one-pound notes, the number of 107,238; of two-pound notes, 17,787; of five-pound notes, 5,826; of ten-pound notes, 419; of twenty-pound notes, 54. Of all above twenty pounds, 35. The proportion of ones and twos to the other sizes may be well seen in the tables for this brief period; but to have any idea of the mass of counterfeiting done upon these small notes, the whole period of twenty-two years must be considered, and the entire kingdom of Great Britain taken in; for the list only includes the number of counterfeits detected at the counter of the bank, a place to which the guilty never carry their forgeries, and to which a portion only of those circulating in and about London could be carried. The proportion of crime connected with the small notes is here shown to be enormously and frightfully great. The same results are found in the United States. Mr. B. had looked over the statistics of crime connected with the counterfeiting of bank notes in the United States, and found the ratio between the great and small notes to be about the same that it was in England. He had recourse to the most authentic data—Bicknell's Counterfeit Detector—and there found the editions of counterfeit notes of the local or State banks to be eight hundred and eighteen, of which seven hundred and fifty-six were of ten dollars and under; and sixty-two editions only were of twenty dollars and upwards. Of the Bank of the United States and its branches, he found eighty-two editions of fives; seventy-one editions of tens; twenty-six editions of twenties; and two editions of fifties; still showing that in the United States, as well as in England, on local banks as well as that of the United States, the course of counterfeiting was still the same; and that the whole stress of the crime fell upon the five and ten dollar notes in this country, and their corresponding classes, the one and two pound notes in England. Mr. B. also exhibited the pages of Bicknell's Counterfeit Detector, a pamphlet covered over, column after column, with its frightful lists, nearly all under twenty dollars; and he called upon the Senate, in the sacred name of the morals of the country, in the name of virtue and morality, to endeavor to check the fountain of this crime, by stopping the issue of the description of notes on which it exerted nearly its whole force.

Mr. B. could not quit the evils of the crime of counterfeiting in the United States without remarking that the difficulty of legal detection and punishment was so great, owing to the distance at which the counterfeits were circulated from the banks purporting to issue them, and the still greater difficulty, in most cases impossible, to get witnesses to attend in person in States in which they do not reside, the counterfeiters all choosing to practise their crime and circulate their forgeries in States which do not contain the banks whose paper they are imitating. So difficult is it to obtain the attendance of witnesses in other States, that the crime of counterfeiting is almost practised with impunity. The notes under 20 dollars feed and supply this crime; let them be stopped, and ninety-nine hundredths of this crime will stop with them.

A third objection which Mr. B. urged against the notes under twenty dollars was, that nearly the whole evils of that part of the paper system fell upon the laboring and small dealing part of the community. Nearly all the counterfeits lodged in their hands, or were shaved out of their hands. When a bank failed, the mass of its circulation, being in small notes, sunk upon their hands. The gain to the banks from the wear and tear of small notes came out of them, the loss from the same cause falling upon them. The 10 or 12 per cent. annual profit for furnishing a currency in place of gold and silver (for which no interest would be paid to the mint or the Government) chiefly falls upon them; for the paper currency is chiefly under twenty dollars. These evils they almost exclusively bear, while they have, over and above all these, their full proportion of all the evils resulting from the expansions and contractions which are incessantly going on, totally destroying the standard of value, periodically convulsing the country, and in every cycle of five or six years making a lottery of all property, in which all the prizes are drawn by the bank managers and their friends.

In proposing the limitation of twenty dollars to these District banks, Mr. B. of course coupled with it the concomitant provision for the exclusion of all notes under the same limit issued without the District. This was a precaution as just and natural as it was easy. A prohibitory law, with a liability in every passer to pay the amount of the notes, with costs and damages, in specie, and especially in gold, with summary process before a justice of the peace for the recovery, would effectually expel the interdicted and pestiferous paper.

Mr. B. said that the proposed limit of twenty dollars for the minimum size of bank notes was not an arbitrary assumption or a fanciful designation; but was a limit ascertained by experience, and proven by results, to be the lowest that would suffice to accomplish the ends intended. These ends are: 1. To re-establish the gold currency. 2. To make gold and silver the common currency for all the small dealings of the country. 3. To extend and enlarge the specie basis of the paper circulation. 4. To save the laboring and small dealing part of the community from the effects of contractions and expansions from bank issues. 5. To save them from the impositions of counterfeiters, from losses when banks fail, and from bearing the whole burden of the wear and tear of small notes. 6. To save hard money enough in the country to make it safe to have such paper currency as commerce and large dealings may require. These are the objects to be accomplished, and less than twenty dollars will have no adequate effect; far better would be the limit of one hundred dollars, as it is nearly in France, and where that limit insures a circulation of nine tenths of gold and silver, and one tenth paper; namely, upwards of five hundred millions of dollars of one, and fifty millions of the other. Wise would it be in any single State to adopt this limit, and to exclude all notes under that amount from circulation within its borders; that State would become the richest and the happiest in the Union. It would be, in its moneyed concerns, to the rest of the Union, what France is to the rest of Europe—the absorbent of their precious metals, the perennial fountain of golden supply to its citizens, and the land of rest from the panics and pressures, the ebbs and flows, the feasts and famines, the dearths and deluges, the expansions, contractions, and revulsions, and all the crimes and misfortunes of the paper system.

But to proceed with the twenty-dollar limit. While England had notes as low as one and two pounds, which we may call five and ten dollars, the specie basis contracted and diminished until silver could only be got for small change, and gold fled entirely from the country. The mint was forever coining, but the guineas and sovereigns went straight to France; and it was testified by Mr. Alexander Baring, before a committee of the House of Commons, that the gold coinage of the British mint, during this period, was regularly recoined in France, often without seeing the light in England; being packed in boxes and shipped as it issued from the mint, delivered in Paris before it was a week old, and swallowed up in the ocean of French currency, by passing through the French mint, and assuming the stamp and arms of France. The suppression of the one and two pound notes in 1819, and the £5 limit, with the compulsory obligation on the Bank of England to pay all its notes in gold, restored the gold currency in that country, and so extended and enlarged the specie basis, as to make her currency half and half—half specie and half paper—the specie two thirds gold, and one third silver; and the paper all of £5, about $24, and upwards. This has made a paper currency safe in England, for it is dollar for dollar; it has given to the laboring and small dealing classes a hard-money currency, and it has taken from the counterfeiters their chief and favorite classes of notes for imitation. Mr. B. took the great ground that, where a paper currency was tolerated at all, the safety and welfare of the community required the specie proportion to be one half; that it required a £5 limit, and gold payments, to effect that object in England; that a limit of twenty dollars would not effect it in the United States; and he was only restrained from proposing the French limit, from the impossibility of contending successfully with the bank power at present, now omnipotent in the country, engrossing the time and governing the legislation in whatever related to their own interests. A twenty-dollar limit would not give a substratum of half specie, even if our banks were compelled to pay all gold; but there is no compulsion on them to pay any part; and the efforts to bring them to half payments in gold would be long and bitterly resisted. Gold is the enemy of paper; it keeps it down when the holder of the paper has a right to demand gold; and thus a paper currency founded upon gold, as it is in England, will always be kept more within bounds than a paper currency founded upon silver. Silver is too cumbrous to hold paper in check. A person would not wish to change even a twenty-dollar note into silver to carry in his pocket, but would gladly change it into gold; and so of fifty and hundred dollar notes.

This motion having been agreed to, and Mr. GRUNDY's resolution being before the Senate,

Mr. GRUNDY said he had no objections to the inquiry proposed by the amendment; and he thought that some such provision as that proposed by the Senator from Kentucky would be very proper. He had seen in the public papers a statement charging that some of the electors who voted in the late presidential election held offices under the General Government, and had made inquiries for the purpose of ascertaining the truth of the matter. The information he had been able to collect related to two cases only; and as to these, the report had been founded altogether on a misapprehension.

Mr. CLAY, after a few remarks, offered the following amendment:

"And, also, to inquire into the expediency of ascertaining whether any votes were given at the recent election, contrary to the prohibition contained in the second section of the second article of the constitution. And if any such votes were given, what ought to be done with them; and whether any, and what, provision ought to be made for securing the faithful observance, in future, of that section of the constitution."

Mr. HUBBARD expressed his entire concurrence in the objects of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky. He wished a strict inquiry to be instituted, and measures to be adopted to guard against the occurrence of such a violation of the constitution as the Senator from Kentucky referred to. As it had been stated that two of the electors in his State (New Hampshire) held offices under the General Government, and were consequently ineligible, he was happy to state to the Senate that there was no foundation whatever for the report.

The amendment of Mr. CLAY was then adopted, and the resolution, thus amended, was agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD moved that the committee be appointed by the Chair; which, by unanimous consent, was agreed to; and Messrs. GRUNDY, CLAY, and WRIGHT, were selected.

The Senate then adjourned.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 28.

RETIREMENT OF THE VICE PRESIDENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT, after the reading of the journal, addressed the Senate as follows:

Senators: The period is at hand which is to terminate the official relation that has existed between us, and I leave, probably never to return to it, a body with which I have been long connected; where some remain whom I found here fifteen years ago, and where, in the progress of public duties, personal associations have arisen never to be forgotten. From such scenes I cannot retire without emotion. Nor can I give to the Senate the usual opportunity of choosing another to preside for a time over their deliberations, without referring to the manner in which I have endeavored to discharge a most gratifying and honorable trust connected with the office to which my country called me.

Entering upon it with unaffected diffidence, well knowing how little my studies had been directed to its peculiar duties, I was yet strengthened by the determination, then expressed, so to discharge the authority with which I was invested, as "best to protect the rights, to respect the feelings, and to guard the reputations, of all who would be affected by its exercise." I was sure that, if successful in this, I should be pardoned for errors which I could hardly expect to avoid.

In the interval that has since elapsed, it has been our lot in this assembly to pass through scenes of unusual excitement: the intense interest on absorbing topics, which has pervaded our whole community, could not be unfelt within these walls. The warmth of political parties, natural in such times, the unguarded ardor of sudden debate, and the collisions seldom to be separated from the invaluable privilege of free discussion, have not been unfrequently mingled with the more tranquil tenor of ordinary legislation. I cannot hope that, in emergencies like these, I have always been so fortunate as to satisfy every one around me; yet I permit myself to think that the extent to which my decisions have been approved by the Senate is some evidence that my efforts justly to administer their rules have not been vain; and I conscientiously cherish the conviction, that on no occasion have I departed from my early resolution, or been regardless of what was due to the rights or the feelings of the members of this body.

Though I may henceforth be separated from the Senate, I can never cease to revert with peculiar interest to my long connexion with it. In every situation in my future life I shall remember with a just pride the evidences of approbation and confidence which I have here received; and as an American citizen, devotedly attached to the institutions of my country, I must always regard with becoming and sincere respect a branch of our Government invested with such extensive powers, and designed by our forefathers to accomplish such important results.

Indulging an ardent wish that every success may await you in performing the exalted and honorable duties of your public trust, and offering my warmest prayers that prosperity and happiness may be constant attendants on each of you, along the future paths of life, I respectfully bid you farewell.

After the VICE PRESIDENT had retired,

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the Senate proceeded to ballot for a President pro tem.

The number of votes cast was 37; necessary to a choice 19. Mr. KING of Alabama had 26, Mr. SOUTHARD 7, Mr. CLAY 1, Mr. PRENTISS 1, Mr. EWING of Ohio, 1, Mr. BUCHANAN 1.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, being thus duly elected President pro tem of the Senate, was conducted to the Chair by Mr. BENTON, and addressed the Senate nearly as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate: To be again called to preside over the deliberations of this august assembly fills my heart with the liveliest emotions of gratitude. When at the last session it pleased the Senate to place me in this exalted situation, I solemnly pledged myself to discharge the duties it devolved on me, without favor and without partiality. I felt conscious that I had done so; but could any thing add to the grateful sense I entertain of the honor you have again conferred on me, it will be found in the unequivocal testimony you have this day borne, that I had faithfully redeemed that pledge. The Senate of the United States, gentlemen, is, from its very organization, the great conservative body in this republic. Here is the strong citadel of liberty. To this body the intelligent and the virtuous, throughout our wide-spread country, look with confidence for an unwavering and unflinching resistance to the encroachments of power on the one hand, and the effervescence of popular excitement on the other. Unawed and unseduced, it should firmly maintain the constitution in its purity, and present an impregnable barrier against every attack on that sacred instrument, come it from what quarter it may. The demon of faction should find no abiding place in this chamber, but every heart and every head should be wholly occupied in advancing the general welfare, and preserving, unimpaired, the national honor. To insure success, gentlemen, in the discharge of our high duties, we must command the confidence and receive the support of the people. Calm deliberation, courtesy towards each other, order and decorum in debate, will go far, very far, to inspire that confidence and command that support. It becomes my duty, gentlemen, to banish (if practicable) from this hall all personal altercation; to check, at once, every remark of a character personally offensive; to preserve order, and promote harmony. These duties, as far as my powers will permit, I shall unhesitatingly perform. I earnestly solicit your co-operation, gentlemen, in aiding my efforts promptly to put down every species of disorder. For your kindness, gentlemen, I tender you my grateful acknowledgments.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, it was

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate inform the President of the United States and the House of Representatives that the Senate have elected the Hon. WILLIAM R. KING their President pro tem.

TREASURY CIRCULAR.

The bill designating and limiting the funds which shall be receivable in payment for the public revenues was taken up, being on its third reading.

Mr. SEVIER moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Monday, for the purpose of going on with the land bill; which motion was lost: Ayes 13, noes not counted.

Mr. WALKER then rose and said: Before replying to the indictment preferred by the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] against the Committee on Public Lands, it is proper to recur to the facts and circumstances under which this controversy originated. At an early period of the session, the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] introduced a resolution to rescind the Treasury order. This resolution was very fully discussed, and especially by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] but Mr. W. had taken no part in this discussion.

In the progress of the debate upon the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, a substitute was offered, as an amendment, by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] This substitute was advocated by that Senator, and in consonance with the President's recommendation, to render the legislation of Congress in the collection of the federal revenue auxiliary to the suppression of all notes of a smaller denomination than twenty dollars, and a consequent enlargement of the circulation of gold and silver. The Senator from Virginia had regarded the Treasury order as a temporary measure, to meet a pressing emergency, and as having in a great degree performed its office.

Mr. W. had still refrained from embarking in the discussion upon this question. Several Senators, however, had expressed their opinions, and great difficulties appeared to be presented against any satisfactory adjustment of this question. Under these circumstances, several Senators, now within the sound of his voice, had proposed to him (Mr. W.) to refer both resolutions to the Committee on Public Lands. To this reference, Mr. W. said, he had at first objected, upon the grounds that the Committee on Public Lands was engaged in the laborious examination of another question, and that the subject of designating the funds receivable for the public dues belonged more appropriately to the Committee on Finance. Upon further consultation, however, with several Senators friendly to the administration, Mr. W. had at length reluctantly assented to the proposed reference, which was accordingly made by the vote of the Senate, including that of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON.] No other report than that which was made, so far as Mr. W. was concerned, could have been anticipated; for to every Senator with whom Mr. W. had conversed, he had expressed his concurrence in the provisions, substantially, of the resolution of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] and at the last session, when the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] introduced a resolution requiring payments of the public lands in gold and silver only, the Senate would well recollect that he (Mr. W.) had then expressed his opposition to that resolution, and so had a majority of the Senators now composing the Committee on Public Lands. When, then, the Senator from Missouri voted for this reference, he could not justly have anticipated any other report than that which was made by the committee. Why, then, did the Senator from Missouri vote for this reference, and then denounce the committee for making the only report which he could have expected, in conformity with their previously avowed opinions? Mr. W. said it became his duty, as chairman of this committee, and as their organ, to report a bill containing substantially the provisions of the resolution of the Senator from Virginia. Again, the subject had been discussed in the Senate, but Mr. W. had not participated in the debate; and the bill, by a large majority, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and now, when, by the usual rules of parliamentary debate, the contest might well be considered as terminated, the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] before the vote on the final passage, had made a very elaborate argument against the measure. To all this Mr. W. would make no objection; but when that Senator, having exhausted the argument, or having none to offer, had indulged in violent and intemperate denunciation of the Committee on Public Lands, and of the report made by him as their organ, Mr. W. could not withhold the expression of his surprise and astonishment. Mr. W. said it was his good fortune to be upon terms of the kindest personal intercourse with every Senator, and these friendly relations should not be interrupted by any aggression upon his part. And now, Mr. W. said, he called upon the whole Senate to bear witness, as he was sure they all cheerfully would, that in this controversy he was not the aggressor, and that nothing had been done or said by him to provoke the wrath of the Senator from Missouri, unless, indeed, to differ from him in opinion upon any subject constituted an offence in the mind of that Senator. If such were the views of that gentleman, if he was prepared to immolate every Senator who would not worship the same images of gold and silver which decorated the political chapel of the honorable gentleman, Mr. W. was fearful that the Senator from Missouri would do execution upon every member of the Senate but himself, and be left here alone in his glory. Mr. W. said he recurred to the remarks of the Senator from Missouri with feelings of regret, rather than of anger or excitement; and that he could not but hope, that when the Senator from Missouri had calmly reflected upon this subject, he would himself see much to regret in the course he had pursued in relation to the Committee on Public Lands, and much to recall that he had uttered under feelings of temporary excitement. Sir, (said Mr. W.,) being deeply solicitous to preserve unbroken the ranks of the democratic party in this body, participating with the people in grateful recollection of the distinguished services rendered by the Senator from Missouri to the democracy of the Union, he would pass by many of the remarks made by that Senator on this subject.

[Mr. BENTON here rose from his chair, and demanded, with much warmth, that Mr. WALKER should not pass by one of them. Mr. W. asked, What one? Mr. B. replied, in an angry tone, Not one, sir. Then Mr. W. said he would examine them all, and in a spirit of perfect freedom; that he would endeavor to return blow for blow; and that, if the Senator from Missouri desired, as it appeared he did, an angry controversy with him, in all its consequences, in and out of this House, he could be gratified.]

Sir, (said Mr. W.,) why has the Senator from Missouri assailed the Committee on Public Lands, and himself, as its humble organ? He was not the author of this measure, so much denounced by the Senator from Missouri, nor had he said one word upon the subject. The measure originated with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES.] He was the author of the measure, and had been, and still was, its able, zealous, and successful advocate. Why, then, had the Senator from Missouri assailed him, (Mr. W.,) and permitted the author of the measure to escape unpunished? Sir, are the arrows which appear to be aimed by the Senator from Missouri at the humble organ of the Committee on Public Lands, who reported this bill, intended to inflict a wound in another quarter? Is one Senator the apparent object of assault, when another is designed as the real victim? Sir, when the Senator from Missouri, without any provocation, like a thunderbolt from an unclouded sky, broke upon the Senate in a perfect tempest of wrath and fury, bursting upon his poor head like a tropical tornado, did he intend to sweep before the avenging storm another individual more obnoxious to his censure?

Sir, (said Mr. W.,) the Senator from Missouri has thrice repeated the prayer, "God save the country from the Committee on Public Lands;" but Mr. W. fully believed that if the prayer of the country could be heard within these walls, it would be, God save us from the wild, visionary, ruinous, and impracticable schemes of the Senator of Missouri, for exclusive gold and silver currency; and such is not only the prayer of the country, but of the Senate, with scarcely a dissenting voice. Sir, if the Senator from Missouri could, by his mandate, in direct opposition to the views of the President, heretofore expressed, sweep from existence all the banks of the States, and establish his exclusive constitutional currency of gold and silver, he would bring upon this country scenes of ruin and distress without a parallel—an immediate bankruptcy of nearly every debtor, and of almost every creditor to whom large amounts were due, a prodigious depreciation in the price of all property and all products, and an immediate cessation by States and individuals of nearly every work of private enterprise or public improvement. The country would be involved in one universal bankruptcy, and near the grave of the nation's prosperity would perhaps repose the scattered fragments of those great and glorious institutions which give happiness to millions here, and hopes to millions more of disenfranchisement from despotic power. Sir, in resistance to the power of the Bank of the United States, in opposition to the re-establishment of any similar institution, the Senator from Missouri would find Mr. W. with him; but he could not enlist as a recruit in this new crusade against the banks of his own and every other State in the Union. These institutions, whether for good or evil, are created by the States, cherished and sustained by them, in many cases owned in whole or in part by the States, and closely united with their prosperity; and what right have we to destroy them? What right had he, a humble servant of the people of Mississippi, to say to his own, or any other State, your State legislation is wrong—your State institutions, your State banks, must be annihilated, and we will legislate here to effect this object. Are we the masters or servants of the sovereign States, that we dare speak to them in language like this—that we dare attempt to prostrate here those institutions which are created and maintained by those very States which we represent on this floor? These may be the opinions entertained by some Senators of their duty to the States they represent, but they were not his (Mr. W.'s) views or his opinions. He was sincerely desirous to co-operate with his State in limiting any dangerous powers of the banks, in enlarging the circulation of gold and silver, and in suppressing the small-note currency, so as to avoid that explosion which was to be apprehended from excessive issues of bank paper. But a total annihilation of all the banks of his own State, now possessing a chartered capital of near forty millions of dollars, would, Mr. W. knew, produce almost universal bankruptcy, and was not, he believed, anticipated by any one of his constituents.

But the Senator from Missouri tells us that this measure of the committee is a repeal of the constitution, by authorizing the receipt of paper money in revenue payments. If so, then the constitution never has had an existence; for the period cannot be designated when paper money was not so receivable by the Federal Government. This species of money was expressly made receivable for the public dues by an act of Congress, passed immediately after the adoption of the constitution, and which remained in force until eighteen hundred and eleven. It was so received, as a matter of practice, from eighteen hundred and eleven until eighteen hundred and sixteen, when, again, by an act of Congress then passed, and which has just expired, it was so authorized to be received during all that period. Now, although these acts have expired, there is that which is equivalent to a law still in force, expressly authorizing the notes of the specie-paying banks of the States to be received in revenue payments. It is the joint resolution of eighteen hundred and sixteen, adopted by both Houses of Congress, and approved by President Madison. That joint resolution is in these words:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, required and directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, as by law provided and declared, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States; and that, from and after the 20th day of February next, no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States as aforesaid, ought to be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States.

Commenting upon this resolution, the Senator from Missouri, in his speech of December last, declared:

"This is the law, continued Mr. Benton, and nothing can be plainer than the right of selection which it gives to the Secretary of the Treasury."

"The words of the law are clear; the practice under it has been uniform and uninterrupted from the date of its passage to the present day. For twenty years, and under three Presidents, all the Secretaries of the Treasury have acted alike. Each has made selections, permitting the notes of some specie-paying banks to be received, and forbidding others."

Here this joint resolution is admitted by the Senator from Missouri to be "the law," and that the practice under it has been uniform to receive the notes of specie-paying banks. If, then, to authorize the reception of the notes of specie-paying banks in payment of the public dues be a violation of the constitution, it is obvious that the constitution never has had any existence, except in the golden visions of the honorable Senator from Missouri. Sir, what more is done by the bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands, and now ordered to be engrossed by the Senate, than had been already accomplished by the joint resolution of 1816? This bill, as thus engrossed, is as follows:

"An act designating and limiting the funds receivable for the revenues of the United States.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, required to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to effect a collection of the public revenue of the United States, whether arising from duties, taxes, debts, or sales of lands, in the manner and on the principles herein provided: that is, that no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, payable for lands, shall be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States, under the following restrictions and conditions in regard to such notes, to wit: from and after the passage of this act, the notes of no bank which shall issue or circulate bills or notes of a less denomination than five dollars shall be received on account of the public dues; and from and after the thirtieth day of December, eighteen hundred and thirty-nine, the notes of no bank which shall issue or circulate bills or notes of a less denomination than ten dollars shall be so receivable; and from and after the thirtieth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, the like prohibition shall be extended to the notes of all banks issuing bills or notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no notes shall be received by the collectors or receivers of the public money which the banks in which they are to be deposited shall not, under the supervision and control of the Secretary of the Treasury, agree to pass to the credit of the United States as cash: Provided, That if any deposit bank shall refuse to receive and pass to the credit of the United States, as cash, any notes receivable under the provisions of this act, which said bank, in the ordinary course of business, receives on general deposit, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to withdraw the public deposits from said bank."

Now, the principal difference between the provisions of this bill and the joint resolution of 1816 consists in the exclusion by the bill of notes of small denominations from revenue payments. Yet the Senator from Missouri would leave the resolution of 1816 in full force, unreppealed, unmodified, and yet objects to the measure now before us. The Senator from Missouri would have remain in force a resolution of Congress, by which the Secretary of the Treasury may, at his discretion, receive for the public dues bank notes, even of one dollar; and yet he objects to a measure by which that discretion is limited to the receipt of notes of the higher denominations. By the resolution, as it stands, the Secretary of the Treasury may collect the whole public revenue in bank paper; by the bill, as proposed, a portion of the public dues must be collected in gold and silver; and yet the Senator from Missouri objects, and denounces the measure as a repeal of the constitution, by authorizing the payment of the public dues in bank paper, as if it were not authorized already by the joint resolution of 1816, which, as regards the customs, is untouched even by the Treasury order. Strange inconsistency! singular delusion! But has it come to this: that Congress has surrendered an unlimited discretion, as regards the funds receivable for the public dues, into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, and must not now interfere? That, in the opinion of the Senator from Missouri, it is all right that the Secretary of the Treasury should possess the discretionary power of receiving or rejecting bank paper in payment of the public dues; of discriminating between different individuals and different branches of the public revenue; of putting up and putting down bank paper at his pleasure—but that for Congress to interpose and define or limit that discretion is a violation of the constitution. That for the Secretary of the Treasury to regulate the currency at his pleasure, and put up and put down State banks and their paper, is all right; but that for Congress to limit and define his power, in these respects, is unconstitutional. The Secretary of the Treasury, then, must be above Congress, and above the constitution, possessing an omnipotent, unchangeable, irreversible power on this subject. Is not the Senate astounded by the avowal and advocacy of such doctrines upon this floor—doctrines worthy of the Polignacs of France, and of the Stuarts of England, but wholly incompatible with the genius of our institutions, and directly contradictory, as shall be shown hereafter, to the opinions upon this subject of our patriotic President? Are the American people prepared to sustain these doctrines—doctrines which are essentially monarchical, which take from Congress all power over this subject; which deny their authority, the authority of the representatives of the people and of the States, and erect the Secretary of the Treasury into a dictator, whose mandates we may not control or alter? Sir, if the Secretary of the Treasury may thus abolish our power on this subject, and render it unconstitutional for us to interfere with his orders, why may not every other Secretary of every other Department claim similar power and the same exemption from our control? Such doctrines are the very essence of despotism, and now for the first time have they been openly avowed upon this floor and in this country. Tell me not, then, that the Secretary of the Treasury may receive or reject bank paper at his pleasure; may receive it, as he now does, for customs, and reject it in payment of the public lands; and that it is unconstitutional for Congress to regulate, define, and limit, that discretion. Standing upon the broad basis of the constitution, he would resist such doctrines; for they can only be maintained by a total overthrow of free government, and the establishment of arbitrary and despotic power.

But the Senator from Missouri tells us that he objects to the bill of the committee as an act of Congress, when it should have been a resolution. Sir, does that Senator contend that in directions given by Congress to the Secretary of the Treasury, as regards the funds receivable for the public dues, there is any distinction between a be it enacted, and a be it resolved, by the Congress of the United States? The constitution prescribes no such form, and recognises no such distinction. It requires joint resolutions, except for adjournment, as well as laws, to be approved by the President; and when this is done, they have the same obligatory energy in limiting and directing the acts of our public agents. Sir, when the Senator from Missouri urged this new objection, he seemed to have forgotten his speech of December last, in which, when commenting upon the joint resolution of 1816, he declared "this is the law;" but now that Senator would have us believe that a joint resolution is not equivalent to a law of Congress. But if there be this distinction between a law and a joint resolution, in support of this plea of abatement, upon which the Senator from Missouri now relies, it shall be shown, before the close of this address, that the Senator from Missouri has himself, within the last twelve months, proposed laws, and amendments to laws, expressly authorizing the receipt of bank paper in payment of the public dues; and, consequently, if his own argument be true, has proposed a repeal of the constitution. Before, however, proceeding to this branch of the subject, let me ask, if the reception of bank paper in payment of the public dues be a violation of the constitution, then not only have Congress, but this administration, and every one that preceded it, uniformly violated the constitution. Down to the period of the Treasury order of July last, this administration has constantly received bank paper in payment of the federal revenue, and is still receiving it, even under the Treasury order, in payment of customs. The argument, then, of the Senator from Missouri, is a bitter denunciation of the whole course of the President on this subject preceding the Treasury order, and it is also a denunciation of the principles of that order, so far as it does not exclude bank paper in payment of customs. The administration is now receiving bank paper in payment of customs, and no change on this subject is proposed by the President; and yet the Senator from Missouri tells us, that for Congress to authorize the reception of bank paper in payment of the public dues is to repeal the constitution. Here is conclusive evidence that the Senator from Missouri goes far beyond the views of the President upon this subject. But the Senator from Missouri objects to the proviso of the bill introduced by the Committee on Public Lands, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to withdraw the deposits from any bank which refuses to pass to the credit of the United States, as cash, the notes of such specie-paying banks, receivable under this bill, as the bank receives on general deposit. This proviso is a wholesome restriction upon the abuse of power by the deposit banks. It will curtail, and was intended to curtail, the power of the deposit banks. It will arrest an odious monopoly, by preventing the deposit banks from making their notes the only paper receivable for the public dues; thus rendering, for all practical purposes, the paper of these banks the only currency of the Federal Government, to the manifest inconvenience of the people, and the severe oppression of other State banks equally as solvent as these institutions. It will prevent an oligarchy of deposit banks from controlling the currency, and exercising a power over the prosperity of the country quite as despotic as that possessed by the Bank of the United States. If we reject this proviso, we shall only have disenthralled the American people from the Bank of the United States; one master, to substitute eighty masters; a combination of which, uncontrolled by this proviso, might hold in their power the prosperity of this nation. This same power was confided, in relation to the removal of the deposits, to the Secretary of the Treasury, as regards the Bank of the United States; and the existence, as well as the exercise, of this power, by that officer, was deemed, by the Senator from Missouri, most wise and salutary. Yet the Senator from Missouri now objects to this power, and says he would not intrust it even to the administration of the President or of his successor. Indeed! The Senator from Missouri would not confide to the Secretary of the Treasury the necessary power to remove the public moneys from any deposit bank, thus abusing its authority, and oppressing the people, in the contingency referred to in the proviso; and yet he would permit the joint resolution of 1816 to remain unrevoked and unmodified, by which the Secretary of the Treasury might, at his discretion, regulate the whole currency of the country, receive or reject bank paper at his option, change and rechange his orders upon this subject, introduce or exclude the currency of gold and silver, and exercise over this whole subject powers unregulated and uncontrolled. Sir, the Senator from Missouri stops at the molehill of this proviso, whilst he surmounts the mountain which rises to our view, upon a survey of the enormous powers which that Senator would intrust, without any regulation, into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. W. said he would now proceed to prove that the Senator from Missouri had himself originally proposed something similar to the provisions of the bill which he now denounces as a violation of the constitution; and especially that he had directly proposed, by resolution as well as laws, to authorize the receipt of bank paper in payment of the public dues; and, until very recently, limited himself to the exclusion of notes under twenty dollars, as proposed by the bill of the committee. And, first, Mr. W. read from the journals of the Senate, under date of the 9th April, 1834, as follows:

"The following motion, submitted by Mr. Benton, was considered:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of the Senate, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to consider and report to the Senate and to the House, respectively, what alterations, if any, are necessary to be made * * * 3. In the joint resolution of 1816, (for the better collection of the revenue,) so as to exclude all bank notes under twenty dollars from revenue payments after a given period, and to make the revenue system of the United States instrumental in the gradual suppression of the small-note circulation, and the introduction of gold and silver for the common currency of the country."

Here it will be perceived that the Senator from Missouri then considered the joint resolution of 1816 as requiring alterations by Congress, so as "to exclude all bank notes under twenty dollars from revenue payments after a given period." Here, then, was a direct proposition, by that Senator, to do precisely what is done by the bill of the committee, as regards the exclusion from revenue payments of notes only "under twenty dollars." Why, then, does the Senator now denounce what was then his own project as a repeal of the constitution?

His project then was, not as it now is, to exclude all but gold and silver from revenue payments, and cut loose the Federal Government from the paper system, but the very reverse, namely: to authorize bank notes not under twenty dollars to be received in revenue payments. And how received? Why, by regulations then proposed by him, to be made by Congress—by alterations of the joint resolution of 1816. The honorable Senator then also proposed to make "the revenue system of the United States instrumental in the gradual suppression of the small-note circulation, and the introduction of gold and silver for the common currency of the country." The terms "common currency," as distinguished from exclusive currency, are italicized in the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, and the suppression confined to "the small-note circulation." This suppression of "the small-note circulation," of notes under twenty dollars, was to be effected by the instrumentality of the revenue system of the United States. Now, is not all this precisely what is proposed in the bill of the committee? And are not that bill and this resolution of the honorable Senator substantially the same? Since this period, a great revolution appears to have taken place in the opinion of the honorable Senator, both as regards questions relating to the currency and to constitutional law. Then, that Senator was satisfied to encourage the circulation of bank notes not under twenty dollars, and to receive them in revenue payments. Now, nothing will answer his purpose but gold and silver; and, to authorize any thing else to be received in revenue payments is denounced as a repeal of the constitution! If this doctrine be true, then the Senator from Missouri stands upon the Senate journals self-convicted of an attempt to repeal the constitution.

But the Senator from Missouri has imbodyed the twenty-dollar principle, as connected with the federal revenue, in an act of Congress, not a resolution.

Mr. W. here read from the journals of the Senate, under date of the 6th of April, 1836, as follows:

"The Senate resumed the consideration of a bill entitled 'An act making appropriations for the payment of the revolutionary and other pensioners,' &c. The following amendment, proposed by Mr. Benton, being under consideration:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That no bank note of less denomination than twenty dollars shall hereafter be offered in payment, in any case whatsoever, in which money is to be paid by the United States or the Post Office Department; nor shall any bank note of any denomination be so offered, unless the same shall be payable and paid on demand, in gold or silver coin, at the place where issued, and which shall not be equivalent to specie at the place where offered, and convertible into gold or silver upon the spot, at the will of the holder, and without delay or loss to him."

This section was, on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, imbodyed in the act of Congress referred to, and is now the law of the land, having passed both Houses of Congress, and received the sanction of the President. This provision, it is true, is confined to payments by the United States. But if the United States, under this law, are to pay out bank notes not under twenty dollars, how can this be done if they are not authorized to receive such notes? What could be more contradictory than a bill, the first section of which should authorize notes not under twenty dollars to be paid by the United States, and the second section of which should prohibit the United States from receiving in payment any thing but gold and silver? How could the United States, by law, in all time to come, pay out that which by law they were debarred from receiving? The Senator from Missouri, then, has, by law, connected the Federal Government with the paper system. This section, adopted on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, would come in very properly as an additional clause in the bill now before us; but as an additional proviso to the bill, which shall be quoted hereafter, proposed by that Senator, to re-establish a currency of gold and silver for the Federal Government, it would be ridiculous and contradictory.

Mr. W. stated that the Senator from Missouri had still further committed himself on this subject. He had not only directly countenanced the payment of the federal revenue in bank notes, but had himself proposed, at the last session, the creation by Congress, in this District, of new banks, authorized to issue notes not less than twenty dollars. Mr. W. here read from the journals of the Senate, under date of the 4th June, 1836, as follows:

"The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia.

"On motion of Mr. Benton to recommit the bill, with instructions to report separate bills for the incorporation of new banks, with small capitals, adapted to the capacity of the District to sustain specie banks, and strictly limited to the business of the place; the said incorporations to contain, among other provisions, the following principles: 4. The banks to issue no notes of less denomination than twenty dollars; and all notes of less denomination than twenty dollars, by other banks, to be prohibited from circulation within the District. 5. All the notes and paper currency issued by said banks to be paid in gold and silver; one half of either at the option of the demander, the other half at the option of the bank."

Now, Mr. W. would ask, if Congress could by law establish even in this District a certain number of banks authorized to issue notes of a certain denomination, could it not exercise the smaller power of authorizing the reception of bank notes in revenue payments? But (Mr. W. said) he quoted this to show that even at this late period the Senator from Missouri was not prepared to do execution on all banks and all bank paper. There were some curious matters connected with these propositions of the Senator from Missouri. His fifth proposition required "all notes and paper currency issued by said banks to be paid in gold and silver; one half of either at the option of the demander, the other half at the option of the bank;" and this same provision the honorable Senator also proposed to apply to "the deposit banks," "in consideration of being made or continued depositories of the public moneys." Sir, the honorable Senator from Missouri would have the banks pay in a currency better than that required by the constitution. By that instrument, gold or silver is a legal tender in payment of debts, and a bank note is only an evidence of a debt due by the bank to the holder of the note; but the honorable Senator would require the banks to pay their notes in gold and silver, one half of each metal. When a note of a thousand dollars shall be presented to a bank for redemption in specie, it is hoped the honorable Senator will not require those of less personal prowess than himself to carry away five hundred dollars in silver, when the bank otherwise might pay the whole amount in gold. Such equal division of the precious metals, however beautiful in theory, would be most inconvenient in practice; and if the honorable Senator is so equally attached to gold and silver as to be resolved on having a precisely equal circulation of each, there is one way which, if it were not presumptuous, Mr. W. could recommend to his serious consideration. It was this. That Senator took great delight in exhibiting a new and favorite coin of his, which he called billon. Mr. W. hoped he pronounced the word correctly; he was sure the Senator from Missouri did. This coin was composed partly of copper, and partly of silver, though not precisely one half of each; the Senator having suffered great injustice to be done to the silver, by permitting a great preponderance of copper, a very inferior metal, not recognised by the constitution as a tender. Now, Mr. W. would suggest, that if the Senator from Missouri would have coined a new species of billon, composed of gold and silver, precisely one half of each in value, would it not answer his purpose? Mr. W. would not warrant that it would answer, but would only suggest it to the consideration of the Senator from Missouri, as a substitute for his proposed entire equalisation of the circulation of gold and silver, by compelling the banks to redeem their notes in one half of each metal, especially as these banks might not find it very convenient to comply with these requisitions, and as a greater quantity of one metal than of the other might find its way, from time to time, out of the country, and thus destroy this metallic equilibrium of the honorable Senator.

Thus far the Senator from Missouri seemed to have confined his views to the exclusion of notes under twenty dollars in revenue payments. But, on the 10th of June last, he changed his position, and introduced into the Senate the following bill:

"A bill to re-establish the currency of the constitution for the Federal Government.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled bled, That bank notes and paper currency of every description shall cease to be received or offered in payment, on account of the United States, or of the Post Office, or in fees in the courts of the United States, as follows: of less denomination than twenty dollars, none after the 3d day of March, 1837; of less denomination than fifty dollars, none after the 3d day of March, 1838; of less denomination than one hundred dollars, none after the 3d day of March, 1839; of less denomination than five hundred dollars, none after the 3d day of March, 1840; of less denomination than one thousand dollars, none after the 3d day of March, 1841; and none of any denomination from and after the 3d day of March, 1842.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That any person holding an appointment under the laws of the United States, and any bank employed to keep public moneys, which person or bank shall neglect, evade, violate, contravene, or in any way elude, or attempt to elude, the provisions of this act, shall be guilty of an offence against the laws; and the person so offending shall be liable to be dismissed from the service, and the bank so offending shall, on satisfactory information, be discontinued as a depository of public moneys."

And here Mr. W. would remark that, by this bill, bank notes were permitted to be received in revenue payments until the 3d of March, 1842. If, then, the argument of the Senator from Missouri be correct, that to authorize, by act of Congress, the receipt of bank notes in revenue payments be a repeal of the constitution, this bill of the honorable Senator should have been entitled a repeal of the constitution until the 3d of March, 1842. The provisions of this bill were somewhat remarkable. All bank notes under twenty dollars were immediately excluded; the twenty-dollar notes, being the next greatest violators of the constitution, were executed in March, 1837; those of fifty dollars in March, 1838; those of one thousand dollars were reprieved till March, 1841; and in March, 1842, execution was done on all "bank notes and paper currency of every description," and "the currency of the constitution" was re-established. Now, how was this prodigious revolution to be effected? Why, by dismissing from office any officer of the Government who should receive or offer in payment any thing but gold and silver, by which all were to be excluded but converts to the metallic currency of the honorable Senator; and by discontinuing, as a depository of the public moneys, any bank which should commit a similar offence. Now, does any Senator believe that any bank would accept the deposits on such terms? That it must pay out the public moneys in nothing but gold and silver, and transfer the precious metals from place to place, thousands of miles, at the will of the Government. Recollect that not only "bank notes," but also "paper currency of every description," is excluded by this bill; and, consequently, bank drafts would be as effectually refused by this bill as bank notes. Indeed, the authority to receive "funds," Eastern or Western, from any bank, constitutes one of the Senator's objections to the bill of the committee. Let us suppose, then, that the Government has two millions in silver at Natchez, which it desires at four different points, each one thousand miles distant. Will it transport these wagon loads of silver from point to point, where the money is wanted by the Government? for, recollect the Government must have the hard money, for it is to pay out as well as receive nothing but this. Is this practicable, or is there a bank in the Union that would accept the deposits on such terms as these? The banks are to be continued by this bill as depositories of the public moneys, as the fiscal agents of the Government, and yet we are to reject the paper of our own agents. The amount of the public revenue of last year was forty-seven millions of dollars. Now, all this we are to intrust to the custody of the banks; we are to trust them to the amount of forty-seven millions of dollars, and yet refuse to receive any portion of their paper; or, in other words, trust them for forty-seven millions of dollars, and refuse them credit even for a twenty-dollar note. We are first asked to employ the banks as fiscal agents, and then set about the work of their destruction. Sir, the passage of this bill would insure the abandonment of the deposite bank system; and, as fiscal agents we must have, it would insure the re-establishment of a Bank of the United States, with all its oppressive powers. And here let me ask, can any thing be more inconsistent, as well as impracticable, than to employ the State banks as fiscal agents, as depositories of the public moneys, and yet reject their paper? If it be unconstitutional to receive one dollar of the public dues in the paper of any bank, is it not equally unconstitutional to make these unconstitutional banks, issuing this unconstitutional currency, our fiscal agents for the whole amount of our revenue, by bank credits? Under our deposite bill, when we confide money to a deposite bank, have we not previously taken its bond to repay? And if we take its bond, why not its paper? Sir, to carry out the gentleman's doctrine, he should discard the deposite banks as fiscal agents, and employ hundreds of separate individual agents, constantly traversing the country in all directions, with mules or wagons loaded with gold and silver. Such a system, and to this it would come, would require an army of agents greater than our whole standing army, to receive, transfer, and disburse, the forty-seven millions of gold and silver, the amount of this year's federal revenue. Such a system would enlarge the patronage and power of the General Government to an almost unlimited extent, and, if successful, paralyze the State Governments, by the destruction of State banks, State credit, and State institutions. But the whole system is impracticable; and it is time that the country should know that such is the opinion of the whole Senate, with the single exception of the Senator from Missouri himself. Sir, that Senator may rally three or four votes against the bill of the committee, but it will be from objections to the details of the measure, and not because they adopt the opinions of the Senator from Missouri on this subject. If the constitution is repealed by the reception of bank notes in revenue payments, why did the Senator from Missouri never come to the rescue till the 10th of June, 1836; and why did he then permit the session to pass by without any vote upon the measure; and why has he not reintroduced it at this session? The fact is, and the country should know it, that the Senator from Missouri can get no vote for this bill of his, except his own. Now, at this moment, he may bring it forward, or at any period of the session; we are anxious he should do so; and all we ask is a vote by ayes and noes, to show the American people that the Senator from Missouri stands alone on this subject. Now, the measure of the Senator from Missouri is not only impracticable, but defeats the great object of suppressing the small-note currency, and enlarging the circulation of gold and silver. The Federal Government, aided by its revenue, by the depositories of its money, and by State legislation, might gradually suppress all bank notes under twenty dollars, and gold and silver would then necessarily fill the vacuum, and constitute the common currency of the country in the ordinary transactions between the dealer and consumer. This would disarm the State banks of nearly all power to do evil, arrest excessive issues of bank paper, substitute gold and silver for all that great portion of the circulation of banks which consists of notes under twenty dollars, render and preserve the banks sound and solvent, our currency stable, and put an end to all apprehension of that explosion of the paper system with which many believe we are now threatened. This was a practical reform of the currency, and one which (Mr. W. said) he was deeply solicitous to see effected; but it can only be effected by the co-operation with Congress of the State Legislatures. The reform, too, must be by gradual and successive steps. Therefore, the bill only proposed the refusal of the five-dollar notes after the 30th December, 1839, and the refusal of the ten-dollar notes after the 30th December, 1841, periods when Congress will be in session; and if the States will not then co-operate with us in this reform, we must, as the representatives of their wishes, repeal or modify the measure.

But will the measure of the Senator from Missouri effect any useful purpose? It holds out to the State banks no inducements to suppress their small-note currency. It is a declaration of war by this Government against the people of the States and the banks of the States. It demands that, out of a gold and silver currency in circulation, of twenty-eight millions, (as estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury,) we should pay in this currency a revenue of forty-seven millions, according to the receipts of this year. It demands, then, an impossibility, unless an explosion of the State banks is created by draining them of their specie. It demands that this gold and silver be, at all the various points of collection or payment, at all times, in sufficient quantities to make these revenue payments and disbursements also. It would withdraw gold and silver from general circulation, and confine its use almost wholly to revenue payments and disbursements. It is, finally, an effort, on the part of this Government, to render all the notes of all the State banks uncurrent within the limits of the States, and is equivalent to a demand made by Congress upon the State banks to surrender their charters, or upon the State Legislatures to repeal them; and Mr. W. said he had never been authorized by the State of Mississippi to demand, in their name, a repeal or overthrow of any of their State institutions. To the extent that he was now willing to go, Mr. W. said he had distinctly expressed himself in an address preceding his election: in favor of the abandonment of the small-note currency, in favor of receiving the notes "for larger amounts" "of the solvent State banks," for "all dues to the National Government;" in favor of the enlargement of the circulation of gold and silver, and against "an exclusively metallic currency." Mr. W. said, having been elected with the open avowal of these doctrines, he hoped he stood not only upon the basis of his own previously expressed views, but also upon those of his constituents, in supporting the present bill, and opposing that of the Senator from Missouri.

It remains now to be shown (said Mr. W.) that this bill is in perfect accordance with the policy and recommendation of the President, and is similar to other measures which have received his sanction. In the message of December, 1834, the President declared as follows:

"The State banks are found fully adequate to the performance of all services which were required of the Bank of the United States, quite as promptly, and with the same cheapness.

"The attention of Congress is earnestly invited to the regulation of the deposits in the State banks by law. Although the power now exercised by the executive department in this behalf is only such as was uniformly exerted through every administration, from the origin of the Government up to the establishment of the present bank, yet it is one which is susceptible of regulation by law, and therefore ought so to be regulated. Those institutions have already shown themselves competent to purchase and furnish domestic exchange for the convenience of trade, at reasonable rates; and no doubt is entertained that in a short period all the wants of the country in bank accommodations and exchange will be supplied as promptly and as cheaply as they have heretofore been by the Bank of the United States. If the several States shall be induced gradually to reform their banking systems, and prohibit the issue of all small notes, we shall in a few years have a currency as sound, and as little liable to fluctuations, as any other commercial country."

Here are several facts and principles distinctly stated by the President. First, that the State banks could perform all the services required of the Bank of the United States. Second, that the deposits in the State banks should be regulated by law, and as little discretion as regards the banks left with the Executive as possible. Thirdly, the recommendation to the States of a gradual suppression of the issue of small notes, and the expression of the opinion that, with this reform, the State banks could furnish a sound currency. Now, all this is in exact concurrency with the bill of the committee, and directly contradictory of the views of the Senator from Missouri. So far from desiring the destruction of the State banks, the President considered their services indispensable, as depositories of the public moneys and fiscal agents. So far from opposing regulations by Congress on this subject, and restrictions of executive power, the President distinctly recommended it. So far from desiring the establishment of an exclusive gold and silver currency, and the exclusion of the notes of all State banks from revenue payments, the President desired only the suppression of small notes, and expressed the opinion that, with this reform, the State banks could furnish a sound currency, and of course safely and properly receivable in revenue payments.

Again, in the message of December, 1835, the President declared as follows:

"It has been seen that, without the agency of a great moneyed monopoly, the revenue can be collected, and conveniently and safely applied to all the purposes of the public expenditure. It is also ascertained that, instead of being necessarily made to promote the evils of an unchecked paper system, the management of the revenue can be made auxiliary to the reform which the Legislatures of several of the States have already commenced in regard to the suppression of small bills, and which has only to be fostered by proper regulations on the part of Congress to secure a practical return, to the extent required for the security of the currency, to the constitutional medium. Severed from the Government as political engines, and not susceptible of dangerous extension and combination, the State banks will not be tempted, nor will they have the power which we have seen exercised, to divert the public funds from the legitimate purposes of the Government. The collection and custody of the revenue being, on the contrary, a source of credit to them, will increase the security which the States provide for a faithful execution of their trusts, by multiplying the scrutinies to which their operations and accounts will be subjected. Thus disposed, as well from interest as the obligations of their charters, it cannot be doubted that such conditions as Congress may see fit to adopt respecting the deposits in these institutions, with a view to the gradual disuse of the small bills, will be cheerfully complied with; and that we shall soon gain, in place of the Bank of the United States, a practical reform in the whole paper system of the country. If, by this policy, we can ultimately witness the suppression of all bank bills below twenty dollars, it is apparent that gold and silver will take their place, and become the principal circulating medium in the common business of the farmers and mechanics of the country."

Here it is perfectly clear that the exclusion of the notes of the State banks from revenue payments, and the establishment of an exclusive metallic currency, were not contemplated by the President. On the contrary, his views were limited to the gradual suppression and disuse "of all bank bills below twenty dollars," as the only true practical reform "ultimately" to be accomplished. And how did the President propose accomplishing this reform? Why, by such regulations, by Congress, in the management of the revenue and custody of the deposits, as would prove auxiliary to State legislation in effecting this object. Now, is not the bill of the committee precisely in accordance with these views of the President? Does not this bill propose such regulations being made in the management of the revenue as will, if aided by State legislation, suppress the circulation of all notes below twenty dollars? And the bill of the Senator from Missouri is in direct opposition to this message; for, by the use only of gold and silver in revenue payments, he abandons all hope of so managing the revenue as to make it available in suppressing the small-note currency. The object of the President is the disuse of notes under twenty dollars, that of the Senator from Missouri the disuse of every thing but gold and silver.

Nor does the Treasury order in any manner contravene those principles, embodied in former messages. That this order was perfectly legal and constitutional, that it was in accordance with the discretionary powers vested in the Secretary of the Treasury by the joint resolution of 1816, Mr. W. said he never doubted; that the motives of the President in issuing this order were pure and patriotic was beyond dispute. The measure was evidently temporary, designed to repress inordinate speculations in the public lands; and it is expressly declared in the President's message to be of little importance, "if the lands were sold for immediate settlement and cultivation." That it never was designed to establish the principle of excluding bank notes from revenue payments is evident from the fact that payments of customs are received, as formerly, in bank paper. There yet remains one other evidence on this subject, which is conclusive. The fifth section of the act of Congress of June last, regulating the deposits of the public moneys, is in these words:

"That no bank shall be selected or continued as a place of deposit of the public money, which shall not redeem its notes and bills, on demand, in specie; nor shall any bank be selected or continued, as aforesaid, which shall, after the 4th of July, 1836, issue or pay out any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars; nor shall the notes or bills of any bank be received in payment of any debt due to the United States which shall, after the said fourth day of July, 1836, issue any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars."

Now, this act passed both Houses with unprecedented unanimity. In the Senate it was passed with but six dissenting votes, namely: Benton, Black, Cuthbert, Grundy, Walker, and Wright; not one of whom opposed it on account of the fifth section, but, as clearly stated at the time, because of the distribution principle contained in the thirteenth section. So far as the fifth section is concerned, the vote of Congress may well be considered as unanimous in its favor. The President, also, in his last message, in stating the reluctance with which he signed this bill, gives as the reason the distribution principle of the thirteenth section; but he thus distinctly eulogizes the provisions of this 5th section, as follows: "In the acts of several of the States prohibiting the circulation of small notes, and the auxiliary enactments of Congress at the last session, forbidding their reception in payment on public account, the true policy of the country has been advanced, and a larger proportion of the precious metals infused into our circulation." Now, the only act of the last session forbidding the reception of small notes on public account is this fifth section of this act, thus eulogized by the President and approved by him on the 23d of June last. Yet this very section is a repeal of the constitution, if the bill of the committee be thus truly designated by the Senator from Missouri; for both are laws, not resolutions, and both forbid the reception of small notes only.

Let us compare their provisions in this respect:

The bill of the committee declares: "From and after the passage of this act, the notes of no bank which shall issue or circulate bills or notes of a less denomination than five dollars shall be received on account of the public dues;" extending the prohibition, in December, 1841, to the notes of all banks issuing bills or notes under twenty dollars.

The fifth section of the deposit act declares: "Nor shall the notes or bills of any bank be received in payment of any debt due to the United States, which shall, after the said fourth day of July, 1836, issue any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars."

Where is the distinction, in principle, as regards the reception of bank paper on public account, between the two provisions? And the Senator from Missouri, in thus denouncing the bill of the committee as a repeal of the constitution, denounces directly the President of the United States. Congress, no more than a State Legislature, can make any thing but gold or silver a tender in payment of debts by one citizen to another; but that Congress, or a State Legislature, or an individual, may waive their constitutional rights, and receive bank paper or drafts, in payment of any debt, is a principle of universal adoption in theory and practice, and never doubted by any one until at the present session by the Senator from Missouri. The distinction of the Senator in this respect was as incomprehensible to him (Mr. W.) as he believed it was to every Senator, and, indeed, was discernible only by the magnifying powers of a solar microscope. It was a point-no-point, which, like the logarithmic spiral, or asymptote of the hyperbolic curve, might be forever approached without reaching; an infinitesimal, the ghost of an idea, not only without length, breadth, thickness, shape, weight, or dimensions, but without position—a mere imaginary nothing, which flitted before the bewildered vision of the honorable Senator, when traversing, in his fitful somnambulism, that tessellated pavement of gold, silver, and billon, which that Senator delighted to occupy. Sir, the Senator from Missouri might have heaped mountain high his piles of metal; he might have swept, in his Quixotic flight, over the banks of the States, putting to the sword their officers, stockholders, directors, and legislative bodies, by which they were chartered; he might, in his reveries, have demolished their charters, and consumed their paper by the fire of his eloquence; he might have transacted, in fancy, with a metallic currency of twenty-eight millions in circulation, an actual annual business of fifteen hundred millions, and Mr. W. would not have disturbed his beatific visions, nor would any other Senator—for they were visions only, that could never be realized—but when, descending from his ethereal flights, he seized upon the Committee on Public Lands as criminals, arraigned them as violators of the constitution, and prayed Heaven for deliverance from them, Mr. W. could be silent no longer. Yes, even then he would have passed lightly over the ashes of the theories of the honorable Senator, for, if he desired to make assaults upon any, it would be upon the living, and not the dead; but that Senator, in the opening of his (Mr. W.'s) address, had rejected the olive branch which, upon the urgent solicitation of mutual friends, against his own judgment, he had extended to the honorable Senator. The Senator from Missouri had thus, in substance, declared his "voice was still for war." Be it so; but he hoped the Senate would all recollect that he (Mr. W.) was not the aggressor; and that, whilst he trusted he never would wantonly assail the feelings or reputation of any Senator, he thanked God that he was not so abject or degraded as to submit, with impunity, to unprovoked attacks or unfounded accusations from any quarter. Could he thus submit, he would be unfit to represent the noble, generous, and gallant people, whose rights and interests it was his pride and glory to endeavor to protect, whose honor and character were dearer to him than life itself, and should never be tarnished by any act of his, as one of their humble representatives upon this floor.

When Mr. WALKER had concluded,

Mr. WEBSTER made some inquiries of him in reference to his understanding of the practical effect of the bill on banks issuing notes under the amount of five dollars.

Mr. WALKER replied that the bill had followed the language of the joint resolution of 1816; and, as there were different opinions as to the construction of that resolution, there might be as to this bill; but whether it were strictly mandatory on the receivers or not, he felt assured that it spoke a voice that would not be disregarded.

Mr. RIVES said that the provisions in this bill in reference to banks issuing small notes were the same with those in the deposit bill of last session, which he quoted.

Mr. WEBSTER said his only difficulty was respecting the receivability of the Virginia land scrip; if the bill was not peremptory on that subject, it ought to be made so. And for this purpose he introduced an amendment, declaring the Virginia land scrip receivable in payment of all dues to the Government; which was laid on the table.

Mr. BENTON, to show how the deposit bill was understood by those who executed it, quoted some bank returns from the Bank of Columbus, showing the issue by that bank of notes of one, two, and three dollars.

Mr. RIVES returned his thanks to Mr. WALKER for his able and satisfactory defence of the bill. He should not be able to add much to what had been said by the honorable Senator, but was desirous of adding his mite in reply to so much of what had so zealously been urged by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] as had not been touched upon by the chairman of the Land Committee; and, as he understood there were gentlemen on both sides of the question who were desirous of being heard, he suggested the propriety of deferring further debate on the bill to Monday. This was, after some conversation, agreed to.

THANKS TO THE VICE PRESIDENT.

Mr. BENTON introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate cordially reciprocate the sentiments of personal kindness expressed by MARTIN VAN BUREN, Vice President of the United States, towards the members of this body, upon taking leave of them; and that the thanks of the Senate be presented to him, in testimony of the impartiality, dignity, and ability, with which he has presided over their deliberations, and of their entire approbation of his conduct in the discharge of the arduous and important duties assigned him as President of the Senate.

Mr. B. suggested the propriety of taking up the resolution and acting upon it at this time.

The CHAIR stating that this could only be done by unanimous consent,

Mr. CALHOUN objected.

Mr. BUCHANAN expressed his hope that the resolution would be acted on at once.

Mr. CALHOUN inquired whether it was usual to pass a vote of this kind.

Mr. BENTON quoted several precedents to show that it was; whereupon

Mr. CALHOUN, observing that it was a mere formality, withdrew his objection; and the question being put, the resolution was agreed to, nem. con.

Mr. CLAY moved to take up the memorial from the Colonization Society, presented by him on Friday last, expressing the hope that there would be no further debate upon it, and calling for the yeas and nays on the question of taking up; which were ordered.

The question was then tried, and decided in the negative, as follows:

TREASURY CIRCULAR.

The bill to designate and limit the funds which shall be receivable for the public revenue was taken up as the special order, and

Mr. RIVES addressed the House at length in its support, and in reply to Mr. BENTON.

Mr. MORRIS said: I shall vote against the passage of this bill for many and various reasons; but the belief that it violates the principles of the constitution, and is in derogation of the rights of the States, are paramount to all others. That its principles are drawn from a dangerous and mistaken policy, I have no doubt; and that its passage will be productive of mischief, not benefit, is, to my mind, equally clear. After the long discussion which has taken place on all these topics, by the oldest and ablest members of this body, it may seem like arrogance in me to attempt to intrude my opinion on the Senate at this late hour of the debate. I have been a patient and, I trust, not inattentive listener to this whole discussion; and there are some points on which neither side have fully satisfied my mind; and I shall occupy the time of the Senate, for a few moments, not in an argument to prove, or an attempt to prove, the truth or fallacy of any position which has been assumed, but in an opinion only on the doctrines and principles of the bill. That certainty and uniformity are essentially necessary to the existence of any Government, will, I presume, not be denied; and that they are vitally so in the administration of this Government, which is one of laws and limited powers, is, to my mind, beyond controversy; and in no part of our system is the necessity of that certainty and uniformity so apparent and needful as in the circulating medium or currency of the country. This word "currency," if we were to judge of its meaning and import from what we have heard in debate on this bill, is a word of undefined and undefinable meaning.

We have been told of a gold currency, or rather a metallic currency, a paper currency, the currency of one State and the currency of another, and even of a currency in kind in the collection of revenue. In this war of words and phrases I shall not engage; as a member of this body, acting for the whole people of the United States, under the constitution of the United States, I shall take that instrument alone as my guide, and recognise no currency as legitimate but that which it establishes; and I am not in this case left to implication or construction, but feel that I am standing on safe and sure ground. So important was a standard for the value of property and labor thought to be by the framers of the constitution, that they provided in express terms for such standard, by declaring that Congress should have power to coin money, and regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin; and, in the very next sentence, they provided for the exercise of power by Congress to punish for counterfeiting the current coin of the United States. Money, as the word is used in the constitution of the United States, must be understood as a definite and technical expression; it means gold and silver only, as formed and fashioned into shape and size by the order of that part of our system of Government possessing the full attributes of sovereignty, and having bestowed upon it arbitrary or positive value. Congress is authorized to borrow money on the credit of the United States. Without this special grant, Congress could not exercise the borrowing power at all. Can Congress, then, borrow any thing but money? I presume not. Under this grant to borrow money, Congress cannot borrow goods and chattels, cannot borrow horses, cattle, or any other merchandise; nor can Congress, as I contend and believe, under this grant to borrow, obtain bank notes of any description; for if Congress cannot borrow goods and chattels, which contain within themselves an intrinsic value, and money being made the standard of that value, surely they cannot borrow bank notes, which in themselves contain no intrinsic value, but are mere credit, and the representative of money, in place of money being the standard of their value. If Congress, then, have not the power given them by the constitution to borrow bank notes, I contend they cannot exercise it; for the expressive grant to borrow money excludes the exercise of all power to borrow any thing but money; and if Congress cannot borrow bank notes, I contend that their reception in any other manner, as a part or whole of the revenue necessary for the support of this Government, is equally forbidden. I believe that to allow bank notes to be received in the collection of the customs, or in payment for the public lands, is in fact, to all practical purposes, to require your officers so to receive them; and that each is equally prohibited by the constitution.

No one, I presume, will contend that Congress can borrow money for any other purpose than that for which they can collect money from imports; when in the Treasury of the nation, it is all a part or parcel of the revenue of the country. It follows, then, most clearly and conclusively to my mind, that what Congress cannot borrow they cannot collect as taxes, duties, imports, or excises, because, under these heads, is the whole power of Congress to raise means for the support of this Government circumscribed; the receiving money for the public lands, or any other property belonging to the United States, I consider as falling under that class of collections embraced in the word "duties." I therefore consider this bill, which allows bank notes of any description, or under any circumstances, to be received in payment of any debt or demand on this Government, to be entirely incompatible with the constitution itself.

There is another view of this bill which, to my mind, makes it equally objectionable on constitutional grounds: it is its dangerous interference with the power and rights of the States. State banks, like all other State institutions, belong exclusively to the States, and cannot rightfully be made subject to any other than State legislation; Congress, therefore, cannot exercise its moneyed power, a power which is derived from the people of the States, to induce any portion of that people, or a corporation created by themselves, to exercise their powers differently from that which the laws of the State permit or require, and thus supersede State laws by the acts of Congress in measures which are purely local State concerns. What does this bill provide? That the paper of certain State banks shall be, or, if you please, permitted to be, taken in the payment of the revenue of this Government, on condition that such banks will adopt certain regulations which Congress shall prescribe. It is true that we do not attempt any coercive power over the banks, but we make use of moneyed power, a power often far more dangerous and destructive to the rights of the country than force itself. That money is power, is an established maxim. We, then, offer the State banks the keeping of our money, and of course its use for the time being, provided they will conform to certain regulations which we prescribe. Is not this a palpable interference with State sovereignty, and of course a violation of the constitution of the United States? It seems to me there can be but one answer to this question. It is no removal of the objection, at least to my mind, to say that the banks will make the regulations required by this bill by contract; this view of the subject rather increases the objections. Corporations derive all their power of action from their charters alone. If I may use a figurative expression, they can only live and move therein; they cannot contract away any of their powers, nor can they acquire new power by contract—I mean the power of action as corporations; yet, if Congress can contract with State banks, who, by the grants in their charters, have power to issue one, two, or three dollar notes, to forego that power, and issue no notes of a less denomination than five dollars, I cannot see why Congress cannot extend the contract to the issuing of notes of any amount whatever, or even to the buying up the charter itself, and thus defeat the very end and object of the institution; and this right of Congress can be extended so as to put an end to all power of State legislation over an institution created by the State for wise and valuable purposes. But, sir, I object to this whole policy of bargaining with State institutions, or with citizens of a State, for any part or portion of the State sovereignty. If you can do it in one instance, you can do it in all instances; and the State Governments will be less than the corporations which they have created, when you take those corporations into your keeping for any purpose whatever. Sir, I regret, I deplore, the constant tendency which I witness here to extend the action of this Government into the orbit of State power; you prescribe oaths and forms for the settlement of disputed claims, and the rights of property, between citizens of the same State; you authorize your courts to take cognizance of and punish offences which are properly cognizable in State courts, and punishable by State laws; and you invite the citizens of the States to come to you in their primary assemblies against their own Government; thus unceasingly, as time is bringing all things to an end, are you putting an end to the sovereignty of the States. How soon we shall find a grand central Government in the ten miles square is not for me to conjecture; but against this whole process I do, as a Senator in the Congress of the United States, enter my most solemn protest.

Mr. President, I trust I shall not be considered as departing from the plan which I had marked out for myself on this occasion, by a brief notice of some of the arguments I have heard on this question. It will be remembered that they commenced with the introduction of the resolution offered by my colleague to rescind the Treasury order of July last, requiring money payment for public land. The argument in the early stages of the debate was directed against the power of the President to issue that order; as I have no doubt that the power was constitutionally exercised, and as that part of the argument seems to have been abandoned, I shall not now notice it. There is one feature, however, of that argument deserving a passing remark. It has been said by gentlemen that they could not support the resolution of my colleague, as they consider, in doing so, they cast censure on the President; but the bill now before the Senate is to accomplish the same object—a repeal of the order—though by different words; yet it seems to have their undivided support. For my single self, I am unable to reconcile this apparent incongruity; but if the implication of censure can in any case be a reason for our course here, it ought to operate most strongly when it is calculated to censure the constitution of the country and the policy of the States. The President, I am sure, cannot thank his friends for their reasons; if any part or parcel of his official conduct cannot be supported on principle, he will never ask that it shall be excused in pity; he well knows that we take our seats under the solemn injunction of an oath to support the constitution, but not the administration; that is matter of choice, not of obligation; and he has too high a regard for the constitution to tolerate for a moment a friend who would sacrifice it for his personal or official favor. But, sir, I return from this digression. It was so thrown in my way that I could not well get round it, but was compelled to take up and remove it. The arguments on the bill before us are what I have now to do with. I shall consider them as they occur to my recollection, not having taken notes at the time, as I did not then intend or expect to speak on this question. In support of the doctrine of the bill, it has been contended that Congress have the power to take, in payments for any dues of the Government, articles in kind such as to them may seem proper. To this doctrine I can never assent, except gentlemen can prove that Congress have the power to make money of wool, or leather, or any other chattel. I mean, to consider and receive these articles as money; for I hold that, by the constitution, Congress can collect the revenue of the Government in nothing but money. If they, then, can, by the magic of their power, transmute a yard of broadcloth into money for the time being, and receive it for the duty payable upon the whole piece, the argument is good, but not otherwise. I think this an important branch of the subject, and ought to be well considered; and although I may not be able to add a new idea, or advance a single additional thought, yet I consider it a duty not to conceal my opinion. I hold that the Government of the United States has not the power to possess itself of any property whatever by contract, or purchase from individuals or corporate bodies, but such only as is necessary and proper to carry on the functions of the Government. Congress cannot barter with individuals even for that; they may sell their own property, constitutionally acquired, and with the proceeds, money of course, purchase what they may need.

Congress cannot receive the real estate of the Government debtor, or of a defaulter, in the payments of such debts or default; because Congress cannot, without the consent of the States, purchase any land within their respective jurisdictions. The reason is obvious; for the exercise of exclusive authority over the rights of individual property within its jurisdiction is essential, I may say vitally so, to State sovereignty. The primary disposal of the public domain acquired by treaty with other nations, or by cessions made by States, which is, in fact, the same thing, is clearly within the power of Congress; but having once disposed of the soil, this Government can never resume those rights without the consent of the States in which the land is situate. If, then, Congress cannot receive in payment of taxes, imposts, or excises, the real estate of the person who owes such duties, and thus enter the arena with the land speculator, much less can we receive, for the dues of the Government, hats, shoes, clothes, wines, sugars, or any other duitable article, for the amount of duty due by the importer; if it were otherwise, the Government has the power to enter into competition with any of her citizens in the general trade of the country—a power in fact to become a dealer in slaves, so long as slaves can be considered property. I understand this power as contended for: I mean the general power to purchase or receive property for its dues, or even apply the revenue of Government for that purpose. Viewing it in that light, it is a power at which I revolt, and one to which I am sure the people of this country would not, for a moment, submit. It was this glaring absurdity (at least to my mind) that induced me vote at the last session against the bill for the purchase of stocks with the surplus revenue of the country; and I confess I heard the other day, when the bill for advancing to claimants under the French and Neapolitan treaties their dues was under consideration, not only with surprise, but with astonishment, the principle advanced, that, as we had a surplus of money on hand, it was improper we should suffer it to lie idle in the Treasury; that if we could make three or four per cent. by making advances to these claimants, it was wise and proper to do so; that we had the power, and it was prudent so to invest this money that it would be productive; that when we came to appropriate by law, we should find its quantity increased. I do not pretend to give the exact words, as used in the argument, but I feel sure that I remember them substantially. I endeavored at the moment to realize in my own mind the practical operation of the rule. I well remember of mentally asking myself if this doctrine be true; if we can take the whole of the surplus money in the Treasury, send our agent into the New York market, and purchase the entire stock of broadcloth or tea on hand. This would no doubt be a safe and sure investment, and one by which this Government could not only make four per cent. per annum, but probably from twenty to fifty per cent. in a few months. I did not hesitate a moment in deciding that we had not the power; and if we had, however advantageous to the Government it might be, it would be most grossly unjust. I am still unable to see any difference in principle between power to receive or purchase cloth, and the power to receive bank notes. Bank notes, being but mere evidences of debt, are, or ought to be, less the object of our care than things of more substantial value. There is another objection to the receiving of bank notes, as contemplated by this bill: it is the odious doctrine of preference which it contains; and that preference is not matter of law, but matter of discretion, given by law to the officers and agents of Government. If this bill is not obnoxious to the words of the fifth paragraph of the ninth section, first article, of the constitution, it falls clearly within the reason of that paragraph. No preference shall be given, by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another. Suppose we should read, no preference shall be given by any regulation of revenue to the banks of one State over those of another. Would not such reading appear to be founded on equally reasonable and just principles? I should think so. Does not this bill claim the power, if in fact it does not expressly authorize its exercise, to make this preference? If you can make a discrimination in bank notes at all, if indeed you can designate what are specie-paying banks, as the phrase is, you can make any other designation or discrimination you please; and thus, in the regulation of the revenue, give a preference to one bank over another, or to the banks of one State over those of another. A proposition so plain, and a practice so unjust and absurd, must strike every mind, at the first view, as highly improper, if not unconstitutional.

But the principle that the Government shall undertake to discriminate between the bank notes of different banks has been, and still is, productive of much injury to the paper circulation of the country, as created by the States. It has been often said, and I admit its truth, that the currency of our country, as it now exists, is a delicate subject to touch, and that one jar vibrates through the whole machinery. If the Secretary of the Treasury, or even a collector, acting for the Government, should refuse, after the passage of this bill, to receive the notes of any bank, that bank, however solvent, thus coming in contact with the power of this Government, would receive a shock from which it would not easily recover; and the blow thus inflicted would be felt throughout the system; hence the contractions by banks, and the difficulties in the country, which, it is said, the late Treasury order created. I would, then, make no discrimination, no regulation, as to the currency of the country created by the State banks; because, in the first place, I believe Congress has not the power to do so; and, in the next, if the power was admitted, it would be unwise and unjust to exercise it. Can any one doubt for a moment, when he calls to his mind past experience of the action of this Government upon the paper system of the country as it now exists, that if we wish uniformity, stability, and equality in value, in that system, we must leave its entire regulation to the power that created it, for that is the only power that can effectually regulate it.

But, sir, we have other reasons urged upon us in support of the passage of this bill, which, to my mind, are most extraordinary, but still leaves the bill liable to all the constitutional objections to which I first supposed it. It is said that we must form a connexion with the State banks; that they are absolutely necessary as fiscal agents of the Government; and that it follows from necessity that, in that connexion, in some degree, we must exercise the power of regulation. The premises here laid down I conceive to be founded in error. This Government has, within itself, sufficient power to carry on its own operations by its own means; if it is necessary to lean on the State banks for support, we must admit that the removal of that support, which is entirely within the power of the States, would at once check, if not prostrate, the action of this Government. It has been said, with much emphasis, that we who are for cutting loose this Government from the State bank are in favor of re-establishing a Bank of the United States. This rattletrap, used for party purposes, has lost its effect, at least upon me. Opposed to the whole banking process, and unwilling to recognise the existence of banks, or bank notes, by any action of this Government, as either useful or necessary institutions, is a strong objection I entertain against the present bill; but I contend that, if banks are absolutely necessary as fiscal agents of the Government, (which I by no means admit,) if we can adopt a State bank for that purpose, we can create a bank by an act of Congress for the same purpose; for the power to adopt and use most certainly acknowledges the power to create; and I would at once give my vote to create such fiscal agent for the use of this Government, rather than adopt a whole litter of State banks for that purpose.

It has been said in the course of this debate that Congress have the power to receive any article they may think proper in discharge of the dues of this Government. This doctrine places Congress above responsibility—a doctrine I cannot admit; and to me it appears perfectly clear that Congress have no power to receive any thing but money. If Congress could authorize the reception of articles of what kind they pleased, they surely would have power to provide for the payment of demands against the Government in the same manner. We should, indeed, present to the eyes of our constituents a strange spectacle, if, under the operation of this bill, we should provide for the payment of salaries due the different officers in bank notes, to one officer the notes of one bank, to another the notes of a different bank, and so on, parcelling out our power to men and banks to an almost infinite extent. No man will, I presume, deny but we can do this, if we have the power to authorize the reception of bank notes in the collection of the revenue. The whole scheme, sir, is wrong. Nothing can be paid but in consequence of appropriations made by law, and nothing can be appropriated but money, and bank notes are not money.

It is further said that this is an executive measure; that it is in accordance with the views of the President to aid the States in restoring a metallic currency, by the suppression of small notes. However much I may respect the opinion and views of the President, and I have been the constant and uniform supporter of the great measures of his administration, yet I cannot admit that these talismanic words, "the President says so," shall govern all my actions and votes here; and I shall take the liberty on this, as on all other occasions, so to act as my best judgment informs me will be most conducive to the interest of the country. Andrew Jackson, sir, the friend of banks! Andrew Jackson the friend and advocate of the paper system—a friend of paper currency! I cannot, I will not, believe it; such an idea is at war with the entire course of his administration, and inconsistent with all his opinions on this subject, as I have read and understood them. Sir, I hold the present bill to be not only repugnant to the opinions of the President, but the whole code of Virginia doctrines on the subject of State rights; and I have been both surprised and pained that this bill should come from a Senator of that State. I may be asked, what course do you propose? My answer is, that I would repeal the resolution of 1816, permitting bank notes to be received in payment of the revenue, because I view that as I did the provision of the bank charter passed by Congress the same year, permitting or allowing the notes of that institution to be received, as both unconstitutional. But both these violations of the constitution were justified, as the bill now is, on the ground that the peculiar situation of the country and the necessity of the times required the act to be done. Indeed, I have heard some gentlemen admit that the necessity of the case in 1816 had changed their previous opinions on the question, that Congress had not power to charter a bank, and they now deem them erroneous; thus suffering necessity to change the fundamental law of the country; a most dangerous error, as necessity is always the plea of tyrants. I here drop my hasty remarks on the constitutionality of the measure proposed by the bill before us; and the reasons which in my mind apply to its constitutionality are equally strong against the policy of the measure. A discrimination made by the order and under the authority of this Government, as to what bank paper shall be received, and what rejected, must necessarily produce an unsettled state of the currency that is created by the States. The power of the States to create this currency I do not mean to question, by its admission or denial. I have heard various statements, as to the amount of bank notes in circulation, made by different gentlemen on this floor. I have heard it rated at from three hundred to near a thousand millions of dollars. I do not pretend to any accurate knowledge on the subject; take a medium amount, say five hundred millions. It seems to me the argument is fallacious, that assumes the idea that this vast mass of circulation can be materially affected by the collection of the revenue of this Government in money only, say twenty millions, which ought to be the largest sum in time of peace, and which is collected and paid during the same year. If Congress should adopt this course, it seems to me that the different State banks could at once arrange their business to this state of affairs, and it would tend to give stability, permanency, and equality, to their issues. The rates of exchange between different portions of the country would become known and settled, and these continual fluctuations and jars respecting the moneyed system would entirely cease, and thus all classes of society be benefited; for it seems to be an admitted fact, that nothing is more injurious to the general prosperity of the country than these continual fluctuations. I would, therefore, leave the collection of the revenue precisely where I find it left in the constitution, and in all laws and proceedings of Congress at an early day, wherein provision is made for the collection of revenue or the disbursement thereof. I would use no other word than "money," or "current coin," without giving any description or definition of the words used.

As to the effects produced by the Treasury order of the 11th of July last, or the popularity of that measure in the Western country, I have little to say; and perhaps I ought not to take up the time of the Senate, after what I have said on the other branch of this question; but I cannot entirely agree with my colleague as to either. Property is at a very high price; and if the measure was somewhat unpopular at first, I am inclined to believe that it is now more favorably received. That it has produced some salutary effect upon the banking institutions of the West, I have no doubt. It has checked their over-issues; but that, if continued, it will still be beneficial, I have great doubts. Hoping and believing that some more salutary regulation than that contemplated by this bill can and will be brought forward, I shall vote against its passage; and, in doing so, I hope to be understood as neither censuring, applauding, approving, or disapproving, the course taken by the President in this matter.

Mr. WEBSTER said, when the resolution moved by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] to rescind the Treasury order of July last, was under discussion, I expressed the sentiments which I then entertained, and which I hold now, in regard to that measure. My great object, as I then said, and now say, is to get rid of the order. I was not, and am not now, very solicitous as to the particular mode. When the subject was sent to the Committee on the Public Lands, (though my own impression had been that it should have been referred rather to the Committee on Finance,) I assented, in the hope that they would confine what they should propose to the single object of getting rid of the order. But for that order, I presume that few would have been willing to touch the subject at all. The majority of the Senate were content that matters should have remained as they were under the joint resolution of 1816. But as the order interfered with the provisions of that resolution, it was deemed necessary that something should be done. I regret that this bill is not such a one as was called for by the exigency, and confined to the exigency. It goes beyond what was needed, in important respects, and, though I most cordially wish for the abolition of the Treasury order, there are some things in this bill which do not accord at all with my own view of what the public interest requires. I feel, therefore, somewhat at a loss to know what is the true line of my duty on this occasion. I will state my difficulties. In the first place, I see nothing in the bill that is fixed and stable, defined and determinate; nothing peremptory and decisive, as matter of law. I asked the honorable chairman who reported the bill, whether he understood it to be peremptory in its character, and would be so in its practical effect, or not? And his answer was, that he did not doubt that its operation would be to produce a great reform in the state of the currency. Now, what I want to know is, whether this bill will furnish the country with a legal statute rule as to the payment of debts; or whether the whole matter will not be left very much in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury? I think it leaves too much in that discretion. It provides that he may issue orders as he may deem necessary, in order to secure the collection of the revenue in specie and bills of specie-paying banks. Now, supposing the Secretary should not think that any further order of any kind is necessary? Then matters will remain precisely as they are now. Suppose he should believe one kind of order necessary for one part of the country, and another for another part? The bill would allow all this. It secures no uniform or certain rule.

Again: the particular provisions of the bill appear to me (with great deference) to have been not well considered. If its enactments amount to a positive statute, (and not a mere permission or recommendation,) then neither land scrip nor revolutionary scrip can be received for the public lands; or, if they can be received for the public lands, they can equally be received for the customs. This, I presume, was not intended. The bill is imperfect; it imposes no duty on the Secretary, it enacts no law to supersede a Treasury order; the whole subject is left within the discretion of the Secretary.

While, on the one hand, it does not directly relieve the country from the existing illegal and unconstitutional Treasury order, on the other, it does not provide a circulating medium which shall be uniform and legal in its character. Could we say, in so many words, that all the debts of this Government shall be collected in such mode as the Secretary of the Treasury shall think best? Or that such funds shall be received as the Secretary shall think most expedient, with a view to increase a specie circulation? thus presenting a mere indication of the object he is to have in view, and leaving all the rest to him. Would that be law, would that be constitutional? What sort of a tender might a debtor of the United States make, under this law, in discharge of his debt? Suppose he tenders Virginia land scrip, and the answer given him is, "the Secretary of the Treasury has not issued any order that land scrip shall be receivable at the custom-house," would that not be a good answer? As this bill repeals all other enactments in pari materie, does it not refer the whole to the Secretary? May he not issue one order to-day, and another to-morrow? One order in the Northwest, and another in the Southwest? It is surely most important that, on such a subject, there should be a plain, settled, statutory provision, declaring what is receivable in discharge of debts due the Government, so that men may know what are their rights. To me it appears that, by this bill, in its present form, the whole subject is left in greater doubt than before. If we do any thing with a view to rescinding the objectionable order, let us have a bill that shall apply to the exigency, to that single object, and give the country some uniform and stable rule. If we reject the Treasury order, let us re-enact the resolution of 1816; that will get rid of any thing like rebuke or reproach in regard to the order, and will give us at least a law to guide us. As the bill stands, it leaves every thing in the will of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he agreed entirely in the view presented by the Senator from Massachusetts. This bill left that which should be the most stable of all, the most unstable. If the Senate would indulge him by postponing the subject till to-morrow, he would endeavor to present his views upon it.

Mr. BENTON suggested that it be made the order for to-morrow at one o'clock; but the form of the motion was, for some technical reason, changed into laying the bill for the present upon the table.

On this Mr. WALKER demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered and taken, stood: Yeas 29, nays 18. So the bill was laid on the table.

their children, to be patented when they should come of age—

After some desultory conversation, an attempt was made to postpone the bill to to-morrow; but it failed: Yeas 18, nays 27.

The question being then taken, the amendment of Mr. BUCHANAN was agreed to, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Ewing of Illinois, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, Knight, Lyon, Nicholas, Norvell, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Southard, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Walker, Wall, Webster, White—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Fulton, Grundy, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Moore, Morris, Niles, Page, Preston, Ruggles, Tipton, Wright—15.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the bill was then further amended, so as to allow no one to enter a tract in his own name until he is 21 years old.

Mr. CLAY then renewed the motion formerly made and withdrawn by Mr. MORRIS, to strike out the 4th section of the bill, including the whole pre-emption clause, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. MORRIS supported the motion.

Mr. NILES opposed it.

Mr. CALHOUN and Mr. CLAY spoke with warmth against the unlimited pre-emptive rights conferred by the bill, and Mr. SEVIER and Mr. WALKER replied in defence of this section, with which, as Mr. W. declared, the bill must stand or fall.

Mr. MORRIS now moved an adjournment, (it was five o'clock;) and on that motion Mr. WALKER demanded the yeas and nays; which being taken, stood: Yeas 23, nays 22.

So the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 31.

JOSEPH NOURSE.

The Senate proceeded to the reconsideration of the unfavorable report of the Committee of Claims on the claim of Joseph Nourse.

Mr. CRITTENDEN briefly advocated the claim, stating that it rested on extra services of the claimant, he having, for a number of years, performed the duties of a disbursing officer, in addition to his regular employment; and that the claim had been allowed by a judicial tribunal.

Messrs. LINN and PRESTON explained the grounds on which the unfavorable report had been made; Mr. P. stating that the committee thought there ought to be a general law regulating cases of this kind, and that the committee were embarrassed by the fact that a decision unfavorable to the claim had been made by a co-ordinate branch of the Government, in such a way as to be imperious if not binding on Congress.

Mr. HUBBARD opposed the claim; and the report, on his call, having been read,

On motion of Mr. LINN, it was ordered to lie on the table.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill to prohibit the sales of the public lands, except to actual settlers, and in limited quantities, was taken up as the special order, the question being on Mr. CLAY's motion to strike out the 4th section, which contains the pre-emption principle.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, said that he perfectly agreed, with some of the friends of the bill who had addressed the Senate, that this clause did not essentially differ in principle from the other provisions of the bill. If the clause were more objectionable, it was in the extent and not in the character of its operation. The whole bill, he said was one to encourage a system of fraudulent speculation, partiality, perfidy, and plunder, in which those who had the least conscience would make the most money. He had waded through all the various amendments made and proposed, and thought he now understood the character and objects of the bill as amended; and, if it were to pass in the present, or any form likely to be proposed, he cared but little about the details; and perhaps the worse its provisions the better it might ultimately prove for the country. Thus being opposed to the whole objects of the bill, Mr. K. said he would take the occasion to make some remarks upon the general subject, before the question should be taken on the fourth section of the bill.

It was not likely (at least he hoped not) that we should have, strictly, a party vote upon this question. It was one of those measures, of which we had had too many in our country, which proposes bounties and advantages to some sections of the country at the expense of the remainder. That such legislation should be popular with those who expected to be benefited by it, was not at all surprising. But that those whose constituents were to be despoiled by the unjust and unequal operation of the measure, should quietly submit to it, ought not to be expected. Yet it is a melancholy truth, said he, in the history of human affairs, that such are the hidden cheat-eries by which the machinery of legislation is frequently made to transfer the labor of one class of citizens into the pockets of another, that it often happens that the most partial, unjust, and unequal legislation is precisely that which obtains the most positive popularity, and does most credit to those who may happen to propose it. The reason, he said, was obvious. These partial benefits were plain and palpable. They were felt by the favored, and perceived by every one, whilst the injury and injustice to the great mass of the community were more widely diffused; and, being somewhat of a negative character, are not so easily perceived or estimated. But (said Mr. K.) I doubt very much whether either the ignorance or the apathy of a majority of the people of the United States, and particularly of the old States, will be sufficient to protect this measure against that discontent which the gross injustice of it is so well calculated to engender.

Mr. K. said that, as the basis of all just remark upon this subject, it should be constantly recollected, as it had been repeated, that the public domain was a public fund; as much so as the public money in the Treasury of the United States. It should, therefore, be administered and distributed among the people with as much equality as was consistent with a fair administration of the laws. It had been truly said that a large portion of this public domain had been purchased with the common blood and the common treasure of the people of the old thirteen States. In obedience to this feeling, and in answer to the petitions of their fellow-citizens of the other States of the confederacy, the people of these States, who had the exclusive right and jurisdiction over this property, had generously surrendered it for the common benefit of the whole. Another large portion of this property, he said, and much the largest undisposed of, had actually been purchased with money from the common Treasury; money which had been collected by actual taxation upon the consumption of the people, and which, it must be admitted, had borne most heavily on the people of the old States. One would suppose, when we looked at the history of this property, when we saw from what source it had been derived, and with whose labor and money it had been purchased, that it would be considered sufficiently generous, in all conscience, to allow to the new members of the confederacy an equal participation in this great national partnership fund, when they did not, as members, bring a dollar into the concern.

Public Lands.

This equality he did not complain of, and no one complained of it, but it had never been considered as sufficient; and, accordingly, millions upon millions had been lavished upon them, from time to time, in one form or other. When we consider the choice selections they had been permitted to make; the twelve or thirteen millions of acres of land alone that had been given to them were probably worth one hundred and fifty millions of dollars, or a sum nearly double what had ever come into the Treasury from the entire sales of the public land since the commencement of the Government. Well, one would suppose that those enormous bounties, at the expense of their fellow-citizens of the old States, would satisfy the most voracious appetite. But not so. For their advantage, solely, the public land had been put down, and kept down, at one tenth of its value, as compared with lands of equal quality in the old States of the Union. This fact had just been admitted by one of the friends of the bill. The result was precisely what might have been expected. The annals of time furnished no instance, either parallel or approximate, of equal rapidity in growth, wealth, population, and prosperity, to that exhibited by the junior members of the confederacy. On the other hand, history furnished few examples, under free government, of such premature old age, decrepitude, and decay, as that which was exhibited by some of the old States of this Union. Costly dwellings were seen mouldering into ruins, and plantations that should still be valuable were left to wash into ruts and gullies, and grow up in briars. Sir, said he, it is enough to make the heart of any patriot from one of the old States bleed to travel through this favored region, and compare its condition with the impoverished home he has left. But how could it be otherwise, with this heavy bounty, furnished at the common charge for the exclusive benefit of a small portion of the States?

Mr. K. had hoped, at least, that these manifold bounties, and this contrast so melancholy, and the truth of which all must acknowledge, would have softened the hearts and stayed the hands of those who seemed determined on the destruction of the old States: but not so; they were still unsatisfied. Emboldened by their own strength, derived from the munificence of those they despoil, and by the weakness of the latter, occasioned by the same cause, and with the aid of a few unnatural allies, they now boldly come forward and claim, for their exclusive benefit, the whole of this immense national fund. Nay, said he, a great deal more than this; for he would infinitely prefer an entire surrender of the whole of the national domain, and get rid of the expense, and these eternal torments and importunities, than to see this bill passed upon the people of the old States. If the law should be honestly enforced, the proceeds of the sales would not pay the expenses or our land machinery; certainly not, if we included the Indian treaties, Indian wars, and Indian annuities, which were all fairly chargeable to this account. Thus losing the whole of this immense property, the old States would be farther burdened with the expense of parcelling it out to others. If the law should be evaded, the sales would be something larger, but the profits on speculations would be an exclusive bounty to crime, and a premium to ingenious and fraudulent speculation.

And yet we are told, said Mr. K., that we must go for this measure because it is an administration measure. In its present form he did not believe it was so. He knew the pre-emption clause was not, as all knew that nothing was more abhorred by the Executive than that unjust and odious feature in the bill. But, said Mr. K., however this may be, do not talk to me of administration measures, whilst you have got your fingers in my pockets, or the pockets of my constituents. Take them out, sir, and then we can better reason the matter. Insert some equivocal provision; mantle the bill in some obscurity; afford some temporary refuge for reason, whilst fancy may be called in to promise some distant hope of a possible advantage to the old States, to compensate them, to some extent, for the enormous sacrifices which you propose to force upon them. Do not, said he, insult us with this plain project of taking money from the pockets of one class of citizens and putting it into those of another.

Sir, continued Mr. K., the people of Georgia, that greatly wronged, much abused, and much injured State, yielding to the claims of their fellow-citizens of the other States, with whom, in a common cause, they had marched through the perils of the Revolution, generously surrendered to the United States (with reservations too insignificant to notice, when compared to the value of the whole) two of the finest States in the Union.

This territory, if disposed of to the best advantage, would have freed the State from taxation to the end of time. Though millions of it had been squandered upon squatters, relinquished to speculators by the relief law, and otherwise prodigally disposed of, the past and future receipts from it would likely be near one hundred millions of dollars. And yet the people of Georgia, to whom this immense property once exclusively belonged, are hereafter to be virtually deprived of all participation in it, as a common interest to the confederacy. Her citizens are to be deprived of the poor privilege of buying it at the price fixed by the Government, to which it was gratuitously given. The honest planter, with a growing family of sons, with prudent foresight, looking forward to the period when your unnatural combinations and legislative plunder may render his impoverished State an unfit habitation for man, cannot provide for them a few sections of land in a more favored State, without submitting to ceremonies and restrictions which, to an honest man, will render the privilege worse than a mockery. He must stand by, said Mr. K., and see this property tied up by narrow, contracted, partial legislation, into a bundle of bribes and bounties, calculated and intended to drain the resources and consummate the ruin of the State whose generosity furnished the means of perpetrating the injustice. Sir, said he, when the people of Georgia send me here to plunder them, and not to protect them, I may think of the proposition, but not before.

What were the reasons urged for this partial and oppressive measure? Interest was sufficient to address to some; party, perhaps, to others; but what were the reasons addressed to those members from the old States who were disposed to stand up for the rights of their constituents? Why, they were the great and threatening evils of a redundant Treasury. It was strange this measure had not been urged with such zeal, for these reasons, when there was some necessity for it. Where was this surplus now, or from whence was it to be derived during the present year? Gentlemen had shown commendable caution in making, or rather in not making, calculations on this subject. No one had descended to the use of figures but the Senator from Mississippi; and he, Mr. K. thought, contrary to his wont, upon grave matters, had been a little flighty upon this subject. The Senator had estimated a future annual surplus of 20 millions of dollars, and that, without this measure, 80 or 100 millions of acres of the public lands would pass into the hands of speculators in the next four years. And what was the basis of his estimate? Why, he had taken the proceeds of the last year, (about 25 millions,) and made them the basis of his estimate for the next four years. The Senator might just as well have anticipated in 1813, that because Napoleon Bonaparte invaded Russia with an effective army of 400,000 fighting men, he would be enabled to make the same effort annually for the remainder of his life. It is certainly, said Mr. K., a logical mode of reasoning, to say that what happens one year may, under the same circumstances, happen the next; but single instances are not always followed by their like; and there are extraordinary causes operating in finance and speculation, as there are in war, and almost every thing else.

What, then, said Mr. K., are the probable causes to which we are to attribute the extraordinary results in the sales of the public lands in the year 1836, and the year preceding? If the causes are of a permanent nature, the results may be relied upon as the basis of future estimates; if they be only temporary, have ceased to exist, or are rapidly passing away, all reasoning on such premises is more delusive than demonstrative.

Mr. K. then proceeded to enumerate some of these causes. In 1834 it was settled that the charter of the Bank of the United States would not be renewed. The removal of this institution (of which he did not wish to be understood as complaining) had encouraged in the country hopes of great profits by banking, and we had accordingly been inundated with an uncontrolled, unregulated flood of paper money, issuing from the sluices of five hundred new banks, with additional supplies from the old ones; and in the last four years the currency of the country, including specie, according to the most probable computation, had a little more than doubled. Was this a permanent state of things? Did we expect that our currency was to double every four years?

Well, continued Mr. K., what was the natural consequence of this sudden and extraordinary inflation of the currency? It was a spirit of speculation and over-trading, which reached public lands as well as private lands, and private lots, and every species of property that was a subject of bargain and sale. This spirit had extended to unbroken forests, as well as towns, cities, and villages. It embraced the poor pine lands of Maine, as well as "Jackson city," on the Potomac; a city which, in the spirit of the times, after the lots had been disposed of, was commenced and finished in a single day. These wild speculations, extending to every thing, were the inevitable consequence of this great redundancy of the currency: for money was unlike most other commodities in the extent of the demand for it. There was no certain limitation on the demand except that which was found in a limitation of the supply. So general was the disposition to make money without labor, that men would always be found to adventure in speculation when they could procure money with facility.

Mr. K. said that this redundancy of the currency had, moreover, been sustained, by concurrent causes, (some of them not dependent on the markets of this country,) for an unusual length of time, without a reaction. In the first place, said he, it has so happened that the increased demand for our principal exports has gradually increased in value for the last three or four years. The value of our exports each year, for that period, has been an advance on that of the year preceding. As a general rule, with the advantage of such progressive increase in the value of exportation, it is impossible to create a demand for the exportation of specie whilst such increase continues. But, unfortunately, this has not been the only means by which we have increased the debits of our foreign account. Look at our foreign account for the year 1836—one hundred and seventy-four millions of imports, and one hundred and twenty-two millions of exports; leaving a balance of fifty-two millions against us, deducting only our portion of the profits of trade. These profits could not be safely put down at more than twelve or fifteen millions, leaving a probable clear balance against us of forty millions of dollars. And yet, he said, the exchanges had continued in our favor, indicating a favorable balance. Sir, said he, what sort of a balance is this? It is not a balance on the exchange of valuable commodities. It is the deceptive balance of the borrower to the lender. If, said he, you be a man of fortune, and I be without fortune, yet, if I borrow all your money I will have plenty of money and you will be destitute, though the richer man of the two. And if it be necessary for you to send the money you loan to me from Alabama to Georgia, my note, sent to you in exchange for it, produces precisely the same effect upon the exchanges between the two States as if I had consigned to you the value in valuable commodities.

By just such means have we indicated a favorable balance against Europe. Instead of the produce of industry, we have sent about forty millions in notes, bonds, stocks, and State securities, and, the exchange being in our favor, we have imported the return in specie. So that we have not only borrowed forty millions to sustain our currency in the single year of 1836, but we have borrowed that amount in specie to aid in sustaining a paper issue. What was the result of all this? Why, the result of the extravagant speculations growing out of a redundant currency, and that redundant currency, sustained and kept up by the means adverted to, had been a large surplus treasure deposited in the deposit banks. The interest of these banks required that they should make the most of the deposit; and, to do this, they would naturally prefer loaning to speculators in the public lands, as they were certain of a return of the deposit. To this large deposit, Mr. K. thought, might be attributed, perhaps, the whole increase in the sales in 1836 over the sales of 1835, which increase was about $10,000,000.

Now, continued Mr. K., these are the principal causes, I apprehend, of the extraordinary results in the proceeds of the sales in 1835-'36. Are they permanent? Can their continuance be relied on as the basis of future estimates? If not, these calculations of twenty-five millions a year from this source, hereafter, are mere delusions, and cannot safely be taken as the basis of important legislation. Let us look, then, at the last cause first: the surplus revenue in the deposit banks, amounting to forty or fifty millions during 1836, is now sinking under the operation of the deposit law, and, in the course of the year, will entirely disappear. This great cause is, then, rapidly passing away. Next, as to the condition of the currency, generally—the primary cause of speculation. Is it to be sustained by causes heretofore operating? Can it be propped up any longer by borrowing from Europe? On the contrary, we find the resource of borrowing entirely cut off, and the moneyed interests in Europe have taken steps to stop the exportation of specie to this country. And such is the state of the money market in Europe, that it is likely all stocks sent there on pledge will be returned for redemption, and all loans falling due will be pressed for payment. The most favorable view of this branch of the subject is, that the principal of our European loan cannot be increased; and even if our whole credit there be continued as a loan, the interest hereafter must be added to the other side of the account; and the rise in exchanges will probably soon call for an exportation of specie.

In the next place, have we any hope of assistance from an advance in our exports? On the contrary, all accounts concur in sustaining the Secretary of the Treasury in his opinion, that in this there will be a very heavy decline. We have, then, none of the extraordinary means of sustaining over-issues, which we have commanded heretofore. Sir, said he, I am no practical merchant, no practical banker, and do not profess to be high authority on these subjects. He wished to create no panics; and had too little confidence in his own judgment to make any positive prophecies. But if he possessed the ordinary faculty of connecting effects with their causes, where the connexion was obvious, he thought we had the facts before us, from which we might reasonably apprehend one of the most tremendous explosions that ever afflicted any commercial people. It might be averted or postponed, but no prudent and experienced financier, he thought, would act on the presumption that it could be entirely avoided, or even postponed to a very distant day.

There was another reason, Mr. K. thought, for a diminished estimate in the sales of the public lands; and that was the very fact upon which high future estimates had been made. He alluded to the great quantity of land lately taken up on speculation. These lands, he said, were doubtless the best selections, and nearest to the settled parts of the country, and the quantity was sufficient to anticipate the demand for actual settlement for twelve or fifteen years. When the spirit of speculation had ceased, these lands must come extensively into competition with the Government, and diminish the Government sales. It was a great mistake to suppose that large land companies or speculators were in the habit of holding up their lands at exorbitant and forbidding prices, that a large and unproductive property might be sold and settled by posterity. They had, generally, neither the power nor inclination to do so. They could not obtain very large profits whilst the Government was in free competition with land of equal quality and at as low prices. Mr. K. mentioned several instances where investments in Alabama, in 1820, on speculations, had yielded only an interest on the investment, and in some cases not even that. He also stated that some of his friends had gone to Mississippi during the late land sales, and had purchased the choice selections, from a large supply held by a land company, at a moderate advance on the original cost, and had preferred purchasing of these companies to taking their chances at the sales. Operating upon a large scale, a small advance per acre affords a handsome profit, though generally less than is paid to "land hunters," for selecting and locating in smaller quantities. As much of the money with which lands have been purchased on speculation had been borrowed, Mr. K. thought many purchasers would, from necessity, come into competition with the Government, at something like Government prices. But, if we restrict the competition of Government, we give a monopoly to previous purchasers, and probably secure to them very heavy speculations. Such inconvenient restrictions on the Government sales must make the fortunes of those who have already invested largely in the public lands. However this might be, he said, the large quantity in the hands of individuals, which had rapidly accumulated there from temporary causes, must come very largely into competition with the Government sales.

Mr. K. also briefly alluded to the probable independence and settlement of Texas, at no distant period. If this should occur, there would be a large body of the finest lands in the world, opened at fifty cents per acre. This temptation would carry off thousands of our emigrating population, and reduce the demand for settlement and cultivation. This, he said, was a contingency, to be sure; but every argument at all bearing upon the subject should be noticed, when there was a proposition which virtually gave up this immense property of the people, as a common property, and distributed it in bounties and benefits. Upon the whole, Mr. K. concluded that, when we examined the causes of the extraordinary amount derived from the public lands during the last two years, and that those causes were passing away, and presenting considerations upon which we should greatly reduce a future estimate, the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury was much more probable than any other by which it had been attacked; it was the estimate of an experienced and practical financier, and gentlemen could not and did not attack it by reasoned calculations, but flourished over it without the use of a single figure.

But, said Mr. K., I can tell gentlemen, for their consolation, that they shall not escape so easily in this matter. They shall come to the point, and submit to an examination of figures: yes, and those, too, figures of arithmetic, and not figures of rhetoric. They shall either shut their eyes, refute or admit, or the only avowed motive by which they justify their votes for this flagrant robbery of the old States shall be taken from them without their consent.

Mr. K. said he would now proceed to show what foundation there was for an alarm about a surplus in 1837, which was the only ground upon which any member from an old State dare to place his vote to plunder his constituents. He would first attempt to do so by that slighted report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which gentlemen could run over, but could not reason down. He would then look at the account as it would stand, even if the Secretary was as far mistaken as gentlemen supposed.

What, then, continued he, according to this estimate, will be the cash resources of the Government for the year 1837? The Secretary estimates them at twenty-nine millions—that is, five millions retained in the Treasury of unexpended appropriations, and twenty-four millions as the receipts of the year. From what source is this twenty-four millions of income to be derived? Let us examine each item, and see how far the estimate can be attacked in detail. The first item is for customs, sixteen million five hundred thousand dollars. Was that too low? The customs produced more last year; but last year the importations had been swelled by temporary causes, such as the great destruction by the New York fire, a spirit of speculation, &c., and could not be relied on as the basis of future estimates. The estimate made by the Secretary might be a little too high or too low. It was more than we derived from the customs in 1834, when the duties were higher than they will be in 1837, and no practical financier, at the head of the Department, would have considered it safe to calculate on a greater revenue from this source. This item, however, had not been attacked, and might therefore stand admitted. The next item was two million dollars from the stock of the Bank of the United States: nobody had questioned this item; we might get more than this from the bank in 1837, but at the same time we might not get a cent. At any rate, this was not a permanent source of income; it was a part of our capital. That item not being disputed, time need not be wasted upon it. The next item was five hundred thousand dollars for interest, and other small matters, about which there could be little mistake. The next item was that of the public lands, five million dollars, which was the principal subject of attack. On that item, in addition to what he had said, he would only here remark, that it was more than the public lands had ever brought into the Treasury in one year, except in the years 1835 and 1836. And if the causes of the extraordinary results in these two years had been shown to be of a temporary character, no higher estimate could have been safely relied on.

The account, then, stands thus:

From customs,	-	-	-	$16,500,000
Bank stock,	-	-	-	2,000,000
Interest on money from deposit banks, &c.	-	-	-	500,000
Sales of public lands,	-	-	-	5,000,000
				$24,000,000
Reserved in the Treasury of unexpended appropriations,	-	-	-	5,000,000
				$29,000,000

JAN. 31, 1837.]

Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

This is the sum, then, to answer the calls of the Government in 1837. What are the charges upon it? In the first place, in round numbers, the appropriations, new, transferred, and permanent, for 1837, as estimated, are - $26,000,000
 Unexpended appropriations - 14,000,000

Leaving us indebted to appropriations, at the end of the year 1837, - - $11,000,000

It will be seen from this that, even if there remain unexpended appropriations in the Treasury, at the end of 1837, to the amount of $14,000,000, that is, a sum as large as remained at the end of 1836, (a very improbable event,) then we shall have only $3,000,000 in money to answer the demand, and will owe still $11,000,000 more than we have money in the Treasury to pay. But if there should remain in the Treasury, at the end of 1837, a much smaller sum, say only $9,000,000, (a result much more probable,) why, then, we should have to call on the States for $2,000,000, and would still owe $9,000,000 to appropriations beside.

The above, Mr. K. said, would be the probable state of the account, provided the estimates of the Secretary were correct, as well in appropriations as receipts. Should we, then, appropriate what was asked by the Government? He saw no disposition to vote less, and particularly by those most in favor of this bill; and on this subject he would only further remark that, for many years past, Congress had uniformly appropriated from two to four millions more than was asked by the Government, and the last year we had appropriated about ten millions more.

But it was said the Secretary was in error in his estimate of the proceeds of the public lands. Very well, let us view the matter with that admission. How much was he wrong? It seemed to be a private sentiment with some, that, as the deposits would not be removed entirely till the end of 1837, and money might be made more plenty in the States by distribution, the speculations might continue sufficiently, during 1837, to bring into the Treasury ten millions. There was some reason in this; and for such gentlemen we would put down ten millions, and say the Secretary has erred five millions. What then? Why, we would still owe six millions at the end of 1837. Did any one, except the Senator from Mississippi, ask more than this? If so, give them fifteen millions, and we would still owe one million to appropriations; and even carry the amount to the twenty millions, (a sum to which it could only be carried by a race of the imagination,) and we should, even then, only have four millions in the Treasury unappropriated. This was a sum with which we should never be discontented, and to get rid of which he would never adopt any extraordinary measure. It was a sum we had often had in our Treasury, and which was calculated to do no injury or create any alarm.

The only object, then, which members from the old States would avow to justify this outrage upon their constituents, was entirely swept from under them by mathematical demonstration. If there were any error in this calculation, let gentlemen show it. There was no danger, however, that gentlemen would even attempt this; for, except by general assertions and sweeping estimates, it was a branch of the subject they seemed anxious to smother. In the very sweeping glance of the only Senator who had touched it, he took scarcely a notice of expenditures, nor did he even notice that we owe fourteen millions to unexpended appropriations. The truth was, he said, that the bill was supported by a strange and unnatural combination. Supposed interest was sufficient for some; the influence operating on others he would name, and perhaps did not know; and others were actuated by motives they did not think proper to avow. He said it could not be disguised, and ought not to be denied, that the only object of one influence exerted in favor of this bill was to draw back the money deposited with the States, and indirectly defeat the deposit bill. That this must be the effect of the measure was inevitable, unless the expenses of the Government could be greatly reduced, which no one had suggested was immediately practicable. And why this persevering opposition and untiring antipathy to the deposit bill? No one regretted the necessity for that bill more than he did at the time, and no one who voted against the bill was more opposed to raising money for distribution, or to a policy of distribution. But this was an extraordinary measure, to meet an extraordinary emergency. We found thirty or forty millions in the Treasury more than was required for the purposes of the Government. The question was not so much how it was raised, as what should be done with it. If it had been improperly raised, that was no reason why it should be improperly wasted, or disposed of in a manner to produce the greatest evils. To continue this amount in the deposit banks was acknowledged, even by the opponents of the bill, to be altogether intolerable; the President himself had acknowledged this; and yet the opponents of the bill, though full of objections, had no plan except to allow the money to remain in the deposit banks, where they acknowledged it was ruining the currency, and would ruin the country. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] had a plan, to be sure, and that was to raise the expenditures of the Government, and expend the surplus in fortifications, armories, arsenals, &c. The great objection to this plan was that in expending the surplus, merely to get rid of it, we should have laid the foundation of a permanent expenditure, inconsistent with the economical habits of our people, and with the simplicity of our republican institutions. The tariff would have been raised in a few years, instead of reduced, and the burdens of the people unnecessarily increased, to keep up a scale of expenditure established by a prodigal expenditure of the surplus. For you might as well undertake, said he, to reduce the natural stature of man without the use of violence, as to undertake to reduce the expenditures of a Government after they are once fixed. England had tried that. In vain have the retrenching members of her reformed Parliament, in their patriotic efforts, appealed to the expenditures of 1797, (thought then to be an extravagant period,) and showed that the present expenditure is, in some instances, near three times as much for the same service. Each branch of the service has influence or tact enough to preserve itself from encroachment; and every expense is made to appear necessary, because it has become habitual. He was sorry to say that the increase in the expenditures of some branches of our own service taught a similar lesson. These (said Mr. K.) were the objections to the useless expenditure of the surplus, by the General Government. The expenditure of the surplus would only have been the beginning; the end would have been a heavy permanent expenditure.

Again, this plan of extravagant expenditure was no remedy for the evil. The labor could not have been commanded, or the work performed, with any regard to durability or economy, with sufficient rapidity to have made any effectual impression on the surplus for several years; and this plan would have been just equivalent to giving the deposit banks a warrant to keep it for three or four years: for the revenue would have accrued nearly as fast as expended. It would be perceived that fourteen millions remained unexpended, though we ap-appropriated last year thirty-four or thirty-five millions. If we had appropriated sixty-four or sixty-five millions, as we were asked to do, the unexpended appropriations would have been probably double.

Public Lands.

This plan, then, was neither acceptable nor effectual, and no other plan seemed so effectual and so just as the plan that was adopted. This money was in the Treasury; it belonged to the people; and was not needed for the public service, and could not be permitted to remain on deposit without great and acknowledged evils. To give the people the use of it, with some regard to equality, until needed for some really national purpose, was certainly the most just to the people, whilst it was most effectual in avoiding the evils complained of. Not the least evil of leaving this immense surplus on deposit would have been to make it a subject of continual scramble for partial and useless appropriations, in which the least scrupulous would have succeeded best.

Mr. K. repeated that this surplus rightly belonged to the people of the States, who should be permitted to retain it until wanted for the real purposes of the Government; and no necessity should be created, by a measure of injustice, to call back this money. The money had been raised by the unexpected and unprecedented sales of the public land, and had not, properly speaking, been raised by taxation upon the people.

Even if this surplus money, he said, had been raised by taxation improperly, it would have been better to have returned than wasted it. A great deal of slang had been used to create a prejudice against the distribution or deposit bill, by reprobating the idea of taxing the people to return the money to them under a system of distribution. It perhaps never occurred to those wise lecturers that the customs for the last three years had not paid the expenses of the Government, or any thing like it; and this moment, but for the extraordinary proceeds of the land sales, there would have been no surplus, and the Treasury would have been bankrupt. No human foresight could have foreseen or prevented this surplus. It could not have been done without an entire repeal of the tariff two years ago; and if any man had proposed an entire repeal of duties two years ago, on the ground that the lands would bring into the Treasury forty millions the next two years, when they had never before produced more than three or four millions a year, he would have been pronounced a madman.

And, as to "a system" of distribution, nobody, he presumed, ever thought of a system. The object was to provide a present remedy for an already existing evil, not to raise or create a surplus for future distribution; and he had voted to encrease on the appropriations, by dividing a part of the unexpended balance, that it might be unnecessary to repeat this, or adopt any other extraordinary measure, to dispose of a future surplus.

The surplus already divided would do a great deal of good, if it could be permitted to remain with the States. In ten years it would change the face of this continent, and gentlemen are very much deceived if they believe the measure unpopular with the people. They well understand their rights in this matter; and, as the money arose from the sale of the national domain, in which the people of the States have an equal interest, they consider themselves fairly entitled to this money until the Government really needs it. Believing the Government would probably never need it, they have projected improvements on the faith of it, and, although they will return it cheerfully if actually needed, they will never willingly return it to answer a necessity created by an unjust and odious measure for the express purpose. It is the only farthing, said he, that the old States have ever received from this immense property, once their own. Millions upon millions, on the other hand, have already been lavished upon the new States, and we now propose to take back this pittance, that we may be enabled to give away the remainder.

Though this distribution or deposit bill, he said, was the only measure which could have relieved us from the difficulties of an overflowing Treasury, with any tolerable justice to the people, yet he respected the motives of those who originally voted against it. His honorable colleague, whose integrity and patriotism needed no encomium from him, had voted against it. He respected his motives, and had no reason to believe that his own were not, in return, duly appreciated. The measure was a novel one, and those who had not fully examined and deeply reflected on the absolute necessity of it might well have doubted the policy of the experiment. But the measure had passed, the Treasury was relieved, and the money was generally well employed. And, as the money arose from the sale of property, under extraordinary circumstances, and not by taxation, there was no sort of danger from the precedent. Some were much alarmed for the morals of the people, which they affected to think were much endangered by the use of a little of their own money. To these conservators of the public morals, he would only suggest the danger of being told by the people, that they might be, perhaps, as well employed in taking care of their own. This money, he repeated, would generally be employed to good account, and he thought it a mistake to suppose that it would even be popular in the new States to recall this money for the benefit of speculators and squatters: for the bill would be extremely confined in its benefits; and he doubted whether, in the aggregate, any new State would be materially benefited by it. It would greatly limit the quantity of land sold, but much increase the profits of speculators, by confining it very much to those who would not scruple at frauds and false oaths to evade and violate the law. Like most unjust measures, based on wrong principles, it would inflict injury on some, without a corresponding advantage to others. It was ruin to the old States, and of doubtful benefit to most of the new. Even the large speculators, so much denounced, conferred many benefits on the States in which they purchased, to compensate for any supposed inconvenience they occasion. They are men, often, of capital and enterprise, and project and execute the most important internal improvements in the country. They carry out good industrious settlers, and sell them portions of the land at fair prices, in order to improve the value of the remainder; and not unproductive squatters, who may be hired to sit down in the shade to secure a valuable pre-emption to be sold on speculation.

Mr. K. said he had consumed so much more time on the general subject than he intended when he arose, that he would be brief upon the clause which it was proposed to strike out. He said that he should vote to strike out this pre-emption clause, not that it varied much in principle from the rest of the bill, but just upon the principle that he would vote to strike out the whole bill. The whole bill was one for the establishment of a system of fraudulent speculation, and he would vote to narrow it down by striking any and every clause from it, till it might entirely disappear.

This motion had, he said, again given rise to a great deal of eloquence on the high virtues of squatters. A happy talent that, possessed by his friend from Mississippi, of being eloquent just as well on one subject as another. A real genuine squatter was really one of the driest subjects for eloquence that ever presented itself to the mind of any orator. If he were going, he said, to work himself up into a paroxysm of eloquence, a squatter was about the last subject he should select to stir up this emotion. He would as soon go to the penitentiary to select subjects for canonization, as to go among the squatters to inspire him with eloquence. He should not know on what point of a squatter's character to become pathetic, and would, therefore, be constantly in danger of crying at the wrong place. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER] might produce impressions on some generous hearts by his imaginary pictures of the humble virtues of these law-breakers. But, if so, it must be upon those who know nothing about them. There might be some exceptions, but take the border squatters as a class, and they were certainly the most worthless set of men who have any claim to the honors of being American citizens. They were mostly an idle, profligate set of men, who hover along the frontier settlements, with their heads full of all sorts of schemes for living without profitable labour. They are, said he, men frequently who find it very convenient to be exempt from the operation of the laws, both civil and criminal; they therefore generally keep beyond the organized limits of the country. They produce not the worth of a dollar to add to the exports of the country, and they consume nothing that pays a tax to the Government. They perform no civil duties, and discharge none of the obligations of society. They penetrate beyond your borders, often in the neighborhood of Indian tribes, or among them, and, by squatting upon the land of the Government, and stealing their provisions from the Indians, they literally live by unlawful depredation. They are the very men who provoke most of your Indian wars, which cost us millions of money, and many lives better than their own. Where is their merit, to give them this heavy claim to favor over the rest of the citizens of the country? Yet, they come here asking heavy rewards for crime, and large premiums for a violation of the laws. Yes, and gentlemen, with the evidences of outrage in the very petitions they present, press their claims upon the sympathies of the Senate by fancy pictures of the humble virtues of the industrious poor. The honest, laborious cultivator of the soil appeals to you to protect him against the avarice and rapacity of the odious speculator. Why, sir, said he, such is the influence of language upon the thoughts of men, that to the mere force of names and epithets may perhaps be attributed three fourths of all the error and delusion by which the views and sentiments of men have ever been misled. Something like an excitement has been got up in the chamber, by applying epithets to men entirely inconsistent with their character. Men who violate the laws, trespass upon the public property, and treat the authority of the Government with habitual contempt, are here christened the hard-handed, honest-hearted cultivators of the soil, deserving the peculiar favor of the Government, whilst the orderly citizen, who keeps within your surveys, complies with all the formalities of your laws, and buys what the Government has to sell, at the price the Government fixes on it, is branded as an avaricious speculator, a land glutton, an odious character, who deserves some signal mark of the displeasure of the Government and country. Great merit is claimed for these hardy yeomanry who penetrate the wilderness, and select and settle upon the choice spots, before the lands are brought into market; the dangers they encounter and risks they run, in making these settlements, are supposed to entitle them to these choice selections, on which they make such enormous profits as soon as the pre-emption is secured. Why, sir, the midnight house-breaker might just as well insist that he had an honest claim to all the property in the house, to compensate him for the risk of breaking in. Did any body suppose a squatter ever "penetrated the wilderness," in advance of the surveys and settlements, from patriotic motives? Who told them to suffer these dreadful privations? We forbid them by law; and yet, to make large speculations with little or no labor, they patriotically violate the law, and then claim to be rewarded for it. These great cultivators, he said, pioneered for us without our consent, selected all the choice spots, mill seats, water powers, town sites, &c., and so soon as they secure a pre-emption, and sell out for enormous profits, they patriotically "penetrate the wilderness," endure dreadful hardships, and, for the good of their country, squat down somewhere else. The Senator from Ohio, from actual observation, had given us an idea of the farms of these cultivators, and which was shown also, to a great extent, by documents from the land offices, and notoriously true. They build a three-cornered pen, (a square pen being too onerous,) and sow it in grain, or they plant a few stalks of red pepper or tomatoes. This crop is recommended, by not requiring a close enclosure, and because it will grow in the shade; for these public benefactors, who make such sacrifices for the good of the country, are often too lazy to belt a sapling. By these picked settlements they often make enormous profits for themselves, or those capitalists who have hired them to squat. It was, he said, emphatically, not a system of settlement and cultivation, but of squatting and speculation. These selections, made in this way before the country is brought into market, frequently sell for a profit of five or ten thousand dollars; (these prices he had known given in a few instances himself) and in one noted instance a million and a half is the estimated value. Why give to a few adventurers, whatever might be their character, such an immense advantage over the rest of their fellow-citizens? By the way, Mr. K. said, good humoredly, he hoped his friend from Connecticut [Mr. NILES] would not be permitted to vote; his head had evidently been turned by the prospects of large profits from that squatting speculation. Without some insensible influence, he could not see now it was possible for any member from an old State to vote for this bill. The Senator had very candidly confessed to us that one of his friends, "a shrewd fellow," had been following the new surveys, and, having selected about fifty valuable tracts to be secured by squatting, had marked the name of his friend upon a tree, to secure one of them for him. And he (Mr. K.) would venture that, if this bill passed, his friend would have his pen and his pepper upon it in less than six months. And Mr. K. would venture further, that the whole fifty tracts would be secured under the law; for one regular branch of these pre-emption speculations was carried on by those "shrewd fellows," who furnish the capital and enlist regiments to secure these valuable selections by pre-emption claims. But it was said the object of this bill was "safely guarded by oaths," &c. Yes, by oaths; and of what account were oaths against these immense bounties to perjury and corruption? Had we not sufficient trial of the efficacy of these oaths already? The object and language of the pre-emption laws heretofore passed, he said, were as plain as need be; and yet we see how settlements have been made, and are also officially informed that there are bushels of contradictory affidavits in the land office, exhibiting a mass of corruption & disgraceful to the country, embarrassing to the whole department, and requiring additional labor to settle the conflicting claims. It will be recollected, too, that we never hear of these corrupt evasions of the law except in cases of conflict among the scramblers themselves, or between one of them and a regular entry. The whole system, he said, was wrong in principle, demoralizing in practice, and a gross fraud upon the orderly citizens of the United States. If the object was only to enable the poor cultivator to get a home at $1 25 per acre, and not to favor these "shrewd fellows" and idlers, who wish to speculate on their settlements without labor, where was the necessity for these unfair preferences? There were, he believed, about one hundred and twenty millions of acres now surveyed, and subject to private entry. These lands they can enter according to law. Are they not good enough to settle? Why, the Senator from Mississippi has just told us that these lands are worth so much more than one dollar and twenty-five cents, that, unless we pass this law, they will be sacrificed, and go into the hands of speculators in a few years. Yet these lands, though many of them are worth ten times the Government price, as stated by the Senator from Mississippi, are not a sufficient bargain to satisfy the claims of these voluntary pioneers, whose patriotism and unceasing regard for the interests of their country results in such happy speculations for themselves.

Mr. K. said he was somewhat apprehensive that the Senator from Mississippi would make a spirited reply to him in defence of the squatters; and as he was very anxious to prevent such a prodigal waste of the eloquence of his friend on so unworthy a subject, he would just admit, for all the purposes of the question, that these squatters were as good as the rest of their fellow-citizens. Were they any thing better? If they be poor and laboring men, are they any better than the other poor and laboring men throughout the Union, who have equal claims to the national domain? Is there any thing so peculiarly praiseworthy in a violation of the laws and the perpetration unauthorized trespasses, as to claim the peculiar favor and patronage of the Government?

These pre-emptions (Mr. K. said) were a source of endless confusion as well as corruption, and were a perfect nuisance to the land office. He had received a letter a few days ago, from a citizen of Missouri, which he had intended to read, as a sort of instruction to his friends from that State. He had mislaid it, and, as it bore so strongly on the subject, he was fearful some friend of pre-emption had committed a theft upon him. However that might be, the writer stated, among other things, that it was very desirable to put an end to this odious system. That it was unfair and unjust to other citizens, and created great embarrassment in the regular entries. This latter statement, he said, was only what we already knew from official documents. The truth was, that persons making entries did not sometimes see or hear of the pen, and entered the land, not knowing that there was any pre-emption claim on it. This produced a conflict, which was sent here for settlement; thus greatly embarrassing the duties and increasing the labors of the department.

The whole system, in any way it could be regulated, was wrong, from beginning to end. It was a bounty to idleness and vice, a cheat upon the honest citizen, and a nuisance to the Government. He should vote to strike out the clause; and he would vote to strike out any and every other clause, until the whole had disappeared. He was against the whole bill, and the whole object of the bill, because it parcels out a common fund among speculators and squatters. Because it virtually invites a scramble for our great national domain, in which those who have the least merit will make the best speculations. The sales on speculation will be reduced in quantity, but the profits will be enormously increased, and very much confined to the least worthy, who will not scruple at fraud, perjury, and evasion. Because it is a gross injustice to the old States to deprive them of an equal participation in this national domain, depreciate the property of their citizens, and drain them of their wealth and population. Because there is really no necessity, or even apology, for the measure—a large surplus the present year being next to impossible. Because in no view of the subject can the pretended emergency be more than temporary, and of very short duration; and it is the worst of policy to legislate upon great abiding national interests upon every trifling or temporary occasion. It unsettles property, creates speculation, renders judgment and experience of no value, makes every thing depend on the chances of legislation, and keeps the property of the country continually changing hands. For these and many other reasons that might be given against a bill that had not one single recommendation to compensate for its enormous injustice and the many evils that would grow out of it, he should vote to strike out the fourth clause, and against the whole bill.

Mr. BAYARD said that he had listened with great delight to the Senator from Georgia, who had given a true exposition of facts, as connected with the speculations going on in public lands, and the effects which would result from passing this bill. Mr. B's first objection to the section proposed to be stricken out was, that it changed the whole policy of the Government in regard to the public lands, binding the Government to make them a source of revenue. His second objection to the bill was, that it was holding out an encouragement to the people of the old States to leave their homes, and go where a population was not wanted.

Mr. B. read a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury at the last session, by which it appeared that the whole amount of lands surveyed in each State and Territory was 166,970,000 acres; that there had been sold 44,000,000 some odd hundred thousand acres; and the consequence was that no less than 122,000,000 remained subject to private entry. But what did this bill propose to do? It proposed to open all the unsurveyed lands to emigrants. Not less than from 170,000,000 to 200,000,000 acres of unsurveyed lands were to be thrown open to the people, to go and settle upon where and when they pleased.

Mr. B. next adverted to the price of the public lands, and asked the Senator from Mississippi whether, taking the whole of them together, they could be valued at no more than $1 25 per acre? and then argued that the effect of the bill was nothing less than to offer a temptation to the people of the old States to go West. The bill, too, was unequal in its provisions, and the inevitable consequence would be, should it pass, that those living in the neighborhood of the public lands would get hold of all the choice land. And they would have a decided advantage over individuals coming from the Eastern States, because they possessed that local knowledge of the best lands which those from a distance had not; for they had not had the opportunity of finding them out, not having lived in the neighborhood of the lands. In fact, he looked upon the bill as opening a door to fraud, and offering a bonus to the population of the old States to remove to the West.

Mr. TIPTON vindicated the conduct of some of his constituents, against whom he considered the Senator from Georgia [Mr. KING] to have made charges, as connected with their having settled on the public lands. He had done great injustice to Mr. T's constituents, by placing them on the same footing as squatters. Mr. T. went on to show wherein his constituents differed from those who purchased lands when the Yazoo country was in the market for sale. What! (he inquired,) are these men to be denominated thieves and robbers? The honorable Senator had done them great injustice; and he felt certain that, did he know the true state of the facts, he would not have made so serious a charge as this. With regard to the section under consideration, he would vote against it. Indiana had nothing to hope or to fear from it. She would be glad, however, if the old pre-emption were revived; and if Congress desired that the frauds which were said to be perpetrated in the purchase of the public lands should cease, let them graduate the price.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, made a few explanatory remarks, and averred that it was not the wish of a great majority of the people of the new States, so far as he could ascertain, that a pre-emption law should be passed.

Mr. TIPTON expressed himself tolerably well satisfied with the explanation of the Senator from Georgia. He was aware that a great majority of the people residing in the new States are not anxious for a pre-emption law. The majority of the people of the State of Ohio, as well as his own State, care nothing about it, and have not asked Congress to pass such law. There are but three counties in Indiana where the people did care for and desire the passage of such a law, and they were honest and honorable men.

Mr. FULTON said the passage of this bill would put an end to the enormous speculations which had taken place in the public lands. Such had been the effects of the combinations of speculators in the purchase of lands, that they had compelled men to pay from five to twenty dollars per acre for them, when, in fact, they would not otherwise have had to have given more than one dollar. In the State of Arkansas, during the last year, whole counties were entered by speculators; and honest, industrious men had been compelled to quit their homes; and at a sale which took place at Little Rock last spring, some speculators combined against the honest settlers, and they purchased the whole of the land offered for sale, and in a few days afterwards they sold it at auction, and realized about one thousand dollars per share. Millions of dollars would have been expended in the same way, had it not been for the much-reprobated Treasury order, which prevented their bank paper from being received. Mr. F. defended the provisions of the bill against what had been alleged against it, and then spoke of those men who were denominated "squatters." He vindicated their character from the aspersions which had been cast upon it, and argued that they were bold, and brave, and hardy adventurers, who went into the very wilderness of the country, where they settled down and cultivated the land, thereby rendering the public lands the more valuable. He remarked that the State of Arkansas was settled by "squatters," who were so much denounced here; six or eight hundred of whom were at present at Fort Gibson, and who had wished to defend the frontier from the savage and ruthless invader. Advertising to the settlement of the public lands, he said that, instead of its being criminal to do so, Congress itself had authorized the adoption of that course. And had not Congress, from the year 1824 to the present time, been granting pre-emption rights? Certainly they had. With regard to what had fallen from the Senator from Georgia, in respect to the sales of land in Alabama, he would remind him that they were credit sales; and in consequence of the high prices that were given by the purchasers to the Government, it was at length importuned so much from year to year to lower the price, that it was finally reduced almost to a minimum, and cash payments were demanded. The ill consequences of high prices, too, had caused the present system.

And, with respect to the system about to be introduced, he considered that it would put a stop to speculation entirely, and would greatly tend to reduce the revenue of the Government, as derived from the sales of the public lands. The great recommendation of the bill was that the Government of the United States was to be the landlord; that lands would be purchased of them, instead of unreasonable and grasping speculators, so that justice would be done to every man. In conclusion, he expressed his hope that the provision under consideration would be adopted by the Senate.

After a few words from Mr. BAYARD, on taking the question, the amendment was rejected by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Moore, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Tipton, Walker, White, Wright—24.

Mr. CLAY moved to amend the bill by providing that the right of pre-emption shall not apply to any lands prior to their being surveyed.

After some remarks in opposition to the motion by Messrs. LINN and WALKER, it was lost: Yeas 23, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster—23.

Mr. BLACK moved to amend the bill by providing that the privileges of this act shall not extend to any others than citizens of the United States; which motion was adopted: Yeas 24, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Page, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, White—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, Wright—21.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the bill was amended by providing that no pre-emption shall extend beyond the limits of any State or organized Territory of the Union.

Mr. TALLMADGE offered a new section at the end of the bill, continuing it in force until 31st of June, 1842. He observed that, as this bill had been urged and advocated as a fiscal measure, he had fixed its limitation to the same period as had been assigned in compromise for the termination of the reduction of the tariff. The bill, as it stood, was unlimited as to time, and almost as much so as to extent of territory. Congress was entering on an untried experiment, and it was best to reserve some limitation in their own hands, so that it might be revoked if it were found not to work well.

Mr. CLAY said he should vote for the amendment now proposed, rather from the spirit in which it had been offered, than from a belief that it would have any practical effect. Pass this bill, (cried Mr. C.), and the national domain is gone. By the year 1842, it will require a search-warrant and corps d'armee to find any part of it. A few men would settle on the woods, surround a prairie, and would at once get command of the whole prairie. The Senator might then look in vain for any fiscal resources from this quarter. The public lands would be gone. They were now going. What had the Senate heard from the Senator from Arkansas? That gentleman, it seemed, had received an assurance that when his friends should come into power, all manner of good things were to be done for him in regard to the public lands. And the honorable Senator had thrown out something like a reproach on those who had made such promises, that now, when they had the power in both Houses, these engagements had not been complied with. The country ought to know more about this matter. They had a right to know what these arrangements were which were to be fulfilled so soon as the dominant party got the control of both Houses of Congress. Not only had the complaint been heard in that chamber, but similar language had been held on another floor which he would not name. There, too, reproaches had been uttered as to the non-fulfilment of engagements. He wished to understand what these engagements were. In the mean while, he could assure the gentleman from New York [Mr. TALLMADGE] that, in the year 1842, Congress would have no trouble whatever with the public lands. Pass this bill, and the next effort would be to remove, first, one restriction, and then another, until all restrictions were gone. What had been the practical effect of all settlement laws, in all countries, from the day when our forefathers landed at Plymouth until this day? The settlement laws of France, of Spain, as well as Great Britain? Those laws granted land on condition that such and such a number of emigrants should have been collected; that such and such improvements should have been made; such and such houses erected, and clearing and cultivation accomplished. But where, or when, in what country, or at what time, have such conditions ever been complied with? They had invariably been disregarded, either from their inherent impracticability, or from a failure of power in the parent State to enforce them. And just so it would be in this case. The liberal grant of his parent Commonwealth had been intended for the benefit of the entire Union, and not of eight or nine States only. He had waited in the hope of seeing the representative of that Commonwealth upon that floor rise in his place, and solemnly enter his protest against this perversion of the munificent grant of that ancient and venerable Commonwealth, from which they had both derived their origin. But he had been disappointed. The gentleman from New York might spare his precautions; there was an end of the public lands, and of all revenue to be derived from that source.

Mr. SEVIER briefly replied, and explained, in what he had said with respect to assurances, he had referred to the language contained in that best of all the papers which had ever proceeded from General Jackson, his veto on the land bill, in which the President had said that the public domain ought to be sold at a price barely sufficient to cover the cost of survey and the expenses of the land sale. And when the Executive soon to be installed into office was inquired of with respect to his future course, his reply was, that he should follow in the steps of his illustrious predecessor. He thanked God that he was not a great man himself, for he had observed that those who were had more blighted hopes and bitter disappointments than he should ever be able to bear.

Mr. CLAY reminded the Senator from Arkansas that he had said something about assurances to be fulfilled when the parties should obtain a majority in the Senate.

Mr. SEVIER explained this to refer to assurances which he had himself given to his constituents, and to nothing else.

Mr. WALKER expressed his determination to vote for the amendment offered by Mr. TALLMADGE. He was confident that if the bill did not pass, the year 1842 would see the whole public land in the hands of speculators.

Mr. RIVES said that he was very sorry that he had disappointed the wishes and expectations of the Senator from Kentucky—wishes which he did not doubt had been entertained in all kindness to himself; but he was really at a loss to understand on what the expectations of that gentleman had been founded. If he knew any thing of the sentiments and course of his predecessors, they had ever uttered their voice against all propositions which went to make the public domain a common fund, in the sense in which that Senator understood the term; that is, as a fund to be parcelled out, or to have its proceeds parcel-led out, among the different States of the Union. Their vote, like his own, would ever have been given against a proposition of that kind. Whatever opinion that Senator might hold as to the course which the representatives of Virginia ought to pursue, he should be governed by his own convictions in regard to his own duty. The Senator had predicted that under the operation of this bill, and before the year 1842, the whole of the public domain would have passed out of the hands of the United States into the possession of other people; but if such would be the effect of this bill, what might be expected to be the result of the law as it now stood? In less than half that time the whole body of the public land would be in the possession of the speculators. It was the scope and intent of this bill to restrain the spirit of greedy speculation, and to preserve the public domain in the hands of the Government for the benefit of the whole people of the Union. It was this which had procured for the bill his zealous support. As to the principle of pre-emption, the Senator from Kentucky must be aware that it formed a feature of the Virginia laws, as it did in fact of those of every State in the Union. It was a principle eminently equitable. Without pretending to as intimate an acquaintance with the unfortunate class of individuals who had been treated with such great severity in the present debate, he did know that many of them at least were undeserving of the vituperation which had been cast upon them. He was personally acquainted with many of the favorite sons of Virginia, (some of them members of the late convention for revising the constitution of that State,) who were now in the wilds of the West, occupying land which belonged to the Government, and which they were ready to pay for, but which had not yet been exposed for sale. In this, how much soever it might be against the theory of the law, there was no violation of its spirit. He was well aware that, by the common law, to set one's foot on the land of their neighbor, without permission first obtained, was a trespass. If he should visit the honorable Senator from Kentucky at Ashland, it would be a trespass according to the strictness of the law; yet was it so held in practice? The law which forbade the settling on lands of the United States had been passed at a period very different from the present, and on considerations which did not now apply. It had been enacted rather for the protection of the settlers than out of a jealous regard to the rights of the Government. Some of the best blood of Virginia was now in the West, and claiming protection from the representatives of that State on this floor. Their situation demanded his sympathies and respectful consideration; and it was a feeling of this kind toward worthy men, whom he personally knew, that had first convinced him of the injustice of some of the pictures which had here been presented of the class of individuals opprobriously denounced as squatters. He had risen not to discuss the bill. He was not prepared to do so.

The great consideration which induced him to advocate the bill was, to arrest the enormous surplus revenue, the mischievous effect of which was convulsing and devastating the country. And if the honorable Senator had looked at the act of Virginia, accepting her portion in the distribution of the deposits, and at the protest then raised against the exercise of such a power, he would have been at no loss for reasons why Mr. R. could not concur with him. To the policy which created such a surplus he had invariably been opposed. He had never thought that because Virginia, with whatever liberality, had bestowed her domain upon the Union, she was to play the dog in the manger, and be ever on the watch to prevent others from obtaining that which she had so freely given away. No; Virginia had never exhibited a spirit of that sort, and he trusted she would ever remain a stranger to it. Virginia, looking to the future destinies of the country, had made it a fundamental stipulation in her deed of gift, that this territory should be erected into independent States, not less than three nor more than five. But how could we expect these States ever to populate and flourish, unless the General Government extended a paternal protection over those hardy settlers who had their habitations on our Western frontier? That was the policy of this bill, while at the same time its effect would be to diminish the surplus revenue. A conviction of this had led him to advocate the bill, nor could he have expected that such a course would have exposed him to the rebuke of the honorable Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. CLAY rejoined. He had no right to rebuke the Senator from Virginia; and though that gentleman might feel what he said as a rebuke, he had not so offered it.

Mr. C. then referred to the terms of cession, which provided that the land was to be a common fund for the benefit of all the States, Virginia inclusive, and then went on to insist that the provisions in the bill operated in practice to withhold from the citizens of Virginia advantages which it conferred on the people of the new States. On this ground it was that he had expected the protest of her representatives. The bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the States was not under discussion; but one of the brightest, one of the best and purest of that gentleman's predecessors, and whose immediate successor he believed he was, had voted for that bill; and no one of his predecessors had ever advocated a prospective pre-emption law, a law which inflicted one of the deepest stabs on the rights of the States which had ever been perpetrated by the General Government.

The Senator advocated this bill as a measure to restrict the sales of the public land, and prevent a surplus in the Treasury; and what did it do by way of restriction? It threw open to the occupancy of pre-emptioners 180 millions of acres of land, now beyond their reach, in addition to the 120 millions now in the market.

It was true Virginia had a pre-emption law and a settlement law, but they were enacted under totally different circumstances. They were for the benefit of men who combated our then unsubdued Indian tribes, and, in making and maintaining their settlements, risked their lives; and Mr. C. now knew but a single man in Kentucky who was in the possession of land so obtained. The remarks he had thrown out had been made in perfect kindness. He did regret the course of the honorable Senator, for that gentleman and himself might be said to have a common origin; the one having his lot cast in the more ancient portion of the Commonwealth, the other in that part of it more recently settled, and since become independent; and he still regretted that he did not enjoy the advantage of the distinguished talents and great influence of that Senator in resisting schemes which he deemed to be wild and delusive.

Mr. RIVES made a brief reply, and referred to one of his predecessors who had incurred a similar rebuke from the same source, and on a like account, four or five years ago. He denied that the bill excluded Virginia from an equal participation with other States, in the enjoyment and advantages of the public lands. Her citizens could obtain portions of the public domain by cultivation, without a personal residence. As to the extending of the right of pre-emption to 180,000,000 acres, in addition to the 120,000,000 already in market, it was but an instance of that exaggeration which had too much characterized the present debate. Where was the honorable Senator going to get a sufficient army of pre-emptioners to invade and seize upon these 180,000,000 acres at a quarter of a section apiece? Statements of this kind were calculated to frighten the imagination, but they never should frighten him from the course of his public duty.

Mr. MORRIS asked leave to lay an amendment on the table, which he proposed to offer as a substitute for the bill as amended by the committee; which was granted, and it was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRIS then moved that the Senate adjourn; which motion was rejected: Yeas 20, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Moore, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Wright—26.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the amendment as reported by the Committee on Public Lands, as amended, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 26, nays 19, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Kent, Knight, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster—19.

The bill was then reported to the Senate as amended; and, on motion of Mr. CLAY, it was ordered to be printed as amended.

The Senate then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 1.

LAND FRAUDS.

The resolution, formerly offered by Mr. NICHOLAS, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for information obtained by special agents in relation to alleged frauds on the public lands in the State of Louisiana, being under consideration—

Mr. CLAY proposed to amend the resolution by striking out Louisiana, and extending the inquiry to all the States and Territories.

Mr. NICHOLAS had no objection to a general inquiry; but, as a particular charge of fraud had been made in relation to his own State, and as he was desirous to protect its citizens against all unjust and injurious charges, he would prefer that his resolution should remain distinct from any resolution for a general inquiry.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, said he hoped the Senator would at least permit his resolution to be so far amended as to call for a return of the papers on which charges in relation to citizens of Louisiana had been made at the last session, which papers had been returned from the Senate to the Department.

Mr. NICHOLAS intimated his belief that those charges were, to a considerable extent, founded on anonymous letters.

Mr. EWING said he had not depended on such letters. The principal letter on which the charges were founded was from the district attorney for the western district of Louisiana; and he claimed it as an act of justice to all, that the same papers on which charges were made at the last session should again be brought before the Senate, that the report on the subject might contain the information on which charges were founded.

Mr. LINN inquired whether individuals who might be implicated would have an opportunity to rebut the charges of fraud which might be brought against them.

Public Lands.

[FEB. 1, 1837.]

Mr. SEVIER spoke at some length against sending out special agents at all to inquire into cases which had been long considered as settled. It hindered the issuing of land patents, and was highly injurious to innocent persons. He was opposed to every kind of reinvestigation on this subject.

Mr. CLAY offered his amendment, which was adopted, for instituting a general investigation, as an addition to Mr. NICHOLAS's resolution.

On motion of Mr. EWING, the resolution of Mr. NICHOLAS was amended so as to call on the Secretary of the Treasury for information otherwise obtained, as well as by special agents.

The resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill to prohibit the sales of the public lands, except to actual settlers, and in limited quantities, was taken up as the special order, the amendments made in committee having been agreed to yesterday, and the bill reported to the Senate.

Mr. NORVELL moved an amendment to the fourth section of the bill, providing that it shall not be construed so as to affect the selections of land which have been or may be made for the salt springs belonging to Michigan.

Mr. WALKER did not consider that the amendment was at all necessary, for the provisions of the bill covered what the Senator was desirous of accomplishing.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN moved an amendment to the fourth section, making it retrospective in its character in regard to pre-emption settlement.

Mr. B. said he offered this amendment with a view to obviate the objection entertained by some gentlemen that the section, as it stood, would hold out a sort of bounty to persons residing in the old States to emigrate to the West. Now, should the amendment prevail, no such temptation would be held out as under the existing section.

Mr. RUGGLES moved to amend the amendment so as to confine the operations of pre-emptions to settlements prior to the 1st of December, 1836.

Mr. BROWN accepted the modification; and

The question was then taken on the amendment as amended, and it was adopted by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hubbard, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, McKean, Morris, Niles, Page, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, White—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Nicholas, Norvell, Robinson, Sevier, Tipton, Walker, Wright—17.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, submitted an amendment to compel the individual entering a pre-emption to occupy and cultivate his land six months previous to such pre-emption.

Mr. WALKER disapproved of the proposed amendment, and said if the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio should prevail, he would vote against the bill.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, said that, according to the bill, as it was, a man had nothing to do but to remain a day or two on the land to entitle him to a settlement.

Mr. BROWN said, almost every gentleman seemed to think that some bill should pass. Now, if this amendment prevailed, the bill would be greatly impaired in the estimation of many Senators. The gentleman from Ohio was mistaken in saying that the bill required a mere temporary residence; it required not only occupancy, but cultivation also.

Mr. WALKER hoped that the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina would prevail; if not, a principle would be introduced in the bill which ought not to find its way there. Such a principle could not be found in any bill heretofore passed of this character. If, then, this new principle should be inserted, he was prepared to abandon the bill, and he would ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLAY said that, if the Senator from Mississippi should vote against the bill, as he threatened to do, it would be no great calamity. As for himself, he would vote against it if no one else did. What! would it be pretended by any Senator, that a man, by remaining a day upon the public lands, should be entitled to pre-emption? Was that the right upon which gentlemen would grant the right of pre-emption? No; actual cultivation and possession was necessary; this was the practical operation of the pre-emption laws which had heretofore been passed. This requirement should be insisted upon by the present bill; and the requirement proposed to be inserted in the bill, of a six months' residence, was only, he repeated, carrying out the intention of the old pre-emption laws.

Mr. RUGGLES remarked that he was desirous that a bill should pass restricting the lands to actual settlers, but he considered three months would be long enough.

The question was taken on the adoption of the amendment, and it was carried.

Mr. RUGGLES moved to strike out "six," and insert "three;" which was lost.

The debate was continued by Messrs. BAYARD, NILES, CRITTENDEN, BROWN, CALHOUN, and PRESTON, when

Mr. WALKER moved a reconsideration of the vote on the motion of the Senator from Maine, to insert "three" instead of "six," and asked for the yeas and nays; which being taken, were: Yeas 28, nays 18.

So the vote was reconsidered; and,

On taking the question on Mr. RUGGLES's motion to strike out "six," and insert "three," it was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RUGGLES, the bill was amended so as to require an actual occupation and cultivation of the tract three months prior to the entry of a pre-emption.

Mr. MORRIS moved to amend the bill by adding a clause requiring the individual purchasing on a pre-emption to have erected a dwelling-house on the land, and to have resided therein the term of three months.

Mr. CALHOUN asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. SEVIER moved to lay the bill and amendments on the table, and asked for the yeas and nays on the question; which being ordered, the question was decided in the negative, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, White, Wright—26.

Mr. MOORE moved that the Senate adjourn; which motion was rejected: Yeas 20, nays 25, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Wright—25.

[SENATE.]

After some remarks from Messrs. MORRIS, BAYARD, WALKER, EWING of Ohio, and EWING of Illinois, the amendment of Mr. MORRIS was rejected: Yeas 21, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, White—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, Wright—25.

Mr. NORVELL moved to amend the bill by providing that the restriction which confines the benefits of this act to citizens of the United States shall apply only to the pre-emption system.

Mr. N. observed that the section, as it now stands, was the adoption of a policy never before known in the United States in the sales of the public lands.

After some words from Mr. LINN in favor of the amendment,

Mr. NORVELL said that if he had thought that the motion would prevail, he would have moved to strike out the ninth section altogether, as it ought not to be in the bill at all.

Mr. WEBSTER asked if it was the intention of the Senate, in a bill giving so great a bounty as this bill, to extend it to every man in England, France, and Ireland? Would they extend the privilege of entering lands for their children to fathers in foreign countries, when the friends of the bill, with so much reluctance, consented that it should be extended to those in the old States?

Mr. W. moved to amend the ninth section, so as to restrict the privileges of pre-emption and settlement for children, to citizens of the United States; which was agreed to.

The question was then taken on Mr. NORVELL's motion to strike out the ninth section; which was rejected: Yeas 9, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Hendricks, Linn, Lyon, Norvell, Robinson, Sevier, Walker—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Calhoun, Clayton, Crittenden, Dana, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Webster, White, Wright—32.

Mr. RUGGLES moved to strike the 8th section from the bill. [This is the section permitting fathers in the old States, or mothers, in case the fathers are dead, to enter a section of land for the benefit of minor children.]

Mr. HUBBARD called for the yeas and nays on the question, which were ordered; and after some remarks from Mr. RUGGLES, the motion was rejected: Yeas 12, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Fulton, King of Alabama, Linn, Moore, Morris, Niles, Page, Ruggles, Sevier, Wright—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Clayton, Crittenden, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Georgia, Nicholas, Norvell, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Walker, Wall, Webster, White—26.

Mr. MOORE moved to amend the bill by reducing the price of all lands that have been in the market ten years to one dollar per acre; and all lands that have been in the market fifteen years to seventy-five cents per acre.

Mr. MORRIS here moved that the Senate adjourn; which was carried: Yeas 20, nays 19; and

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 2.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented the credentials of the Hon. ALEXANDER MOUTON, Senator elect from the State of Louisiana, vice Mr. PORTER, resigned.

Mr. MOUTON then appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

COPY-RIGHTS TO FOREIGNERS.

Mr. CLAY said that he begged leave to present to the Senate a memoir or address from certain living authors of Great Britain. Among the subscribers to it would be recognised some of the most distinguished names in the literary world—names (said he) with which we have been long familiar, and whose admirable productions have often instructed and delighted us all. They represent that, owing to the want of legal protection in the United States, they are deprived of the benefit here of their literary property; that their works are published without any compensation being made to them for their copy-rights; that they are frequently altered and mutilated, so as to affect injuriously their reputations; and that an arrangement which they, or some of them, had made with booksellers in the United States, to secure a fair and just remuneration for their labors, had been defeated by the practice of other American booksellers. They therefore request the passage of a law, by which their right of property may be protected.

I am quite sure, Mr. President, (continued Mr. CLAY,) that I need not say one word to commend this address to the attentive and friendly consideration of the Senate, and every member of it. Of all classes of our fellow-beings, there is none that has a better right than that of authors and inventors, to the kindness, the sympathy, and the protection of the Government. And surely nothing can be more reasonable than that they should be allowed to enjoy, without interruption, for a limited time, the property created by their own genius. Unfortunately, but too often dependent upon that alone, if they are deprived of it, they are bereft of the means of subsistence. The signers of this address may, with more confidence, indulge the hope of the passage of the law which they solicit, from the consideration that, according to the liberality of the British practice, the security of copy-right is not restricted to British subjects, but is equally enjoyed by foreigners. And I understand that there are instances of American authors who have availed themselves of it.

Mr. President, when we reflect what important parts of the great republic of letters the United States and Great Britain are, and consider their common origin, common language, and similarity of institutions, and of habits of reading, there seems to me to be every motive for reciprocating between the two countries the security of copy-rights. Indeed, I do not see any ground of just objection, either in the constitution or in sound policy, to the passage of a law tendering to all foreign nations reciprocal security for literary property.

Mr. C., in conclusion, moved that the memorial be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. PRESTON said he had no doubt of the general propriety of the direction proposed to be given to the memorial; all subjects of this kind were properly brought before the Library Committee. But the subject was one of some difficulty; there was a large and meritorious class of authors in this country, who had a direct interest in securing to the authors of Great Britain the copy-right to their works, because copies of these works were sold without the expense of a copy-right, and thus came in free and injurious competition with the works of American authors. But, then, publishers had an opposite interest, to seize upon foreign works without price, and republish them. The consequence was, that the labor of foreign authors was converted to the use of publishers here, who often sent into the market a most despicable article in point of execution, entirely unworthy of the state of the arts in this country. Publishers, therefore, had arrayed themselves against the object of this memorial; and the subject, therefore, resolved itself into a complicated question of free trade and protection of the mechanical arts, with which is numbered the art of printing. On this subject Mr. P. was not now prepared to decide. They had two authors to our one; and were, therefore, more interested in the protection of mental labor; while we published three or four books to their one, and were, therefore, more interested in protecting publishers. Mr. P. was understood to suggest that the subject ought to go to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. GRUNDY remarked that the Judiciary Committee had already as much before them as they could properly perform, and it was therefore impossible for them to give this subject that attention which was due to its intrinsic merits. He therefore moved that the memorial be referred to a select committee of five, expressing the desire that he might be excused from serving on such committee.

Mr. CALHOUN said he was aware that the interest of booksellers in the United States was adverse to the object of this memorial; but he did not suppose that it was of a character or nature such as required its rejection. The works for which copy-rights would be secured in this country constituted but a small portion of the entire literature of Great Britain or this country; and of the works of the distinguished names on this memorial, the copy-right of a great portion had expired, which was, therefore, subject to free publication; and perhaps it would not be thought proper to revive the right in this country. By several living foreign authors, an attempt had been made to secure their property in this country, by designating the booksellers in the United States by whom alone their works were to be published. The attempt, however, proved impracticable, for other booksellers also published their works without license, so as entirely to deprive them of the benefits of such property in this country. Mr. C. thought the proper committee was that on the Judiciary, though he would not object to a select committee.

Mr. BUCHANAN said when this question came to be considered it would be a vexed and difficult question. He would not discuss it now, but he saw an interest involved far beyond that of publishers, to whose interest he would pay a smaller regard; and that was the interest of the reading people of the United States. Cheap editions of foreign works were now published and sent all over the country so as to be within the reach of every individual; and the effect of granting copy-rights asked for by this memorial would be, that the authors who were anxious to have their works appear in a more expensive form would prevent the issuing of these cheap editions; so that the amount of republications of British works in this country, he thought, would be at once reduced to one half. But to live in fame was as great a stimulus to authors as pecuniary gain; and the question ought to be considered, whether they would not lose as much of fame by the measure asked for, as they would gain in money. It was especially well worthy of the committee to go beyond publishers, and ascertain what would be the effect on the acquisition of knowledge in this vast country.

Mr. GRUNDY's motion to refer the memorial to a special committee was then carried; and the Chair appointed Messrs. CLAY, PRESTON, BUCHANAN, WEBSTER, and EWING of Ohio, to compose the committee.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The President having announced the special order of the day, being the bill limiting the sales of the public lands, and having stated the question to be on the following sections, moved by Mr. MOORE, as amendments to the bill:

"And be it further enacted, That all lands which have been offered for sale twenty or more years, and remain unsold, shall hereafter be sold at fifty cents per acre; all lands which have been offered fifteen or more years, and less than twenty years, shall be hereafter sold at seventy-five cents per acre; and all lands which have been offered ten or more years, and less than fifteen years, shall hereafter be sold at one dollar per acre: Provided, That not more than one hundred and sixty acres shall be sold to any one purchaser, nor to any other than actual settlers, at such reduced prices.

"And be it further enacted, That any person who shall make the necessary proof, as required by the fourth section of this bill, that he has occupied or cultivated any portion of the public lands subject to entry at private sale, such person shall have the pre-emptive right in the purchase of one quarter section, to include the land so occupied or cultivated, at one dollar per acre."

Mr. MOORE addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: When I had the honor to present to the Senate last evening the amendments now under its consideration, I said great injustice had been done that class of our fellow-citizens who first emigrate and take possession of the public domain, by that severe denunciation that had been so liberally dealt out against them from several quarters upon this floor. Having been an early emigrant myself to the section of country in which I reside, and having some knowledge of the character of the many privations which those with whom I have been associated had to encounter, and which are common with all early emigrants to a new country, it was natural that my sympathies and sensibilities should be excited. But, sir, I am well aware these missiles and censure were not thrown particularly at Alabama; and as they have been met and replied to by others, I shall endeavor only to give a brief explanation of the operation of former pre-emption laws, as relates to the State of Alabama.

Sir, the only pre-emption law in that long catalogue brought to view by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BEXTON] in which any portion of the citizens of this State have had any interest, is the law of May, 1830, which was limited in its operation to one year only; and the act of June, 1834, which re-enacted the provisions of the law of 1830, and continued its operation for two years.

These laws have had an application in one or two counties only in the whole State of Alabama; and, in truth, it may be said that the citizens in but one county have been benefited to any considerable extent. These citizens, although not in affluence, are as honest, as worthy, and respectable, as the population in any other quarter.

And what, let me ask, is the character of the boon presented by the pre-emption laws to which I have referred? The only advantage has been the protection it gave the poor man from a competition with the more wealthy land speculator in the purchase of his little home, one quarter section, which had been made valuable only by means of his own labor bestowed upon it.

Sir, it is due to my constituents that I should state one fact, which is much to their credit and honor, which is this: I have never heard of any attempt to perfect titles under these pre-emption laws by a resort to "corruption, perjury, subornation of perjury, or other improper means," about which we have heard so much as having occurred in other quarters.

There is another fact which I take great pleasure in bringing to the view of the Senate. This very county of

FEB. 2, 1837.]

Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

Jackson, which has enjoyed greater benefit from the pre-emption laws than any other, has also furnished a greater number of soldiers for the defence of the State than any other county; she has now (unless they have recently returned) about four hundred of her brave and patriotic citizens, breasting the perils of the Indian war in Florida, and, what I fear is more appalling to them than the dangers of war, the unhealthy climate which is the scene of their operations.

These are volunteers, not draughted men. As soon as the call for men was made known, more volunteered than were required; and, in this county, I have heard it said that, "if any draught should ever be resorted to, it would be a draught to see who should stay at home."

But it has been intimated by the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. KING] that this class of our fellow-citizens have, by their disorderly and criminal deportment, provoked the Indian wars in which the Government has been and yet is involved.

Mr. President, as regards the Black Hawk war, I know nothing, and therefore I say nothing; but, sir, as relates to the Indian war in the South, I think I hazard nothing in saying this can be traced to a different origin; this has originated from the manner in which your Indian treaties have been made, and the bad faith, yes, sir, the bad faith, in which their requirements have been executed. One circumstance which has contributed greatly in exciting that ill-blood which finally resulted in open depredations on the part of the Indians, has been the countenance given to the most gross and flagrant frauds practised upon them by unprincipled land speculators, in the pretended purchase of their reservations. And, sir, I think I may assume the responsibility of saying that some of the constituents of the Senator from Georgia participated largely in these speculations. Well, sir, the war having been brought about by the means to which I have referred, who, except that very class of our fellow-citizens, so much abused, to whom the opprobrious epithet of "squatters" has been applied, first shouldered their muskets to do the fighting? The silk-and-purple gentry, unless they can be so fortunate as to obtain the command of a regiment or battalion, find it more convenient to enjoy their ease upon their cotton farms. If they contribute any thing, it is by way of substitute; their person is too sacred to be exposed to the cruel hardships of a campaign; they therefore do all their fighting by substitute. Yes, sir, although this "traded class" do not, as has been charged, originate the war, they are truly active and principal agents in bringing it to a close.

But it has been alleged by the honorable Senator "that they pay no taxes to the Government," &c. Now, sir, I demand to know if this be so? I desire to know of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. KING] whether the tax imposed by the tariff does not operate upon this class of our fellow-citizens as well as any other? By what means are they exempted from its influence? Sir, does not the poor man pay a tax for the hat upon his head, the coat (although it may be a coarse one) upon his back, and the shoes upon his feet? Is he not required to pay a tax for the plough and weeding hoe, the axe, and other farming utensils with which he cultivates his little cornfield? The sugar with which he sweetens his coffee, and the salt that is put in his bread? Yes, sir, he pays a tax almost for every thing he and his family either eat or wear; and this is not all, for he is taxed for the very last nail that is driven in his coffin, or the coffin made for any branch of his family. And yet we are to be told that "they pay no tax!" I am willing to admit that they may not pay as much in amount as the man who wears a beaver hat, a broadcloth cloak, a ruffle shirt, and silk stockings, and who uses his wines and other luxuries; yet I will venture the assertion that the tax paid by the poor man, who may have a large family to support, falls as heavy and is as oppressive upon him as the tax paid by any other class of the community.

Well, now, a few words as regards the amendment submitted for the consideration of the Senate. Its operation is confined to lands that have been in market for ten, fifteen, and twenty years, and which the Government has not been able to sell at the minimum price, and which, I hesitate not to say, will never be sold unless the price be reduced. This provision will enure mainly to the benefit of that class for whom it is more imperiously our duty to legislate; those in indigent circumstances, who have heretofore been driven out of the public land market, by the wealthy, the capitalist, and land speculator; for, sir, it cannot be disguised that these have heretofore possessed themselves of all the most valuable, rich, and fertile lands, to the entire exclusion of those who have been unable to compete with them. And now, when they have picked and culled it over and over again, until nothing remains but the refuse lands, which they will not purchase, but which a poor man is both willing and able to purchase at its fair value, you refuse, and unreasonably insist that this is worth as much as you sell the cotton and sugar land and best Mississippi low grounds for. This policy is as inconsistent as it is adverse to the interest of the new States.

What, let me ask, would be the course of an intelligent individual, under similar circumstances, who, having obtained a large quantity of public lands, and having sold out the best at the highest price it would command, would hold up the refuse with the view of obtaining the same price for this? What has been the practice of every State in the Union which has sold its public lands? Have they not reduced the price according to its quality? And what would be the course of any other individual who might put in market any other commodity? Suppose he be a tobacco planter, or a flour merchant: would either of these, having made sale of all the prime, think of holding up the ground leaf tobacco, or the old and sour flour, with any reasonable hope of ever obtaining the same price for this? Or would he not reduce the price of this article to its fair market value? This, it seems to me, would be the dictate of prudence and common sense.

But, sir, we claim, and with great propriety, too, a reduction, upon the ground and principle upon which you have reduced the tariff; in order to reduce the amount of surplus revenue, and to bring down the rate of taxation to the actual, economical wants of the Government. The public domain is the article in which the people of the new States deal mostly; and while you have extended a scale of reduction to every other article of consumption, this has been left, alone, untouched, at its original high price—a price fixed when the Government had a large public debt unliquidated, for the payment of which the public domain was pledged. This pledge is now redeemed, and the citizens of the new States have the right to demand a reduction in the price of the public domain in a ratio corresponding with that applied by the tariff to other articles.

But there are other and higher considerations which should influence gentlemen in the support of this measure. The citizens of the new States, although they pay their equal proportion of the tax collected, have no interest in the large appropriations of thousands and millions that are made annually out of the public treasure for harbors, fortifications, breakwaters, forts, &c., on the seaboard. This amendment also proposes to place the means in the hands of thousands of our fellow-citizens to become freeholders, and thus increase their pride and independence, their attachment to the soil and to the Government, and at the same time remove that odious relation that exists between landlord and tenant.

SENATE.]

Public Lands.

But some gentlemen have argued in opposition to this measure, as if it were confined in its operation alone to the citizens of the new States, and as if the citizens of no other State had any interest in the matter whatever. But gentlemen should recollect that the population of the new States is composed of the good people from every other State in this Union, and that emigrants from every quarter are to participate in the wholesome provisions proposed to be incorporated in this bill.

Sir, I was surprised to hear the honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] repudiate these enactments because they hold out extravagant inducement to emigration from the old to the new States. And I would submit it to the honorable Senator whether this is not a very contracted view of the subject; and whether it is not our duty to legislate here upon the broad principle of promoting the interest and prosperity of all; and whether he does justice to his constituents in withholding his support to the project on account of the extravagant advantages it tenders them for emigration. And ought not the State he so ably represented be willing to part with that portion of her population who, seeing the avenue opened wide for the improvement of their fortunes in the West and Southwest, feel desirous of availing themselves of it? And ought he not rather to be inclined to lend his aid in giving them encouragement than to impede their progress? What, suppose some rich landlord lose a tenant, and some of the manufactories some of their hands, who labor for a mere pittance for support, when, by emigration to the new States, they become independent freeholders and landlords themselves.

Sir, I will repeat what I intimated on a former occasion, that the people of the new States have a right to appeal to the justice of the majority on this floor and in the other branch of the National Legislature, who are now dominant, and hold the power, for their aid in support of this measure. They have done much for the administration, and particularly has Alabama done every thing, and more than could have been expected; she has sacrificed her feelings and her principles; her citizens have sacrificed their attachment for an individual pure and spotless, whose deportment either in the private walks of life or the public councils of his country no honorable man will dare assail or impeach. Yet they have sacrificed their attachment for him, their neighbor, their friend, to gratify General Jackson. And I think I have the right now, in behalf of my constituents, to make the appeal to the friends of the administration for aid in favor of a measure more intimately connected with their interest than any other provision of this bill.

Now, sir, one word more as to the other amendment proposed as an additional section to the bill. Mr. President, the provisions embraced by this are so obviously just and proper, that I cannot anticipate opposition from any quarter. In this there is no principle the propriety of which will be considered doubtful by gentlemen coming from either the old or new States.

It will be seen that this amendment proposes to secure to an individual the pre-emptive right in the purchase of one quarter section, that he has improved and cultivated, at one dollar per acre, of the land subject to be entered at private sale at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. This will be of little or no service to other new States, which will enjoy a more important advantage from that section in the bill which secures to occupants the right of pre-emption in the purchase of the best lands in the country. But, as regards Alabama, these golden days have passed; the good lands have long since been sold. I have known many worthy and respectable citizens who had made improvements upon the public lands, who were able to give from five to ten, fifteen, and twenty dollars per acre; yet were unable to secure their homes—were turned out and driven off by the capitalist and land speculator, under the auction system, being unprotected at that time by any pre-emption law.

This amendment would be viewed as a modest proposition, compared with other features in the bill, and I hope it will receive the favorable consideration of the Senate.

[Mr. KING, of Georgia, in a subsequent stage in the debate, having submitted two amendments to the bill, viz: one requiring "that the applicant for a pre-emption shall make oath before the register and receiver that he has not received the benefit of any pre-emption law heretofore passed by the Congress of the United States;" and the other providing "that no pre-emption shall be granted to lands from which the Indians had not been removed at the commencement of such occupancy"—]

Mr. MOORE said he had already declared that the interest which the State of Alabama would have in this law, compared with that which other new States and Territories would enjoy, was very inconsiderable. Yet he had given the bill his hearty support, from principle. He was willing to do justice to other citizens, the early emigrants, in whatever quarter they may be located. But now the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. KING] proposes so to modify the bill as to destroy even that small interest which the State from which he came might claim to have, and to exclude his constituents from any participation in its wholesome provisions whatever.

Mr. M. solemnly protested against the adoption of any such amendment; he hoped the Senate would not gratify the Senator from Georgia in effecting such manifest injustice to the citizens of his State.

That Senator had again renewed his unwarranted denunciations against that meritorious class of our fellow-citizens, whom he again reproaches by calling them "professional squatters;" and by this amendment proposes to break up and destroy what he is pleased to call "their profession and livelihood." And, sir, he is desirous also to put an end to the improper treatment and cruelty with which "the poor Indians" have been made to suffer, and are liable to be treated, by these early emigrants, many of whom he has intimated "have left Georgia because they were no better than they ought to be."

Mr. M. said he would not vouch for the correct deportment of the people of Georgia in any manner; but, for the consolation of the Senator from Georgia, he would inform him that the salubrious climate of Alabama had a most happy influence upon those who emigrated from that quarter; as soon as they crossed the line and became acclimated, they then cease to be "professional squatters," and become honest and respectable citizens, and were worthy the protection this bill proposes to give them.

But if the Senator succeeds in his proposed amendment, his (Mr. M.'s) constituents, few as they were, who have obtained any pre-emption under any former law, are now to be excluded from any benefit or protection given by the pre-emption clause in this bill, and left entirely at the tender mercies of the land speculator.

Now, sir, where is the propriety of this? Where the propriety of excluding a poor man from a pre-emption under this law, merely because he has been compelled to make sale of his land heretofore paid for, in order to improve his condition and provide more effectually for the permanent prosperity of his family? Sir, the gentleman can with much more propriety change the character of his amendment, by modifying it in such manner as to exclude and render the land speculator incompetent, instead of the pre-emptor, to purchase in any future sale; and with such a modification Mr. M. would vote for it.

Again: another portion of his constituents were to be made step-children of and excluded from the provisions of this law, because they have made their settlements before the Indians are removed from the territory they have sold. And the gentleman had stated correctly when he said his amendments would only apply to that portion of country recently acquired from the Cherokees, situated in the State of Alabama. And he would inform that Senator that, small as "this slip" of country was, the General Assembly had organized three new counties out of it, which were settled by honest and respectable citizens, in every manner worthy the favorable consideration of Congress. The treaty had been ratified long since; many had gone there since the purchase and since the ratification; and yet the Indians are not removed, and no one can tell precisely when they will be entirely removed. The people, nevertheless, are subject to all the restraints, responsibilities, payment of taxes, &c., in the same manner that others are in any other part of the State, and were entitled to equal participation in the important provisions of this bill.

Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

But Mr. M. said he had felt the peculiar force of that argument of the Senator from Georgia resulting from his tender sympathies and compassion for the poor Indians, which inspired his bosom with such a strong and laudable desire to put a stop to those cruelties heretofore practised upon them.

Mr. M. thought, looking to the history of the times, and reviewing the legislative action of the State of Georgia, (prompted, doubtless, by none other than the most tender and humane considerations for the poor Indians, for whom the Senator would make us believe he also feels much sympathy,) that such arguments came with very bad grace from that quarter. That Georgia should feel more than other States for the welfare of the Indians, and that her delegation should be disposed to withhold from honest occupants pre-emption rights in the purchase of the public lands, lest encouragement should be given to improper treatment to the poor Indians, was among the very last arguments he had supposed the Senator from Georgia would have resorted to in support of his proposition.

When Mr. Moore concluded,

The question was taken on the adoption of the amendment by yeas and nays, and it was rejected: Yeas 16, nays 23.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the second clause of the proposed amendment; which was, "that any person who has resided on and purchased land at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, during the year 1836, and who shall be in possession of such land at the passage of this act, shall be allowed to enter one quarter section until 1838, provided he shall have proved his right before July next, before the register and receiver of the proper land office."

The amendment was negatived by a vote of 27 to 15.

Mr. WHITE said he was not satisfied with the bill in its present shape, nor did he know that any amendment could be offered to it which would reconcile him to its provisions. He had voted with the friends of the bill as far as he could, in order that it might be so amended as to meet with the approval of a majority of the Senate. Mr. W. proceeded to examine and comment on the provisions of the bill.

He went on to say the bill was partial in its character, for it gave a preference to one portion of society over another in the purchase of the public lands. He argued that the bill in its present shape went to change the whole land system of the country, and excluded from becoming purchasers the great mass of society, in order to induce more emigration to the West. According to this bill, persons might obtain land, and that, too, without intending to become occupiers of it. Now, he thought it was not sound policy to do this; nor could any good reason be given why it should be done. If the bill was to remain in its present form, he could not consent to give his vote for it. Yet he must confess that he should regret, after the subject had been so long under consideration, if nothing were done that would prove beneficial to the new States, while at the same time no injustice should be perpetrated against the old. With regard to the large amount of revenue which had been derived from the sales of the public lands during the past year, he would tell gentlemen how it happened to be so much greater than at any former time. Why, a short time before the Indian title had been extinguished, a large portion of the finest lands were brought into the market; and the consequence was, that almost every man who wished to procure some of them, and yet not having the means, obtained accommodation at the banks, and then purchased. Afterwards, they sold to great advantage, and repaid what they borrowed. And this had been the course pursued in regard to the public lands, which some gentlemen might call "speculating." Now, the moment the money deposited with the States should be withdrawn, an end would be put to this state of things. In fact, even at this time, the best lands in the South and Southwest were gone; and yet Congress was about to legislate to prevent speculation and preserve the public lands! After some further remarks, Mr. W. observed, let justice be done to the new States; but let no radical change be made in the laws, unless gentlemen were quite sure that that change was made upon a principle which the people of the whole Union would approve of. If that course were not pursued, the result might be that two parties would be gotten up, of the old States on one side, and the new on the other, and then no man could foretell what would happen to the liberties and prosperity of the confederacy. If the amendment he proposed to offer should be adopted, our land system would be preserved, while, at the same time, it would prevent, as much as any scheme could, the frauds known to be committed, as regarded the public lands. Mr. W. concluded his remarks by offering the following, as a substitute for the amendment reported by the Committee on the Public Lands:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

"That every settler or occupant of the public lands prior to the passage of this act, who was in possession on the first day of December last, and cultivated any part thereof in the year eighteen hundred and thirty-six, shall be entitled to all the benefits and privileges provided by an act entitled 'Act to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands,' approved May twenty-ninth, eighteen hundred and thirty; and the said act is hereby revived, and shall continue in force one year: Provided, That, where more than one person may have settled upon and cultivated any one quarter section of land, each one of them shall have an equal share or interest in the same quarter section, but shall have no claim to any other land: And provided, always, That the provisions of this act shall not extend to any person who made his settlement or occupancy before the extinguishment of the Indian title to the land on which he settled, or to which he claims a right of occupancy.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That in cases where individuals were entitled to the benefits of the pre-emption act of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, and were deprived of said rights by the location of Indian reservations having been placed on their improvements, after such settlements were made, the persons having been so entitled shall be allowed to enter one quarter section of any of the public lands (not reserved from sale) in the State in which such persons resided: Provided, That such persons shall produce satisfactory proof before the proper land officers, and make their selections of said quarter sections, before the first day of June next.

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all lands which have been offered for sale twenty or more years, and remain unsold, shall hereafter be sold at fifty cents per acre; all lands which have been offered fifteen or more years, and less than twenty years, shall be hereafter sold at seventy-five cents per acre; and all lands which have been offered ten or more years, and less than fifteen years, shall hereafter be sold at one dollar per acre: Provided, That not more than one hundred and sixty acres shall be sold to any one purchaser, nor to any other than actual settlers, at such reduced prices.

"SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the consent of the United States shall be, and hereby is, given to the States within which the public lands are situate, to impose and levy a tax on all lands which may hereafter be sold by the United States within their respective limits."

Mr. SEVIER demanded the yeas and nays on this amendment, and they were ordered.

Mr. WALKER opposed the amendment, as likely to insure the defeat of the bill, inasmuch as there were the most decided indications of a settled majority in the Senate opposed to the graduation principle. He argued to show that the principle of taxation had proved insufficient to keep down speculation; and, as to the pre-emption clause, it was so little better than the present system as to confer no valuable boon on the new States.

Mr. SEVIER said: I am glad that the Senator from Tennessee has offered this amendment. I shall vote for it; and I ask if there is a single Senator representing one of the new States who will vote against it? Would any such Senator vote against the right of pre-emption, if that stood alone in the bill? Or if the principle of graduation stood alone, would any Western Senator vote against it? Not one. Or if the bill contained only the provision for the taxation of land as soon as it is entered, is there one who would vote against it? I am sure there is none. Now, here are these three great features of graduation, pre-emption, and taxation—the three chief objects of desire to Western men—all united in this amendment. We all know that one or the other of these principles must be in any land bill brought forward here, or it would not be discussed for a single hour. There is not a Senator from any one of the new States who dare vote for a bill that did not contain one or more of them. But here is a bill that contains them all. As to the provision in the bill from the committee to restrain the sales of the public land, it is all nonsense. Has not the President of the United States the power of restriction in his own hands? Has not the incumbent now in office had that power at any time he chose to use it? And will not his successor have the same? He can withhold the lands from sale whenever he pleases. They cannot be brought into market but by his proclamation. But the truth is, he has never offered them fast enough for our prosperity in the West. We have had to petition him again and again, before he would do it. If the great objection is, that the money for the new lands comes too fast into the Treasury, the President can stop the sales at pleasure. No proclamation, no sale. The graduation principle has been struck out of the bill; and, without that principle, dare any Senator from the new States to vote in favor of it? You know they dare not. But here, as I said, is a bill which contains the three principal things we have been endeavoring to obtain. For my part, if I cannot get all three, I will take two; and if I cannot get two, I will take one. This restriction was put into the land bill to get it friends; but, when we lost the graduation principle, I was then against the bill. /Then it was proposed to provide for a perpetual pre-emption. As long as that was in the bill, I went for it; but when that too was stricken out, I was against it. As the bill stands, the cases of those who have settled on lands since last December are not reached. The bill gives pre-emption only to the emigrants between June, 1834, and December, 1836. Is that the great boon that you offer us? But, even then, the settler must have cultivated the land for three months next before December; that is, during the months of September, October, and November. Can any man get a pre-emption right on such terms? Not one. He is required to cultivate, and every one knows there can be no cultivation. He must cultivate just at the time when we are picking our crop. Pre-emption right, therefore, as the bill now stands, I reckon as nothing; for, in practice, it will come to that. The restriction upon oaths, too, was a bitter pill to me; but I did not mind that so much. But the settler must reside upon his land two years, or he must clear up one tenth part of it, before he can get a title. Now, take out the pre-emption principle, and put in this provision, and how many will vote for your bill? Is there a man here who will vote for this alone? There is not one. But here is a bill which strikes out all these, and gives us just what we want. Shall we hesitate to give it our support? I feel no hesitation in the matter. I shall vote for it. As to the committee's bill, it has got to be a little worse since I determined to vote against it. There is a clause in it now that I myself, out of old friendship for the Senator from Pennsylvania, helped him to get inserted—allowing a man to purchase for his children at private sale; but when I voted for that clause, I thought that the whole amount any man could enter under it was one section. But last night it was extended to all the public lands, and a citizen of the old States was allowed to enter a section for each of his children; and one gentleman wanted to extend it to all his nephews, and neices, and grandchildren; but that would not go down. But the section, as it stands, is bad enough; it gives a non-resident threefold the advantage which is enjoyed by the actual settler. He may enter more land; he is exempt from the necessity of cultivation or residence, and he has a patent mode of freeing himself from all his debts. He has only to invest the money that ought to go to his creditors in the public land, and he has an estate for his children, and is beyond the reach of any one.

But the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER] wants us to believe that a power to tax the land would operate as no check upon speculation. In Arkansas, we have not taxed our entered lands yet, but the lists are furnished and the law will speedily go into effect. The tax imposed by our Legislature is one third of one per cent. upon the value of the land. Assessors are appointed; they go and examine the land of the squatters, and ascertain what it is worth, and then the law taxes it one third of one per cent. Now, a speculator will sometimes hold land enough to cover a whole county; and when this tax is laid upon the land that he is holding up for better prices, he cannot stand it, but is compelled to sell the land to pay the taxes. And I say that this will always operate as an effectual security against the excess of speculation. On the whole, I shall vote for this amendment with pleasure. It takes away the bitter dose that made the bill from the committee so nauseous; and, if any danger is apprehended from excessive sales, and a consequent surplus in the Treasury, the President has power to stop the sales. I should be glad to know how speculators are going to get hold of the land under this amendment. There is but one way for them; and that is, to turn squatters themselves. I shall vote for the whole amendment as it stands; and, if it is amended by striking out any part of it, I shall still vote for it, as long as it retains either one of the three great features which recommend it to me. But I conclude with repeating what I have already said, that any land bill must have in it

Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

one or other of these features, or it does not get my vote.

Mr. BLACK expressed his approbation of many parts of the amendment, but thought, as there was no prospect of the most material parts of them being adopted, that their discussion would delay the bill. The attempt to introduce the graduating principle had been made several times, and failed, and it was useless, he thought, to try it again. As he preferred going on with the bill, faulty as it was, he must vote against the amendment.

Mr. BENTON thought that one of the main objects of the bill had been almost taken away by the principle introduced by the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania. He was in favor of all the objects embraced by the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, but he despaired of seeing them adopted, the votes on the graduation principle having been so often taken and decided against them that he had no hopes of seeing it introduced for at least two or three years to come. Mr. B. took a review of the speculations in the public lands several years ago, which had resulted in so much ruin and distress, and likened the present rage for speculation to that in the above period. He did not, however, despair of seeing the graduation principle in time introduced, though it could not be done now—the darkest hour in the night being that just before the morning. Though he approved of the objects embraced in the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, he must be compelled to vote against it, as he wished the bill to go on.

Mr. WHITE said he was gratified to find that the principles of his amendment were approved of by several gentlemen, and he was the more gratified that no one had been able to offer any argument against it.

Mr. BENTON then observed that as he considered it of importance that the Senate should act with a full understanding of the amendment just offered, so much of which he approved of, he would do what he had not before been willing to consent to since the land bill was under discussion; that is, he would move that the bill be laid over for the present, in order that the amendment might be printed, and laid on their tables in the morning.

Mr. EWING, of Illinois, rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: I hoped that no circumstance would have arisen, pending the discussion of this most pertinaciously contested subject, which would make it necessary for me to solicit the attention of the Senate for a single moment; that hope, however, has proved a vain one. Honorable Senators (especially the gentleman on my left, from Ohio) seem to have taken the interest of a portion of my constituents into their especial care and keeping. Whenever gentlemen are at a loss for a case of fraud and perjury whereby to elucidate their objections to the bill on your table, they conjure up a creation of the imagination, and give it a local habitation in the northern part of Illinois; but more particularly do we have reiterated recurrence to the far-famed, much-talked-of, and little-understood, Beaubien claim. Sir, if we were to take for granted all we have heard about this celebrated claim, we would be forced to the conclusion that the whole matter, from its very inception to the present moment, has been involved in mystery, fraud, and perjury; that the claimants, officers, and all in any wise concerned, have acted dishonest parts in relation to it. Now, sir, what does the honorable Senator [Mr. MORRIS] know about the subject? Nothing, sir, literally nothing. Col. Beaubien has occupied the place he claims the last twenty consecutive years; he occupied it at the time when the Senator would not have ventured within a hundred miles of it; he occupied it in times of great peril, in times of adversity, and in times of prosperity; he occupied it when it was totally without value, when not a Senator would have given a cent an acre for it; and he now has possession of it, when it is worth a million of money. How was this tract of land entered? Why, sir, as I have reason to believe, in the manner that all pre-emption claims should be. Beaubien's papers were regularly and legally made out, and proven, according to the prescribed forms, in the presence of the community; presented to the officers, accepted, the money received, and the certificate issued. The tract was advertised and proclaimed for sale as other lands were, at the same time and place; was not marked (as I am informed) on the plats furnished by the General Land Office to the officers at Chicago, as the other reserved lands were. Open and proclaimed for sale, what course was left for the officers to pursue but that which they did, fearless of the clamors and shouts of collusion and fraud, which were raised by the avaricious and interested about their ears? Of the officers I am prepared to say—and what I do say I hope will put an end to all reference to them hereafter—I repeat, that I am prepared to assume the responsibility of saying, in relation to the register and receiver at Chicago, that any imputation against their official integrity would be foul injustice; and that such was the malignity of their enemies—I mean those seeking their places—that had they conceived it possible to give tangibility and substance to the many rumors of which themselves were the authors, they would have at least made the attempt; but, having failed even to make that attempt, I hold the officers not guilty until it is otherwise shown. It is not my purpose, Mr. President, to argue this case. It has been, and is now, before the judicial tribunals of the country. Its discussion here might in some respect affect the ultimate decision of the case, and prejudice the just rights of the weaker party; for all know, that in a contest between an individual and the United States, his must be a plain case, and he of much forbearance and long suffering, before he can expect to have common justice done him, especially if it be an arithmetical calculation of dollars and cents. Since, however, I have taken the floor, I hope I may be excused for occupying the attention of the Senate for a few minutes longer, which shall be devoted to the subject now under consideration, especially when it is recollected that any question touching the sale of the public lands is deeply interesting to the Western people, and that the peculiar circumstances of the State of Illinois at this time render the subject particularly important to my constituents.

The recent influx of population into the State has been great beyond all precedent. During the period of my own residence in Illinois, I have seen the number of people swell from 40,000 to nearly 400,000; and those immense prairies, which at one period were supposed to be doomed to lie for ages an unproductive wilderness, are now beginning to be covered with an industrious, honest, and enterprising race of farmers. The last three years, especially, have been distinguished by the unexampled rapidity with which this interesting process has been carried forward, and is still in progress. The tide continues to sweep on with undiminished force; and it will swell and roll on, until the plains of that fertile region shall be peopled with American citizens.

The largest portion of this active emigration are farmers—persons seeking homes and a soil from which to earn a livelihood, and, of course, purchasers of public lands. Their relations to the Government, therefore, in reference to the public lands, are of the most intimate character. It is impossible to legislate on the subject without affecting their interest; and Congress cannot touch the question, in the most unimportant particular, without awakening the liveliest attention on the part of those whom I have the honor in part to represent.

Sir, there never has been a session of the Legislature

Public Lands.

of Illinois, since its organization as a State, in which the subject of the public lands has not been agitated, or in which resolutions and memorials have not been addressed to this body, indicating the opinions of that people with regard to this important topic. I mention this circumstance, because it is, in itself, entitled to controlling influence with me.

Looking back, sir, at the various landmarks which indicate the current of public sentiment in reference to this question, I find that Illinois has uniformly advocated reduction and the graduation of the price of the public lands, and the extension of the right of pre-emption to the actual settler. It has been long a subject of complaint that, whilst there is an endless variety of soil and situation, and corresponding diversity of value in the lands composing the public domain, the whole is offered for sale at the same price—a price equal for all locations, and invariable at all times. The Government demands its one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre for every tract in its possession—as well for the most unhealthy swamp, the sterile, desert prairie, without timber or water, as the most eligible and beautiful locations and the most productive soil. With regard to every other species of property which is transferred by sale from one individual to another, the value, for the most part, is regulated by natural causes—by the demand, the quality, and a variety of other circumstances. But in this single case the Government fixes an arbitrary price, which is the same yesterday, to-day, and to-morrow; the same under every diversity of place and every fluctuation in the price of the article sold, or of the medium with which it is purchased.

It is true that the uniformity of surface in the new States is great to an extraordinary degree, and that the proportion of first-rate land is correspondingly great. The inconvenience of the present system has, therefore, not been so pressing as it would have been in a country less favorably situated; and the people have submitted to this grievance longer than otherwise might have been the case. But fertile as a great portion of the Western lands undoubtedly are, there are extensive bodies of land which are of little or no present value. Immense prairies destitute of timber, covered with lakes and ponds of water; river bottoms subject to inundation; and thousands of tracts of inferior land, which cannot be speedily brought into proper cultivation.

Much of this land is susceptible of improvement, and might be sold at a fair price, and settled by an industrious population; but it becomes worthless and wholly unsaleable, in comparison with the choice lands in the same region; for when both are offered at the same price, it is obvious that the best only will be taken. No man will have the remainder at the price at which it is held, and it consequently remains unsold in the hands of the Government.

Of the correctness of these positions, abundant proof is found, not only in the personal knowledge and experience of every Western man, but in documentary evidence before you. The reports of the several registers and receivers, made to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 23th of April, 1828, prove, beyond the possibility of cavil, that the price fixed upon the public domain by the Government is arbitrary, and beyond its intrinsic value. It is certainly no evidence of the value of a thing, that because an individual holds a monopoly in the article, he is able to sell it, even on speculation, at a fixed price.

Suppose, for instance, sir, I possess a legalized monopoly in the bread stuffs of the country, held by the same guarantee that the Government holds its monopoly in the public domain: does any one doubt that I shall be able to command my price, though it be an exorbitant one; or is there any more room for entertaining a doubt that in times of great prosperity speculation would be made or attempted, on the purchase and sale of this indispensable necessary of life?

The consequences growing out of a refusal on the part of Congress to reduce and graduate the price of its lands are obvious. When a district of land is offered for sale, it is rapidly overrun by persons in search of the best tracts, which are bought up with avidity; but when the choice situations have been culled, the tide of emigration passes on to a new region, and the Government is called upon to extend its surveys, to create new districts, to establish additional land offices, and to throw into market thousands of tracts, out of which a few only will be sold. Our territory is daily and hourly expanding, without a corresponding increase of population; and millions of acres are thus left unsettled in the very heart of the new States, which would, by a reduction of price, be advantageously settled, and rendered productive to Government, while thousands of our enterprising citizens are following up the newly acquired territory, and roaming off to the frontiers, in search of better lands and cheaper and unmolested situations.

And here, sir, I will explain what might otherwise seem an inconsistency. I have said of my own State, that it is acquiring population with unexampled rapidity; and I am proud to add, that it is rapidly advancing from its frontier obscurity to a high rank among the States of the Union, not merely by her numbers, but by the enterprise, the intelligence, and even the wealth, which is now pouring in a rich and continuous stream into her borders. In that country, which fifteen years ago was a wilderness, blooming in the wild beauty of nature, the labors of agriculture are yielding abundant harvests, an active commerce has been opened, institutions have been founded, and extensive projects of internal improvements have been authorized, under the most favorable auspices. The documents from the Land Office accompanying the President's message, as well as information obtained from other sources, show also immense recent sales of public lands. And it may be asked why people thus prosperous should ask for relief? Why a change should be required in a system under which such cheerful results have been produced? I reply, that the growth of Illinois has been, in a great measure, confined to particular districts; the numerous entries of public lands have been chiefly confined to districts recently brought into market, while the oldest counties in the State are passed over by the emigrant, receiving little increase of population, and deriving little advantage from the wealth brought by emigration.

By these means our settlements become detached; and while in a region where large bodies of first-rate land lie contiguous, a dense population and a high state of cultivation exists, there are immense tracts of inferior lands lying unimproved. These lands do not tempt the settler, when offered at the same price with those which are better; but the most of these neglected lands have a value, which can only be ascertained by a reduction of price. In some of the oldest counties, comparatively few tracts have been entered for many years; the best having been already purchased, and the residue remaining unsold. Should the price of land be reduced, hundreds of indigent citizens might be enabled to purchase homes; many of our most worthy but poor fellow-citizens occupy these lands of inferior quality, with the hope of avoiding the devouring cupidity of the heartless speculator. Having made their homes there, they would purchase these tracts if the price was reasonably reduced, and, by their labor, give them a value which has been denied them by nature. The large tracts of unimproved land lying between our prosperous settlements, and separating them from each other, impose serious obstacles to a system of internal improvement which Illinois is about undertaking. We, sir, of the West, know that it is difficult to make roads of considerable length, when a part of the line of communication leads through an extensive district of unsettled lands, which, contributing nothing in taxation towards the first expense, and nothing in labor to keep them in repair, leaves the whole burden to be borne by the prosperous but scattered settlements which lie at distant points on the route. This objection is applicable to any work of internal improvement which we may undertake in Illinois; nor shall we be able to exert the actual energy we possess, until our population shall acquire vigor by its compactness and continuity of settlement.

The only practical remedy for this evil which occurs to my mind is the principle of reduction and graduation, which has been so often and so ably urged upon the consideration of this body. If, after the lands within a certain district have been offered for sale for a named period, (as has been so repeatedly presented in the shape of amendments to this bill, and as often defeated,) and the choice tracts have been sold, the price should be reduced as has been proposed, the tide of emigration would roll back, and other selections would be made, embracing as large sales as had previously been made. After another term of years had expired, a further reduction in the price would take place, and the attention of the crowd of purchasers, who would be pressing towards the frontier, would be called back to the lands which they had but recently passed over. At every reduction, the intrinsic value of the land would be developed, and new sales consequently effected. The United States would thus rapidly dispose of her lands, instead of encouraging the expansion of her territory, and the diffusion of her citizens, which are already taking place, and must continue to do so, under the operation of a variety of active causes. She would balance, control, and regulate that tendency which is driving our population, with undue rapidity, beyond the borders of our States, and would commence a process which would soon produce a more compact and vigorous settlement of the country. The last period of reduction having arrived, little or no land would be found in the market, and the Senate would then have the proud satisfaction of witnessing the consummation of a protracted act of justice to the public land States. It would see those States placed on an equality with their elder sisters of the confederacy, and in the possession and enjoyment of all the rights, privileges, and immunities, of the original States; your federal offices within their limits removed, and the anxious care of the General Government over the public domain forever cease.

It is to me no small recommendation of this salutary measure, that it has received the decided approbation of our venerated and patriotic Chief Magistrate. In his message of December, 1832, he remarked: "In examining this question, all local and sectional feelings should be discarded, and the whole United States regarded as one people, interested alike in the prosperity of their common country. It cannot be doubted that the speedy settlement of those lands constitutes the true interest of the republic. The wealth and strength of a country is its population, and the best part of that population are the cultivators of the soil." In his message of the 4th of December, 1833, he says: "On the whole, I adhere to the opinion expressed by me in my annual message of 1832, that it is our true policy that the public lands should cease, as soon as possible, to be a source of revenue." And again: "I do not doubt that it is the real interest of each and all the States in the Union, and particularly of the new States, that the price of their lands should be reduced and graduated; and, after they have been offered for a certain number of years, the refuse remaining unsold ought to be abandoned to the States, and the machinery of our land system entirely withdrawn." He says in his last annual message, in reference to the restriction of the sales of the public land to actual settlers, that "it remains for Congress, if they approve the policy which dictated this order, (alluding to the Treasury circular,) to follow it up in its various bearings. Much good, in my judgment, would be produced by prohibiting sales of the public lands except to actual settlers, at a reasonable reduction of price, and to limit the quantity which shall be sold to them. Although it is believed the General Government ought not to receive any thing but the constitutional currency in exchange for the public lands, that point would be of less importance if the lands were sold for immediate settlement and cultivation. Indeed, there is scarcely a mischief arising out of our present land system, including the accumulating surplus of revenue, which would not be remedied at once by a restriction on land sales to actual settlers; and it promises other advantages to the country in general, and to the new States in particular, which cannot fail to receive the most profound consideration of Congress."

Sir, these sentiments emanated from a source entitled to our confidence—from the Executive of our country—from an enlightened and venerable patriot, whose eminent services and unwavering love of country, and purity of purpose, have won for him a popularity and fame which have never been surpassed. Mr. President, I assume the position that the public land States are entitled to more indulgent and magnanimous legislation at the hands of Congress than many honorable Senators seem disposed to extend towards them. The perils, privations, and sufferings, of those who preceded us into the wilderness, who have performed the work of reclamation by opening roads and farms, building houses and bridges, in the preparation of the country for (perhaps) a less meritorious but more wealthy class of citizens, and in the creation of the necessary facilities of easy and convenient intercommunication, constitute, in my poor opinion, considerations of great merit, and should have a marked influence on the action of Congress in all questions touching the interest of the actual settler. Sir, these much-abused frontier settlers form a distinctive class of men, little understood by their transmontane brethren. Proud and independent, generous and hospitable to a fault, brave without consciousness of danger, they raise up a bulwark between the denser portions of our population and the incursions of the savage! Standing as constant sentinels on the outposts of the country, daily accustomed to scenes of peril and privation, they acquire a character for daring and courage that no danger can appal, and which belong to no other class of men. Free from all the vices of populous communities, and their consequent temptations, we hear of few or no instances of crime amongst them. What stranger, that ever visited the log cabin of our pioneers, was not safer in his person and property than in the sumptuous abodes of the rich, surrounded by the votaries of luxury and vice? Where is the instance that he did not receive a heartfelt welcome to all the hospitalities of his humble hearth, and when he departed went forth with the blessings of its inmates? Sir, the person and property of the stranger, I repeat, are more sacred in the log cabin of the borderman, than in the marble mansion of the rich and mighty. The public land States occupy a position of great danger and exposure. An exasperated and barbarous enemy prowls upon our frontier, extending over a distance that would cover more than half the kingdoms of Europe—from Lake Superior to the Gulf of Mexico. It is now the settled policy of Government to establish all the interior Indians on this line of frontier. Are we sure of exemption for a month at a time from alarms of Indian depredations, on this almost interminable frontier? No, sir. The war cry of the fierce Sac on our Northwestern frontier had scarcely been hushed into silence by the courage of my constituents, and the gallant miners under their brave leaders, when the savage yell of the marauding Seminoles proclaimed war on the frontiers of Florida.

Can we reasonably expect this state of things to change for the better? Or should we not rather apprehend increased dangers from the extension of our frontier and the continual accumulation of the Indians on our borders? It is true, we of Illinois have no longer an Indian frontier; but long, very long, will be the time before we can forget our sympathies for our brethren of those States who are exposed. Who, sir, have, and will ever have, to fight our frontier battles, but the citizens of those States and Territories occupying that frontier? Who are more willing to interpose the strong arm of their protection than they? None, sir; they have always fought our Indian battles, and will have to continue to do so. And who, sir, when a civilized Power, forgetful of its propriety, makes war upon us, are the first to rally under their country's standard? Let the victorious fields of the Thames and New Orleans answer.

Besides, sir, the general inability of the frontier settler to pay a greater than the Government minimum price for its lands, taken in connexion with their important services in the primitive settlement of the country, constitute strong claims upon the more generous legislation of this body.

We have heard iterated and reiterated complaints of combinations amongst the actual settlers; we have been favored with the reading of their articles of association at the Secretary's desk; gentlemen declare that these combinations and associations are formed for the avowed object of setting at defiance your laws and Treasury regulations in relation to the sale of the public lands. If this be so, allow me to inquire, is it wise legislation to refuse to pass a law, the enactment of which would prevent the violation of existing laws, and avoid the recurrence of those deprecated consequences? Is it conformable to your views of common sense and common justice to refuse the re-enactment of a law (the pre-emption principle of this bill, for instance) because that law has been in some instances set at defiance and its provisions evaded by the wicked and vicious? To refuse your assent to the provisions of a bill that would make glad the hearts of ten thousand meritorious and good men, because some half dozen unprincipled individuals had made fortunes by the evasion of these principles, and the commission of perjury? Sir, I flatter myself, not, I trust, with the vain hope, that this honorable body will be governed by more elevated views in its legislation on a subject so vitally interesting to so large a portion of these States. Pass this bill, and these much-abused associations will dissolve into their original elements; they will no longer exist. Give the actual settler but the poor privilege of pre-emption to a quarter section of your boundless domain, embracing his domicile, and, as far as it will go, his improvements; then you will no longer hear of these unlawful associations, as gentlemen are pleased to call them. Do but this, then the actual settlers will cease to demand six hundred and forty acres or more.

In the absence of some law securing to the actual settler his improvements, which he acquired under circumstances of great privation and hardship, these associations will continue to exist until every acre of the two hundred millions that you now vauntingly boast the possession of will have been sold, and until the last acre of another two hundred millions is bought and sold; nay, sir, until the last fraction on the Pacific is disposed of. They have existed ever since the national domain has been national property; and such is their moral power, that no force dare attempt to suppress them by violence. But enact now and continue in force a liberal and just system of law in relation to the public domain and rights of the actual settler, and these conventions of the settlers will cease to exist, and in a few years be among the forgotten things.

Who are these actual settlers, whom I boast of as being my constituents? They are men respectable in all the relations of life. As farmers, as mechanics, physicians, teachers, ministers of the gospel, &c., men engaged in the honest pursuits of agriculture, building up towns and villages, establishing schools and churches, creating all the various of machinery of intelligent and respectable society, men having regard for the maintenance of good order in society, of elevated morality—yes, elevated morality; that is the word—and anxious for the promotion of the intellectual and moral culture of those around them, and those that are to come after them. These, sir, in brief, are the men that constitute my actual-settler constituency; and moreover, sir, they are men that know their rights, and, knowing them, are determined to maintain them; and it is these, too, that compose these associations, of which some Senators seem to entertain such a holy horror, and about which you have so much embellished declamation from every quarter of this chamber.

Mr. President, it has been charged that those of my constituents who attended the late sale at Chicago entered into private and unlawful combinations, for the declared purpose of putting down competition at the sales. Sir, the imputation is unfounded. They did, it is confessed, unite with one another for mutual protection and the security of their property against the rapacity of the land robbers, who infested every avenue to the office, like the frogs of Egypt. Thus far they went, and no farther, and this I have always considered a most praiseworthy act; I stand here their vindicator for it.

It is equally incorrect that, after having secured their pre-emption claims at these sales, the same purchasers rose up like hordes of Tartars, and pitched their encampments upon the beautiful plains of Rock river. Not so, sir; I am happy to have it in my power to state that this incomparably fertile and healthful region is now covered by a fresh set of emigrants, composed of some of the most useful and intelligent constituents of Senators from all the Northern and Middle States; and I mention it as one of the many instances of the unparalleled rapidity with which the West, and especially Illinois, is settling and improving. Scarcely had the footstep of the hostile Sac been obliterated, or the smoke of the last watch fire disappeared from view in the distant horizon, when the Northern hive poured down its best population upon us. It is these, and not those who purchased their lands at the Chicago sales, that now inhabit the Rock river country. But they are the same in all that constitutes the character of good citizens and useful members of society. The one, however, is secure in the legal occupancy of his rightful possessions, whilst the other is anxiously awaiting the action of this Legislature for the extension of its long-established munificent policy to them, for the security of their dearest interests.

Mr. President, there are provisions in the bill now under consideration which I think restrictive in the extreme, and which I feel certain will not be acceptable to the settlers on the public lands; but I am equally certain, from repeated efforts made pending this protracted discussion, that the objectionable portions of the bill cannot be stricken out, without endangering its passage. It therefore feel disposed to yield my objections to the vicious parts, in order that the good may be retained. Let it go before the people. Let it undergo the ordeal of their scrutiny; and if they reject it, then will it be the duty of Congress to repeal the obnoxious provisions, and give us a more equitable and liberal system of law on this subject.

Sick and Disabled Seamen.

[SENATE.]

Mr. President, I again repeat that the legislation of Congress is not of that fair and equitable character towards the public land States that their wants and interests demand. All the old States in the Union, on their introduction into the great federal family, were invested with the attributes of sovereign power over all their internal affairs: they were imbued with authority to levy and collect taxes upon every species of property within their respective jurisdictions, for the maintenance of Government, and for whatsoever other legitimate purpose the legislative authority may devise. But not so with the public land States. They have heretofore been, and are now, admitted into the national fraternity manacled in every limb, and bound in fetters of paralyzing restriction. Your General Government, the influence of which is yet in the hands of the old States, and whose policy is directed by them, still retains its property in the public domain within our limits, and is every day exercising the power of making disposition of it, and laughs at all our efforts to place ourselves on an equality with them, as vain and impotent; thus leaving the public land States with a curtailed and limited sovereignty over the soil. If you, in your boasted bounty, set apart a section of land in each township in those States, for the most praiseworthy and commendable purpose of education, the otherwise munificent grant is made in consideration of ample equivalents. You will not permit us to receive an accession of a single emigrant, unless we yield our exemption of five years' taxation. This exemption is the bonafide condition upon which we receive the emigrant. Your policy is to sell your lands, and you compel us to bestow this boon, in order to enable you so to do, and before he is permitted to pass our limits and reside among us.

If you grant a new State any land for the purpose of constructing a railroad or canal, no matter whether it be a national or local work, you are right sure to do it in such manner and under such restrictions as to secure to yourself the benefit of the grant. You most graciously bestow on us every alternate tract, whether it be of swamp, barren, prairie, rocks, or mountains. We, your most grateful donees, proceed in the establishment of the work, and with millions of additional cost complete some stupendous project of internal improvement, and thereby render your barren rocks and lagoons and desert prairie all saleable, and thus give a value to your property which no time or other circumstances could possibly have given it. Most gracious munificence this! If out of our own resources we improve the navigation of a river, if we drain a pond, we are giving a positive value to much of your property, which otherwise would be totally worthless. Every farm we open, every house we build, every town and village which springs up on your boundless domain, creates a value in thousands of contiguous acres, hitherto without any, or offering any inducement to the purchaser. Thus it is you receive for your vaunted princely gratuities equivalents and benefits absolutely amounting to speculations. Sir, I repel the declaration so often repeated here, that the public land States have received "princely gratuities" in lands from Government. We have received no gratuities without corresponding benefit, and, in some instances, ten-fold equivalents. But, sir, instead of gratuities, there has been doled out to us a most parsimonious and niggardly legislation on all questions of relief in any wise touching the public lands, or those occupying them. Your policy, hitherto, has been to encourage, by all practical means, the settlement of those lands; and the imposition of the inhibition against taxation for a limited period of time was among others held out as an inducement to emigration. Now, the policy seems to be changed. Gentlemen complain that the public lands are settling too fast; the redundant population of the parent States are moving in myriads to the fair valley of the Mississippi; whole communities rise up, as it were by common consent, and quit the father land, seeking homes in the West, taking with them much of our mechanical skill, useful industry, and wealth. This state of things must be checked, say they, and they act accordingly.

Every question affecting the interest of the public land States seems to me to be contested here with an unusual and most extraordinary pertinacity. Touch not the public domain, is the battle cry of the enemies of relief measures. It is a nation's richest treasure, bestowed by the immortal Old Dominion, the father of the republic, for the general good—for the whole people, and not for any particular part or portion of them.

Sir, are we doomed forever to endure this abject state of vassal dependence on the bountiful legislation of Congress, for the rights which common sense and rigid justice demand for us? Who will undertake to say that the new States do now enjoy all the rights, privileges, and immunities, of the old States? Sir, we cannot make a road from one county seat to another, without trespassing upon the public domain; we cannot pass the threshold of our humble domicile, without incurring the guilt of punishable trespass. We can go nowhere, build bridges across none of our watercourses, without obstructing Uncle Sam's highways, or building an abutment against and upon some portion of his endless domain. We dare not levy a tax upon nine tenths of the soil within our limits. We must wait the tardy and lingering policy of the Government, in making its sales of those lands, and then wait an additional five years, before the legislative authority of the State can reach them.

The federal authority adopts its system of laws in relation to its lands, and enforces them within our jurisdiction; whilst the State, with all becoming humility, must wait in patient servility until the contingency of sale takes place, and the five years' probation shall have passed away, before her jurisdiction accrues. And thus this humiliating process continues from year to year, the new States every day arriving nearer and nearer to induction within the pale of the constitution, until eventually, after a lapse of twenty, thirty, and forty years, perhaps, we are safely moored within the protection of the guns of the constitution; and we step in, and take our place, in our old age, among the federal family, on an equal footing, in all respects, with our elder brothers.

When Mr. EWING had concluded,

At the suggestion of Mr. WHITE, Mr. BENTON moved that the Senate adjourn, and that the amendment be printed; which was agreed to; and

The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 3.

SICK AND DISABLED SEAMEN.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the Senate bill No. 79, made a written report, accompanied with a substitute for the bill; which substitute suspended, for one year, the tax of 20 cents each on American seamen, for a hospital fund, and appropriated $150,000, for one year, in lieu thereof, to be paid from the Treasury. The report was accompanied with the following resolutions, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for information on the subject:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to ascertain what it will cost to erect three hospitals, of suitable dimensions, for the relief of sick and disabled seamen and watermen upon the waters of the Mississippi river, at the most suitable places for that purpose; also, what it will cost to erect the same number, if needed, on the most important points of the Atlantic and Gulf coasts.

SENATE.]

Public Lands.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be further instructed to draw up the project of a law to regulate the disbursement of funds for the relief of sick and disabled seamen, and for the government of hospitals erected for that purpose.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to enumerate those posts and places in the United States where, because suitable accommodations for the sick cannot be obtained, or from any other cause, there is a strong necessity for hospitals, and to make report upon this and the other instructions in these resolutions at the next session of Congress.

Mr. DAVIS, after the reading of the report, asked for the immediate consideration of these resolutions; which requiring the unanimous consent of the Senate,

Mr. CALHOUN, who had not heard the report, expressed the wish that the resolutions might lie one day on the table.

Mr. DAVIS briefly explained the nature and objects of the bill and the resolutions, remarking that the bill was designed to supply the deficiency in the interim, while Congress might obtain the requisite information, and mature and adopt some proper system on the subject.

Mr. CALHOUN said he understood this to be the commencement of a change in the system, as heretofore existing, by which the hospital fund was supplied by a tax on seamen. He believed that the great and prevailing disease of the times was centralism here; and he was utterly opposed to any thing which would tend to increase it. As soon as the system of affording relief to seamen from the Treasury should commence, there would be no limitation; and he would, therefore, give his protest in advance against the measure proposed by the bill. He was opposed to opening all sluices to further expenses of the Government, as tending to corrupt the public morals, and to endanger our institutions.

The burden (Mr. C. maintained) of relieving sick and disabled seamen did not fall on the seamen themselves, but on the particular branch of business in which they are employed, by which it ought to be borne; otherwise it would become, like harbors on the lakes, and light-houses, an improper burden upon Congress.

Mr. DAVIS said that he was not exactly willing that the measure should go off under such an impression. The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] he thought, would withdraw his objection, if he had paid better attention to the subject. The hospital tax, Mr. D. maintained, fell on the wages of the sailor; and the Senator would agree with him that no class required a higher degree of protection, or were more worthy and meritorious; and no class asked less of the Government. When did the Senator know a sailor to ask for any thing? Mr. D. had not known an instance in which a sailor had asked for a pension or any other grant. He would call the attention of the Senator to a notable case, the destruction of the Philadelphia. While a large number of people engaged in that portion of the service had been for a number of years asking Congress for something, it had never been done by a sailor; it had been demanded by their representatives, and not by themselves.

But all this had nothing to do with this matter. It was thought that something ought to be done for this class of persons on the Western waters, exposed to the peculiar diseases of that region, far away from their friends and the means of comfort. In order to effect this purpose, a tax of twenty cents each had been laid upon their wages by Congress. The Government had not been so liberal as the Senator supposed. The tax, indeed, proved inadequate to the purpose, and the Government had every year appropriated more or less; not much, but enough to cover the expenses. The fund had been conducted, as far as Mr. D. was able to ascertain, with prudence and economy, and had been disbursed under the direction of the Government. But there had been no law on the subject, though the committee thought it was best that it should be regulated by law.

Now, all Mr. D. proposed by the resolutions before the Senate was an inquiry as to the expense of erecting three hospitals on the Western waters, and three on the Atlantic coast, and so many he was sure were needed. He did not propose now to commit the Government to any course of policy. In the bill there was indeed a proposition to change the policy for a single year; but the Government then retained the matter in its own hands, to pursue such a course as might be found expedient and proper. The passage of these resolutions was as much wanted, if the bill should not pass, as if it should.

Mr. CALHOUN said he knew the resolutions did not involve the principle to which he objected, but the bill did; and it was his design now to give notice that he should, therefore, oppose it. He agreed with the Senator that seamen were a meritorious class, and that they were not importunate on Congress. They would not do the mischief, but the persons interested in erecting and conducting the hospitals. Mr. C. again insisted that though the tax imposed on seamen was taken in the first place from their wages, it ultimately fell on the branch of business in which they were engaged; and the interest concerned ought to pay the expense. The patronage of the Government, he maintained, ought not to be extended. He saw no reason why the Government should pay the expense of sickness in one branch of business more than in another. They might just as well pay such expense in the cultivation of sugar, or rice, or cotton. The tendency of the Government was already to the destruction of liberty, and he was opposed to every thing that would give impulse to that tendency. He had no objection to the resolutions, but hoped the bill would not receive the sanction of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS said he thought there was a very wide difference between the cases which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had made parallel. Legislation in regard to seamen commenced with the existence of this Government, and was intimately connected with the subject of commerce, which was wholly subject to the legislation of Congress; and one leading object in this connexion had been to cherish the employment of seamen, as necessary to the defence of the country; and on this same account a preference had been given to American seamen, in contradistinction from foreigners. Was there no difference between extending protection to these men, far from home, destitute of the means of comfort, and not addicted to laying up their wages, and those men who lived on plantations, directly surrounded with the means of health and comfort? And were the two classes equally important in providing for the defence of the country?

Mr. NICHOLAS moved to amend the resolutions by inserting "the Gulf," in connexion with "the Atlantic."

Mr. DAVIS thought it was unimportant; the Gulf was a part of the Atlantic, and the insertion of it might lead to the enumeration of bays and inlets.

Mr. NICHOLAS preferred that it should be noticed more distinctly; and the amendment was accordingly adopted.

The resolutions, as amended, were then adopted.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the land bill; and the question being on Mr. NORVELL's motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate had refused to strike out the 8th section of the bill, it was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative, as follows:

Mr. RUGGLES moved to amend the 8th section by inserting before the word "child" the word "male," so as to give a parent the privilege of purchasing the public land only for his male children under 21 years.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that he hoped that no such amendment as that would be assented to. He had almost rather lose the whole section than vote to exclude the ladies.

Mr. CLAY demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. MOORE said, if any distinction was to be made, he would rather give the exclusive privilege to children of the other sex.

The question being taken, the amendment was negatively by nearly the whole Senate, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Norvell, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Walker, Wall, White—38.

Mr. NILES moved to amend the bill in the 8th section, in that part of it which requires a parent to swear that no previous entry has been made in the name of said child under the provisions of this act, by striking out the words "in the name of said child," and inserting in lieu thereof, "by said parent;" but before any question was taken on this amendment, a question of order was made, viz: whether the 8th section could be amended at all, inasmuch as the Senate had refused a motion to strike it out, and had thereby determined to retain it entire.

The question was argued for a long time. The rules were appealed to: the Chair doubted, and the Senate could extricate itself from the difficulty only by determining, with common consent, to reconsider the former vote, by which a reconsideration had been refused. This brought them back to the point at which they had started in the morning, and presented the question whether the 8th section should be stricken out or retained in the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN had no idea that such opposition would have been made to this section. He had consulted with Western gentlemen before he offered his amendment to it, and he had thought it would meet their approbation. The bill, as it stood, confined the sales of the public lands to those who are in the West. He thought the people of the West would feel the paralyzing effects of the bill, should it pass in its present shape, although they express their willingness to make a sacrifice to diminish the surplus revenue. He was willing to reduce the revenue derived from the sales of the public lands to effect that object. But, when he was asked to vote for a bill which would cut off his own constituents from deriving any advantage from it, he could not agree to it. He was willing, at an early stage, to meet the feelings of gentlemen from the West; but now he was willing to let the section stand or fall upon its own merits; and, if necessary, he was willing to put his vote against the adoption of this or any similar amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT remarked that his object in voting for a bill of this character was to reduce the revenue, and to effect that end by confining the sales of public lands to actual settlers. He did not see why such a principle might not be incorporated in this bill. Was there any one present who admitted that the lands of the Government in market were now offered for sale below their intrinsic value? He would not vote for a proposition to raise the price, because he did not believe the lands were worth more than one dollar and twenty-five cents. But, if he believed in the opinion re-echoed in that body, he should feel it his duty to move to raise the price. He believed the minimum price of the Government was high enough, nor did he think that public policy would admit of its being raised. Entertaining this opinion, he would not admit that it was a privilege conferred on a citizen, to give him an opportunity of purchasing the public land, unless he wanted to use it.

He believed it was a privilege, when a man wanted a farm to cultivate, that he should have land at the lowest price. Mr. W. argued that it was not to be supposed that lands could be sold at the end of ten years, when the country would of course be very much improved in every respect, at the same price as at the present time, though, according to the argument of gentlemen, it would appear that such was to be the case. His judgment was this: that the interests of the whole Union, and of those who live where the lands are located, required that Congress should put them into their hands at as low a rate as reason would dictate, and as rapidly as the growth of the country would permit. But when a sort of pre-emption right was opened to a man, unaccompanied with a settlement, that was not the way to promote a settlement of the lands. Mr. W. concluded with saying that he hoped the vote might be reconsidered, for he had no wish that it should be stricken out, but only modified so as to make it acceptable to the Senate.

After further debate, the question of reconsidering was decided in the negative (so as to retain the section in the bill) by yeas and nays, as follows:

YAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Cuthbert, Dans, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Tipton, Walker, Wright—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Crittenden, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, White—22.

The question now recurring on Mr. WHITE's amendment, it was modified, on motion of Mr. NORVELL, by inserting a clause protecting from the operation of the bill all lands reserved by any of the States for salt springs or for purposes of education.

Mr. WALKER inquired of the Chair whether, in case Mr. WHITE's amendment should be adopted, it would be in order for him to amend it, by adding thereto the second section of the bill as it at present stood?

This led to another discussion on the question of order, when, to relieve the Senate,

Mr. WHITE consented to move, instead of his first amendment, to strike out the second section of the bill, with notice that if that motion succeeded, he should follow it by another, to strike out the residue of the bill, and insert his amendment, as before proposed.

After further difficulty as to questions of order, Mr. WHITE withdrew this motion, and renewed that he had before made, viz: to strike out the whole of the bill excepting the first section, and to insert, in lieu thereof, the amendment quoted above.

After some remarks from Mr. EWING of Ohio and Mr. LINN,

Mr. DAVIS went into a speech of considerable length (which, however, he was, through indisposition, unable to conclude) in opposition to the general principles of the bill.

[Feb. 4, 1837.]

Mr. WEBSTER, desirous to give him an opportunity to conclude his remarks to-morrow, moved an adjournment; but the motion did not prevail, being rejected, by yeas and nays, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Walker, White, Wright—25.

Mr. RUGGLES now moved to amend the bill in the seventh section, in the following clause: "That all the lands of the United States shall hereafter be subject to purchase at public auction or private entry, in subdivisions not less than a quarter-quarter section," by striking out that clause, and inserting, in lieu of it, a provision that every purchaser under the provisions of the bill should be required to enter his land in not more than four separate parcels, nor in less than a quarter-quarter section.

Mr. WALKER opposed this amendment with warmth.

Mr. EWING advocated it, and explained that under the bill as it stood a purchaser might enter his two sections of land in not less than 32 distinct portions of 40 acres each; and provided he cultivated  $\frac{3}{4}$  of these, he might enter the remaining 28 in any State or Territory where there was public land to sell, and that without striking a stroke on either of them.

Mr. WALKER took the contrary position, and argued to show that the purchaser would have to cultivate a small part of each tract.

Mr. EWING insisted upon his first position, contending that the words of the bill would bear that interpretation.

Mr. WALKER declared that, should this amendment prevail, it would destroy the bill altogether, and he should be obliged to vote against it.

Mr. RUGGLES supported the views given by Mr. EWING, and went on to show that, under the 8th section, a man who had ten children might, unless this amendment prevailed, enter 350 separate small tracts of land, wherever he pleased.

It being now past 5 o'clock, Mr. CLAY moved an adjournment; but the Senate refused to adjourn: Yeas 22, nays 24.

The question was then put on the amendment proposed by Mr. RUGGLES, and carried, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Crittenden, Dana, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Morris, Niles, Page, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, White—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Nicholas, Norvell, Robinson, Sevier, Tipton, Walker, Wright—17.

This vote being announced from the Chair,

Mr. WALKER gave notice that he should vote against the bill.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, the bill was further amended in the second section, in that clause which declares "that hereafter no one person shall be permitted to purchase more than two sections," &c., by striking out the word "one."

Mr. DAVIS further proposed to add at the end of the 5th section a proviso, that if any land claimed under the pre-emption clause should, at the time, be worth more than $5 an acre, no pre-emption should issue; the Commissioner of the General Land Office being empowered to ascertain the fact.

Mr. SEVIER demanded the yeas and nays on this motion, when it was decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster—16.

The question was now at length put on Mr. WHITE's amendment, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Hendricks, Kent, Moore, Norvell, Preston, Robinson, Sevier, Walker, Webster, White—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Wright—29.

Mr. WALKER observed that, as the bill now stood, it could not receive his vote; and as the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee had failed, there remained but one more effort to save the bill; with which view he moved that it be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

On this motion Mr. DAVIS demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. LINN now inquired whether the Senate, in case the motion to recommit should prevail, would possess any security that they should not be led into the same labyrinth of difficulties through which they had just passed, unless the committee were furnished with some instructions to guide them. In order to give the chairman of the Land Committee time to sleep on the matter, and then to prepare a draught of such instructions as would probably be acceptable to a majority, he moved that the Senate do now adjourn; which motion prevailing,

The Senate accordingly adjourned.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4.

COPY-RIGHTS TO FOREIGNERS.

Mr. CLAY presented a list, on parchment, of additional names of British authors to the address which he had submitted to the Senate the other day, and which, by mistake, he had not then received. He moved that it be printed with the other names attached to the address, and be referred to the select committee raised on that subject; which was accordingly ordered. He also moved the appointment of an additional member of the select committee; which was ordered.

Mr. C. also presented a petition from sundry American authors, praying amendments in the copy-right law. They represent the importance of native literature, and the propriety of extending to it reasonable encouragement. They state that, owing to the fact that booksellers in this country can possess themselves of and publish new works as they issue, from time to time, from the British press, without any charge on account of the copy-right, American authors of similar works are unable to obtain for their copy-rights a fair compensation. They therefore pray that a just security may be given by law to British authors, for the property which they have in their intellectual productions.

Mr. C. understood that the course of this business was, that American booksellers have their agents in Great Britain, who, as soon as a new work makes its appearance, transmit it to them by the first packet. Sometimes it is received from the packet at the Narrows, and the vessel being detained there a short time, from some cause or other, by the time she arrives at the wharves the work is published and ready for distribution. This extraordinary despatch is effected by means of steam presses, and the hundreds of hands employed by some of the booksellers. The consequence is, that the work is often slovenly published, on bad paper, with bad types, and omitting maps, diagrams, engravings, and other illustrations. This the first publishers feel themselves constrained to do, lest some rivals shall publish a cheaper edition than that which they have issued. Purchased in this defective form, no one can get the genuine production of the British author without sending abroad for it, as is sometimes done.

Mr. C. understood that the business of republishing in this country late British works was principally confined to two highly respectable houses in New York and Philadelphia, of whom he did not mean to say one word in disparagement. They merely availed themselves of the actual state of things, and undoubtedly placed the American public under obligations for supplying them so rapidly and so cheaply with the latest effusions of the British mind.

If the foreign author is justly secured in his rights of property, the practical consequence will probably be, that he will sell his copy-right to some American publisher, the work will be carefully and deliberately printed, without mutilation or abstraction, and will be in a condition worthy of preservation.

The petitioners, besides manifesting towards their literary brethren abroad a sense of justice and liberality, pray for some alterations of the law adapted to their own condition.

Mr. C. moved the reference of the petition to the select committee heretofore appointed; which was ultimately ordered accordingly.

Mr. NILES, referring to the memorial from American authors, said they had gone one step beyond what had ever been done. They were not satisfied with obtaining the right to the productions of their own minds; they asked Congress to prohibit, for their benefit, the use of the productions of others. This he opposed at considerable length.

Mr. PRESTON, with a view to correct an erroneous impression which might have been made by his remarks the other day on this subject, said he was not adverse to granting copy-rights to foreign authors. All he meant to say was, that he saw difficulties and embarrassments in the way. He had formerly expressed himself in favor of this grant to foreign authors, which might have been a motive for sending petitions on the subject; and all his inclinations were still decidedly in favor of the proposed measure. He believed, also, that Congress possessed the constitutional power to pass it, and by that part of the constitution which provides for the promotion of knowledge.

We had been in the daily habit (Mr. P. said) of appropriating to our use the productions of minds beyond the Atlantic, without any recompense. We had luxuriated in the works of Sir Walter Scott without any remuneration to him, at the time when he was toiling night and day to pay a debt; when, if he had received from us the thousandth part of the value of his works, the debt would have been paid. Mr. P. had always regarded this as an instance of ingratitude, which of itself induced him very strongly to the support of this measure.

Mr. CLAY, in reply to Mr. NILES, said he was very glad of the benefit of his suggestions, and they would doubtless receive the special attention of the committee. But he thought he would be satisfied that no such mischief was intended as he supposed. The whole object was to put foreign authors on the same footing on which our own authors are in England.

Mr. C. thought the extension of copy-rights would not, on the whole, make any addition to the cost of the books. They were now made up in great haste, consequently a poor article, and at a great expense, which must be paid in the sale of the article; when, without this haste and consequent extraordinary expense, the copy-right might be paid for, and a still better article be procured in proportion to its value. But even if it were not so, we ought to scorn to do an act of injustice to a foreigner, by appropriating his works without compensation; and especially when such compensation was made to our own authors in foreign countries.

The reference and printing were then ordered, as above.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the select committee appointed to consider and report on the mode of examining and counting the votes for President and Vice President, &c., and whether any votes have been given by persons not competent under the constitution, made a special report thereon; which was read.

The report states that in some instances not more than four or five electors have been chosen in some of the States, who are officers of the General Government, (deputy postmasters,) and that such votes are, in the opinion of the committee, not in conformity with the provisions of the constitution; but at the same time the few votes thus given will not vary the result of the election, as it was not contemplated by any one that the appointment of one ineligible elector would vitiate the vote of his State. The report concludes with recommending the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the two Houses shall assemble in the chamber of the House of Representatives, on Wednesday next, at 12 o'clock, and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that one person be appointed a teller on the part of the Senate, and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President of the United States; and, together with a list of votes, be entered on the journals of the two Houses.

Resolved, That in relation to the votes of Michigan, if the counting or omitting to count them shall not essentially change the result of the election, they shall be reported by the President of the Senate in the following manner: "Were the votes of Michigan to be counted, the result would be, for A. B. for President of the United States, — votes. If not counted, for A. B. for President of the United States, — votes. But in either event A. B. is elected President of the United States." And in the same manner for Vice President.

Mr. NORVELL arose and said that the resolutions were joint resolutions. The first prescribed the usual manner in which the two Houses assembled together on the second Wednesday in February, for the purpose of counting the votes for President and Vice President of the United States. To this, of course, he had no objection. The second resolution, in relation to the votes of Michigan, declared, in substance, that if they were not essential to the election of a President, they should be announced, but need not be received as good. Their reception, then, as sound votes, depended upon a contingency which it was known would not happen. He called for a division of the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, in order that he and his colleague might have an opportunity of recording their votes against the second resolution. Michigan, when the people of that State gave their votes for presidential electors, was a sovereign State, acknowledged to be such by an act of Congress of the United States. She was now, before her electoral votes were to be counted, a sovereign State of this Union, acknowledged to be such by another act of the Congress of the United States. He had, therefore, risen to enter his most solemn protest, in behalf of the people of Michigan, against any decision of this body, or of Congress, which would, even by implication, have the effect of preventing their electoral votes from being counted for President and Vice President of the United States; and upon the motion to adopt the second resolution, he requested that the yeas and nays might be taken.

Mr. GRUNDY observed that the committee were unanimous for reporting the second resolution objected to by the gentleman from Michigan. The same course had been pursued with regard to the State of Missouri, and under the like circumstances; and when Senators recollected that this was the very place where the rock lies which may destroy this Government, they would perceive that the committee had good reasons for recommending the resolution objected to. Suppose (said Mr. G.) the two Houses should differ and separate, and suppose the House should refuse to send for the Senate again: where will be your President or Vice President? Though he had been one of the most anxious for the admission of Michigan, yet he thought it better, under the circumstances, that her vote should not be counted, except in the way provided for by the second resolution. To count the vote could do no good, inasmuch as it would not vary the result; and it might do harm. No man was more anxious than he was for the admission of Michigan; yet he must express the opinion that she was not a State of this Union when she gave her vote.

Mr. NORVELL said that, if this Union should ever receive a shock, as intimated by the Senator from Tennessee, it would arise from the practice of injustice by this Government towards one or more of the States of the confederacy, and not from the right decision of such questions as the one now pending. The reception of the votes of a State entitled to vote for the Chief Magistrate of the nation, by whom she, as well as the other States, was to be governed, could never endanger the Union. The result of the late election, he knew, could not be varied by the votes of Michigan; and less hazard would, therefore, be encountered at this time in properly deciding the question upon receiving the votes of States in similar circumstances with Michigan, than at any other time. The case of Missouri, quoted by the Senator from Tennessee in support of the second resolution, was not, upon this point, a case analogous to that of Michigan. Missouri was a State when her electors were chosen, but she was not a State of the Union when the two Houses of Congress assembled to count the electoral votes for President and Vice President. She was not admitted until some months afterwards; but the State of Indiana did present a precisely analogous case to that of Michigan. Indiana, when her electors were chosen, had formed her constitution and State Government; but she was not admitted into the Union until some time in the succeeding December. She became, however, a member of the Union before the electoral votes were counted. When the two Houses assembled, and, in counting the votes, came to those of Indiana, objection was made to their reception. The two Houses separated. Some discussion arose in both on the subject; but, before the point was directly decided by either, a message was sent by the House of Representatives to the Senate, that they were ready to proceed in the count. When they came together again, the votes of Indiana were counted, and recorded among the electoral votes of the other States.

Such is exactly the situation of Michigan. But he had not risen to provoke debate. His object was simply to protest against the principle of the second resolution reported by the Senator from Tennessee, and to ask for himself and his colleague the poor privilege of recording their names against it. He did not know that they would be sustained by the vote of any other Senator present.

Mr. CLAY said that the committee had followed exactly the course adopted in the case of Missouri; and the Senators from Michigan would see that there was to be no exclusion of their votes, though no use might be made of them. Whether they were counted or not, the result would be the same. Now, when gentlemen reflected for a moment upon the operations of this Government, the difficulties to be settled, the important questions pending, and especially the one as to the election of a Chief Magistrate, they would see at once the necessity of avoiding doing any thing which would have the effect of creating excitement, or throwing any difficulty in the way at this particular juncture, when they were about to decide on so very important a question as would have to be disposed of on Wednesday next.

With regard, then, to what the Senator from Michigan [Mr. NORVELL] had said as to Michigan being similarly situated to Missouri and Indiana, when they were admitted into the Union, and yet they were permitted to vote, he could not agree with him. The case of Michigan was not exactly that of Missouri, nor that of Indiana. The act of Congress passed admitted her on certain conditions, and, having accepted those conditions, she became a State, and performed all her functions as a State, and had given her votes for President and Vice President; and but for the formality of this resolution, which was deemed necessary by the committee, she was put upon precisely the same footing as the States which had been mentioned. Whilst, then, he admitted there was some slight difference between the case of Michigan and that of Missouri and of Indiana, he could not admit that Michigan should vote, except in the manner pointed out in the resolution; for he thought, under all the circumstances connected with this matter, it would be better to take the course recommended by the committee.

Mr. CALHOUN remarked that, notwithstanding what was said by gentlemen to the contrary, during the debate on the admission of Michigan, they would now see that she was a State, de facto, at the time she formed her constitution. Now, if they applied the reason of that case to this, what was the result? Michigan was not a State in this Union when her Senators were elected, nor when she voted for President and Vice President. The case was really a clear one, and any reason which would exclude these votes ought to have excluded her Senators from taking their seats on this floor. He did not believe that doubtful questions of this kind should be waived; and this question should be settled at once. He should, therefore, feel himself bound to vote against the resolution.

Mr. LYON asked what course the committee would have recommended in case the vote of Michigan had varied the result. Would Michigan in such case be deprived of her vote? Mr. L. referred to the vote of Indiana, which, under similar circumstances, had been counted, and contended that Michigan was as much entitled to count her vote as was the State of Indiana. He thought the Senate would not make so unjust a discrimination between the two States as the resolution contemplated, and he would unite with his colleague [Mr. NORVELL] in protesting against it.

Mr. GRUNDY, replied that the gentleman could not expect him to answer a question which the wisest of their predecessors had purposely left undetermined.

Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

What might be done under the circumstances adverted to by the Senator from Michigan, should they ever occur, the wisdom of the day must decide.

Mr. PRESTON concurred in all the views taken by his colleague in regard to this question. He confessed his inability to perceive any difference between admitting the Senators to take their seats in that body, and admitting Michigan to vote as the other States of the Union would vote. Looking at the matter in every point of view, he was willing that she should be allowed to vote.

After a few words from Messrs. WEBSTER, GRUNDY, and CLAY,

The question was taken, and the first resolution reported by the committee was adopted, without division; and the second was adopted: Yeas 34, nays 9, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Fulton, Lyon, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Preston, Walker, Wall—9.

Some struggle took place as to the order of business.

Mr. BUCHANAN expressed his hope that the land bill would be taken up, and some final disposition made of it, so that the other business of the country might proceed.

Mr. WALKER expressed the same desire, and said that it was his intention to move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WEBSTER inquired of Mr. WALKER whether, in the general bill reported by the latter to-day, there was not one section exactly the same as one of the sections in this land bill?

Mr. WALKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. WEBSTER then observed that it was contrary to the rules of the Senate that they should have two bills before them at the same time for the same thing. He had no objection, as at present advised, to the principle to which the section related, which was that of the power of a State to tax the public lands within its bounds as soon as sold, and made the inquiry only that the due order of business might be preserved.

The Senate then proceeded to take up

THE LAND BILL.

And the question being on the motion of Mr. WALKER to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands,

Mr. WEBSTER inquired whether the motion had not been to recommit the bill, with all the amendments thereto, which had been agreed upon in the Senate, to the Land Committee.

The CHAIR replied that, by a rule of the Senate, when a bill was recommitted to the committee which had reported it, all amendments dropped, of course, and it went back to the committee in its original form.

A discussion arose on the point of order, which occupied the Senate for a considerable time, but which was finally arranged by the adoption of two distinct motions: one to recommit the bill, (which went back in its naked form;) and another to commit to the same committee the several amendments made thereto, with the understanding that the committee would not, in again reporting the bill, change the great and leading points on which the Senate had come to a deliberate decision; though, on points of minor consequence, and on those not decided, they would be considered as at liberty to modify it at pleasure.

Before the question of recommitment was decided on, Mr. CALHOUN addressed the Senate. I sincerely hope (said Mr. C.) that the motion for recommitment will not prevail. The session is now far advanced; but a single month more remains, and this bill has already occupied more than its due share of the time and attention of the Senate. The discussion which it has undergone has shown that there exists in this body a great diversity of opinion, not on the details only, but on the principle of the bill. A large portion of the Senate are under the impression that nothing ought to be done; and among the residue who are in favor of some bill, the differences of opinion seem to be irreconcilable. If we recommit the bill, the inevitable consequence will be that we shall have a new set of propositions to amend it, and a vast deal of time will be wasted in vain attempts to reconcile things essentially irreconcilable. For myself, I believe the bill to be radically wrong; and that no modifications which it is likely to assume can ever render it right. I had intended to say something on the general subject, but it is now late, and I forego much of what it was my purpose to have submitted to the Senate. I will, however, as briefly as possible, throw out one or two leading views in regard to it.

The professed object of this bill is to restrict the sales of the public land; to put down speculation, and to prevent the accumulation of a surplus revenue. Plausible objects, I admit, and such as sound well to the ear; but the practical operation of the bill which promises them will, as I apprehend, lead to results very different indeed. So many and so subtle are the means by which those in power are able to fleece the community without the people themselves being sensible of it, that the contemplation of it is almost enough to make any lover of his country despair. I have long been sensible of this; but if I was called upon to select an instance which more than others forcibly illustrates the truth of the remark, I would refer any one who doubted to the present bill. When we closely examine its provisions, we shall perceive that, so far from repressing, its effect will be to secure and consummate the most enormous speculation which has ever been witnessed on this continent. This speculation has been produced by those in power, and the large profits they hope to realize are to be consummated by the passage of this bill. The chairman of the committee himself has told the Senate that a body of the public lands, greater in extent than the largest State in the Union, has been seized upon by speculators. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. KING] states the amount at from thirty to forty millions of dollars. This may be an over estimate, but at the lowest calculation the amount cannot be less than twenty-five millions. What has produced this vast investment? What has thus suddenly rendered the public lands an object of such enormous speculation? What but the state of the currency? Our circulating medium has nearly doubled within the space of three years. It has increased from an average of six dollars and a half per head, to an average of ten dollars. And what has been the natural and the inevitable effect? The rise in the price of every thing, the price of which is not kept down by some legal provision; the price of provisions and of labor have nearly doubled, while the price of land has continued fixed by force of law. Is it, then, any thing wonderful that land under this restraint should have become an object of speculation? There lies the root of the evil. This enormous augmentation of the circulating medium has filled all the channels of ordinary business to repletion, and the overflow finds an outlet in speculation. But who have been the authors of this state of things? Every Senator can answer the question. Every body knows that it has been the work of those in power. They began the experiment in 1833. They were distinctly told what would be the result. They were warned that bank capital would increase, and with it the circulation of paper money; but in the face of all argument and all warning, the experiment went on. The only existing check which had power to control the excessive issue of bank paper was put down. The deposits of the public money were transferred from where the laws had put them, and placed in deposit banks, arbitrarily selected at the will of the Executive. The authors of the present state of things are the very men who come here and propose to us this bill as a remedy. These two facts should be put together, and should be kept together, in the mind of every Senator who will form a right judgment in this matter. The removal of the deposits was the first step. We are now come to the second step in the process. The men who accomplished the first have already profited by it politically, and, if rumor speaks true, in other ways also. Does any man here entertain a doubt that high officers of Government have used those deposits as instruments of speculation in the public lands? Is not the fact notorious? Is not one in the immediate neighborhood of the Executive among those the most deeply concerned? Will this be denied? Is it not well known that several officers in the Departments purchased lands to sell on speculation, with the funds officially under their own control? How the same combination of persons profited politically by the same movement, I shall show hereafter.

Public Lands.

Assuming, then, what cannot be denied, that the excessive increase of the circulating medium produced by the experiment is the main cause of these speculations in the public land, and assuming, on the authority of universal rumor, that high functionaries of the Government have availed themselves of the state of things thus produced, I come now to what is my main proposition, namely, that this bill is calculated to consummate these plans of speculation, and that without this measure, or something equivalent to it, they must end in loss.

[Here some explanation took place between Mr. CALHOUN and Mr. WALKER, as to the statements made by the latter in reference to the probable effect of the rejection of the bill.]

Well, sir, be it as the honorable chairman states. He says now that, if this bill shall not become a law, the purchases of the public land will continue to go on as they have done for the last year. Admit it, and what must be the consequence? Cannot all men perceive that in this, as in all other cases, over supply must operate to reduce the price? The honorable chairman tells us that the amount of land required for fair and honest settlement, by the progress of the country, is five millions of acres annually; and that the amount taken upon speculation last year was thirty millions. If so, then there is already in the hands of the speculators a six years' supply. Should all the land offices be closed to-morrow, the amount these speculators hold would not be absorbed by the regular demands of the country in less than six years. Now, the greater part of these large purchases have been made upon loans; the interest is running on; and unless the sales shall be in proportion, do not all men see that the accumulation of unproductive land upon their hands must infallibly ruin these who are engaged in such speculations? Under such circumstances, the help of legislation is the only thing that can relieve them. I repeat it. This bill, or something like it, is indispensable. It puts a finish to the work. The land offices being left open, and no obstructions thrown in the way of the purchase for settlement, we may suppose that one half of the five millions annually required will be purchased from the Government. There will then remain but two and a half millions to take off the thirty millions stock which the speculators already hold; and at this rate it must be twelve years before that stock can be disposed of; and if the stock is to be augmented by new and large purchases during the present year, the speculation must end in inevitable ruin. The thing is plain; it cannot be denied; it admits of no demonstration.

What, then, is resorted to to prevent this disastrous catastrophe? The answer is found in the details of this bill. And I entirely concur with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Davis] in pronouncing them most odious in their character. No American citizen is to be left free to purchase a portion of the public domain, the property of the whole people of the United States, without a license. Yet, before he can buy the land which his own Government has offered for sale, he must first take out a license. Odious as I hold all licenses upon the press or licenses upon trade, I hold this to be fully as obnoxious as either. A license to purchase the public lands! I cannot buy myself a farm, though I have the money in my pocket, till I pay a dollar and a quarter per acre for a license, and then I do not get a title until I have complied with the most onerous conditions; and if, after I have paid my money, I see reason to change my mind, I cannot leave the land without forfeiting all I have paid, if I find the situation to be sickly. I cannot remain there without risking the lives of my family; I cannot sell it to one more accustomed to the climate, without incurring the pain of perjury as a speculator; nor can I remove without forfeiting the purchase money. But supposing the settler remains, he is required to consummate his title, not in a court of law or before a judicial officer, but before the register and receiver of the district. I do not know how Senators from the new States may feel, but this I know, that nothing under heaven shall induce me to place Carolinians in such circumstances. The registers and receivers of a land office to be judges in matters of real estate! Why, sir, these persons, for the most part, are political partisans. They have obtained their offices as a reward for services rendered at the election. Has not the doctrine of the spoils been openly avowed on this floor? Has it not been unblushingly maintained that the party which obtains a political victory has, as a thing of course, a right to all the offices of the State, and to the public money into the bargain, so that they may control it entirely for their own benefit? I have a right, therefore, to assume that, as a general thing, these registers and receivers will be political partisans. What, then, will be the condition of a large portion of our citizens? Allowing the consumption of public lands to be two and a half millions of acres a year, you will have about a hundred thousand voters, the title to whose earthy all will be in the hands of these registers and receivers. Can any thing be conceived more odious? Would the license of the press itself be a measure more hateful or dangerous? Sir, we have spent too much time in considering so monstrous a proposition. I hope we shall not waste upon it another moment.

But, putting the political effects of this bill out of view, let us inquire what will be its moral influence. The Senator from New York [Mr. WAZGURT] told us that he considered the price of public land as already too high, and that he was averse to placing it still higher. Sir, these were his words; but let us look at the face of the bill; its practical effect will be an enormous increase in the price to be paid for the public domain; I put to any man of sound common sense, whether he had not rather give two dollars an acre at once for his farm, and get a good title for his land without further difficulty? I would, most certainly. Consider the terms on which he must buy: the moment he enters his land under this bill, it becomes subject to State taxation; but if he buys from the speculators it will not be so. The entire mass of land purchased last year, and including some of the best parts of the public domain, is now held for sale free of taxation, while land purchased from the Government must immediately be taxed. What chance will the United States lands have against such a competition? None at all; the speculators will have the complete monopoly. This, then, is a question between the Government and the speculators. Our stock is one hundred and twenty millions, theirs is thirty millions; our land is at a dollar and a quarter, theirs is at not less than three dollars; and here is a fair competition. But this bill comes in, and throws the market into the hands of the speculators. In any other than these extraordinary times, one would suppose that these objections must be fatal to any bill. It is most obvious that unless you throw restrictions round the purchase of land from the United States, the object of the speculators must be defeated.

But we are asked, what is to be done with all this speculation? I answer, let it alone, and it will run down of itself. The times will react—the present state of things is artificial—it cannot possibly continue. Speculation, after it has run its course, will run down, and that with far less injury than will result from any attempt to put it down by legislation. If, however, you do legislate, there are many expedients besides that proposed in this bill. In the first place, you may raise the price of the public lands. This, to be sure, will confer a great benefit on those who have already purchased; but it will check future speculation. I have, however, no idea that any such measure will be resorted to; it would be very unpopular; and the object which gentlemen have in view must be secured without the loss of personal popularity. Then, in the second place, you may shut the land offices. This expedient, however, would be liable to the same objections with the other; for you can hit upon none which will not either be inoperative altogether, or of great advantage to those who have already purchased. My opinion, in regard to the public lands, has undergone a great change during the course of this debate. I thought there was a majority in this Senate who would resolutely object to all rash changes in our land system. I hoped, most confidently, that New England at least would have stood fast. I have been disappointed. I hoped that the public lands would not be drawn into our political contests. But in this, too, I have been entirely disappointed. I see that the era has arrived when our large capitalists are in a fair way to seize upon the whole body of the public lands. This has compelled a great change to take place in my mind. I greatly fear that we have reached the time when the public domain is lost to the Government for all useful purposes. We may, indeed, receive some amount of revenue from it, but it will be accompanied with such agitations, and so much trouble and political corruption, that the gain will not compensate for the evil incurred. I have made up my mind, if a fair concession can be made, to concede the whole to the new States, on some fixed and well-considered condition. I am for transferring the whole, on the condition that they shall pay us a certain per cent. of the proceeds, and submit to the necessary limitations as to the mode of bringing the lands into the market. The present system of sale not to be disturbed for some years, and after that the principle of graduation to be prudently introduced. I have always felt the force of the argument that the new States are not now placed upon an equal footing with the other members of the confederacy. They are full of our land officers and of public officers under our control; and in regard to the soil within their limits, they sustain to us a relation which must ever be productive of discontent and agitation. Whether a thing of this kind can safely be done, I do not know; but of this I am fully persuaded, that such a measure would be infinitely better than the scheme proposed in this bill. The chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands has avowed his own earnest belief that the evils of the existing state of things are such that even a bill like this should be resorted to as a preferable alternative. He considers a surplus in the Treasury as a great evil; (and so do I, too, if it is to be permanent.) And his dread of a surplus is so great that it has prevented him from regarding the details of this bill as I am persuaded he would have done, but for the bias thus produced.

With these views, I conclude by expressing my hope that the bill will not be recommitted, but that we shall either reject it, or suffer it to sleep by laying it upon the table.

The question was then taken on the recommitment of the bill, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 23, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Rives, Robinson, Rugles, Sevier, Walker, Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Kent, Knight, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, White—20.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 6.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. TIPTON said that he was requested to present to the Senate two memorials, signed by citizens of Carroll and White counties, in the State of Indiana, praying Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. These petitions (said he) are printed papers, couched in language both decorous and respectful, and signed by citizens of great respectability. I acknowledge (said Mr. T.) the right of the people to petition Congress for a redress of their grievances, and I feel it to be my duty, as one of their representatives on the floor of the Senate, to present their petitions, and to ask for them a respectful consideration; but I feel it to be due to the petitioners, to the Senate, and to myself, to state, respectfully but firmly, that my reflections on this subject have brought me to a conclusion very different from that which they seem to have arrived at.

I am unable to perceive, sir, whence it is that Congress derives the power to interfere with slavery in the District of Columbia. Our forefathers, in framing the federal constitution, recognised the existence of slavery in a portion of the States of this confederacy, by permitting slaves to be enumerated in apportioning representatives on the floor of Congress. Every attempt made by citizens of the non-slaveholding States to disturb the rights of our neighbors to this species of property detracts the peace of the country and endangers the existence of the Union.

It is contended that Congress has exclusive legislation over the District of Columbia. If that be granted, it is but a delegated and limited power, not original, derivative. Slavery existed in Virginia, Maryland, and other States, before the federal constitution was adopted; slavery then belonged exclusively to the several States, and there it still remains; their entering into the Union did not yield to the Federal Government any right to interfere with the question of slavery within the States or in this District. The States of Virginia and Maryland ceded to the Federal Government this ten miles square, called the District of Columbia, for a seat of Government, and granted to Congress exclusive legislative powers over it for that purpose. This power was given to Congress by the States for special purposes, and is limited, from the very nature of the grant. Congress cannot abolish the right of trial by jury, abridge the liberty of the press, nor establish a national church, in this District, any more than in any of the States; nor do I believe that Congress has a right to interfere with slavery in the District, while Virginia and Maryland continue to be slave States.

Were it possible that the petitioners could effect their object, and abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, they would erect a receptacle in the midst of two slaveholding States for fanatics, abolitionists, and runaway slaves, who would, from their stronghold here, spread dissatisfaction, death, and destruction, through the surrounding country. Could the States who ceded the District have anticipated such a result, they never would have ceded it to the United States. Mr. T. said he was happy in being able to state to the Senate that there were but thirty-three names signed to these petitions, and that he hoped and believed that there was but a small portion of his constituents in favor of the course that the petitioners recommended; that he thought it was best to meet this question fairly; and, taking the suggestion of an honorable Senator from Virginia, not now here, [Mr. Tyler,] he would move to refer these petitions to the Committee for the District of Columbia. Let that committee give us a report that will present a full and fair view of the subject. This, he thought, would quiet the public mind. This course was adopted some years ago, when Congress was overrun with petitions for stopping the mail on Sunday. The memorials were referred to the appropriate committee, and one able report from the chairman of the committee had put that exciting subject to rest, as he hoped, forever.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed the hope that a question would be made on the reception of the petitions. He insisted that, if an objection should be made to the reception of a petition, it was the rule, and for forty years had been the practice of the Senate, to take the vote of reception, without a motion not to receive. He read the rule on this point, which stated that, if there was a cry of the House to receive, and no objection should be made, or if the House were silent, the reception would take place of course. Otherwise, a vote must be taken on its reception. Mr. C. said he had in vain insisted on this at the last session. He hoped the Chair would now sustain the rule, before Mr. C. would be compelled to move a non-reception.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, said he supposed the question before the Senate was, as a matter of course, whether the petition should be received.

The CHAIR was understood to say that the practice which thus rendered a simple objection nugatory, and required a motion not to receive, was erroneous.

Mr. EWING. Such is my opinion as to the rules of this body. But I rise to express my regret that any objection is made to the reception of these petitions. I last year expressed a most decided opinion against the passage of a law which should carry into effect the prayer of these petitioners; and my opinion is still unchanged. I am a citizen of a State in which slavery is not admitted, and all my habits, and feelings, and opinions, are averse to it, both in principle and practice; but I did not then think, and I do not now think, that our National Legislature ought to interfere with the subject. They ought not to interfere with it, for it would exacerbate sectional feelings, which ought to be assuaged rather than excited; and, in justice to the people of the District itself, it ought not, for they are in the midst of a slaveholding population, surrounded with it on all sides. They themselves have been bred up in the same habits. We cannot, therefore, as just legislators, act for these people in a most important matter, involving their social condition, according to the opinions and wishes of those who are entire strangers to them and their condition, and against their own feelings and will.

We did not receive a cession of this territory from the States to which they belonged for any such purpose; nor would such a measure be an act of humanity toward the slave, but the reverse. It would not give liberty to one human being. If such a law were about to pass, all the slaves in the District would be hurried out of it, and sold to the rice and sugar planters in the South; so that the cause of humanity would not be subserved by it. I have therefore been, and am still, opposed to the prayer of these petitioners.

Having expressed once more my views on this subject, I will further say that, in my opinion, great injustice has been done to these petitioners, here and elsewhere. They are not incendiaries, but an orderly, quiet, conscientious part of the community. The opinions which I expressed last year—the same which I now briefly repeat—went abroad to them, and were not, as I ever heard, objected to; they allow the same freedom of opinion which they demand, and which I claim for them; and let me add that they are much mistaken who expect to put down opinion by harshness or proscription. The refusal to receive these petitions is considered as a denial of a constitutional right, and the tendency of our course here is to blend the constitutional right of petition with the abolition of slavery in the District. The effect of this is easily foreseen.

I hope, sir, that these petitions will be received, and referred in the ordinary way, and that a report containing reason and argument will be made by that committee, and go abroad to the people. It would have a better effect on the public mind than harshness either of action or expression here.

Mr. TIPTON said, when he presented the memorials, he thought the usual course would be pursued; but he was satisfied with the decision of the Chair.

Mr. MORRIS, in order to obviate any possible difficulty, moved that the petition be received.

Mr. SWIFT said he thought the same respect ought to be paid to petitioners on this as on any other subject. The kind of opposition which these petitions had met with on their presentation had very much increased the excitement, instead of putting it down; and he therefore regarded it as an improper course, if such were the object.

In Mr. S's State, these petitioners were among the most respectable; and he therefore felt unwilling to have them branded here as fanatics and incendiaries. They might be mistaken; but they were as intelligent and honest as any other people.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed his satisfaction at the decision of the Chair. He hoped the old mode, which had been uniformly practised till within five or six years, would now be pursued.

The CHAIR was understood to say that an objection was alone sufficient to produce the question on reception.

Several petitions were then presented on the same subject—

By Mr. MORRIS: A petition from 2,265 ladies of Ohio; a petition from 3,710 electors of the State of Ohio; a petition from 780 electors of Cuyahoga county, Ohio; a petition from a number of the electors of Laporte, Indiana; also, two petitions from the State of Tennessee, one from 108 ladies and the other from 107 men; all praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GRUNDY asked the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MORRIS] to file with the petitions the letter which enclosed to him the two from Tennessee.

Mr. MORRIS said that the Tennessee petitions were enclosed in a letter from the State of Tennessee, to a citizen of Ohio, by whom they were enclosed to him.

Mr. WHITE asked for the name of the person in Tennessee who had enclosed the petitions to Ohio.

Abolition of Slavery.

[SENATE.]

Mr. MORRIS did not recollect the name, and had not brought the letter with him. He did not know the person who wrote the letter, but had noticed that it was post-marked in Tennessee. As to the citizen of Ohio who had enclosed the petitions to him, he had been assured by a member of the other House, who knew him, that he was a man of the highest respectability, and that his word might be perfectly relied on.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had five memorials to present, from two hundred and twenty-nine ladies of Bucks county, Pennsylvania, and two memorials from sixty-one of the inhabitants of the city and county of Philadelphia, asking Congress to abolish slavery and the slave trade within the District of Columbia.

Whilst presenting these memorials, he would say that, in taking a retrospect of the course which he had pursued at the last session in relation to this subject, it now met his entire and cordial approbation. He believed that the discussion which then took place in this body had been of essential service in directing the public mind to this question. Its true nature was, he thought, now well understood in the State which he had, in part, the honor to represent. He was convinced that, at this time, true policy would forbid any further discussion of this question. We should now avoid excitement, and leave the question to the sober good sense of the people.

He would vote in favor of receiving these memorials, and, after they were received, he should move to lay them on the table. This motion would preclude discussion, and that was what he desired. If, however, a majority of the Senate should prefer again to reject the prayer of these memorials, and any Senator would make that motion, he should again cheerfully vote as he had done before. But such a motion might lead to a protracted debate, which he thought ought to be avoided. For himself, he had now said all he intended to say on this question during the present session.

Mr. MORRIS said the course with which the Senator from Pennsylvania had just expressed himself satisfied had greatly increased the number of such petitioners in Ohio, and had caused the organization of abolition societies in almost every county in the State, all contending for the right of the petitioners to be heard, although many disagreed as to the object of the petitioners. Mr. M. urged that the best and only way to quiet agitation on the subject, and prevent the increase of abolitionists, was for a committee to make a full report, which might be distributed over the country. Mr. M. would vote to print any number of such a report. The people of the West, he maintained, were a reflecting, reading, thinking, judging, prudent people; and the great body of these petitioners, as far as he knew them, were professors of religion, who acted on conscientious principles; and it was impossible to turn aside their zeal, even if it was misdirected, by merely refusing to hear them and answer their requests.

Mr. M. declared his belief that not one of the petitioners wished for the abolition of slavery by force or violence. On the contrary, citizens of the free States would be ready to aid in suppressing any such violence in their sister States. Still it was impossible to stop the progress of human inquiry on this as on every other subject; and the public mind ought, therefore, as far as possible, to be enlightened.

Mr. HUBBARD remarked that he extremely regretted that this subject had been brought before the Senate at this late period of the session. It must be recollected that a very decisive vote had been given in this body, at the last session, expressive of their determination not to act upon petitions of a character similar to those which have just been presented; and he could not but feel a deep regret that this subject was now brought forward—a subject calculated to produce great excitement, here and elsewhere.

But as members of this Senate had been charged with the presentation of memorials, he could not but regret that the honorable Senator from South Carolina had interposed any objection to the reception of these memorials. He believed that the course pursued at the last session was the proper and correct course; and that he fully concurred in the views of the Legislature of New Hampshire in relation to this absorbing subject. When he rose to address the Senate, he supposed that he had in his drawer a paper containing a printed copy of a preamble and resolutions which had been adopted by a great majority of the Legislature of his native State. He intended to have called for their reading, as the preamble and resolutions very fully express his own sentiments and his own feelings, but he had not been able to put his hand upon the paper; and as not many days can elapse before he can be furnished with an official copy of the document to which he had referred, he would, on presenting them to the Senate, avail himself of the opportunity to express his concurrence therewith. He had no doubt as to the course the Senate ought to pursue. His own views upon this subject he had very fully expressed at the last session of the Senate. He had reflected upon the opinions he then advanced, and he had seen no cause for regret at the grounds then taken by him.

He then believed, and he still believes, that no beneficial results would attend the action of Congress upon the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia. In his opinion, an evil rather than a good, would be the effect of any action on the part of Congress. He was so well satisfied with the disposition of the memorials presented at the last session, for the abolition of slavery in this District, that if the memorials now presented should be received, and his friend from Pennsylvania should not renew the motion which he then made, to reject the prayer of these petitions, he would himself present such a motion as a motion to lay the whole mass on the table.

Mr. CALHOUN said he thought it very desirable that the Senate and the South should know in what manner these petitioners spoke of Southern people. For this purpose he had selected, from the numerous petitions on the table, two, indiscriminately, which he wished the Secretary to read.

[These two petitions were read, and proved to be rather more moderate in their language than usual.]

Such is the language (said Mr. C.) with which they characterize us and ours. That which was the basis of Southern institutions, and which could not be dispensed without blood and massacre, was denounced as sinful and outrageous on the rights of men. And all this was proclaimed, in the Senate of the United States, of States that were united together for the purpose of maintaining their institutions in a more perfect manner. Were Southern members to sit quietly and bear themselves denounced in this manner? And if they should speak at all under these circumstances, were they to be denounced as agitators? This institution existed when the constitution was formed; and yet Senators would not only sit and receive them, but were ready to throw blame on those who opposed them.

Mr. C. said he did not belong to the school of those who believed that agitations of this sort could be quieted by concessions; on the contrary, he maintained all usurpations should be resisted in the beginning; and those who would not do so were prepared to be slaves themselves. Mr. C. knew, and had predicted, that if the petitions were received, it would not avail in satisfying the petitioners; but they would then be prepared for the next step, to compel action upon the petitions. Mr. C. would ask Southern gentlemen if they did not see the second step prepared to be taken, not only that the petitions should be received, but referred.

Mr. C. had told Mr. BUCHANAN and his friends, last year, that they were taking an impossible position; and had said that these men would, at this session, press a reference. Were we now to be told that this second concession would satisfy this incendiary spirit? Such was the very position (a reference) at which the other House arrived at the last session. Had they at all quieted the spirit of abolition? On the contrary, it had caused it to spread wider and strike its roots still deeper. The next step would be to produce discussion and argument on the subject. Mr. C. insisted that the South had surrendered essentially by permitting the petitions to be received. He said it was time for the South to take her stand and reject the petitions. He conscientiously believed that Congress were as much under obligation to act on the subject as they were to receive the petitions; and that they had just as good a right to abolish slavery in the States as in this District.

SENATE.]

Mr. C. said the decision of the Chair settled the question that the Senate had a right to refuse to receive the petitions; for, if they had a right to vote at all on the subject, they had the right to vote in the negative; and to yield this point was to yield it for the benefit of the abolitionists, at the expense of the Senate. But it was in vain to argue on the subject. Mr. C. would warn Southern members to take their stand on this point without concession. He had foreseen and predicted this state of things three years ago, as a legitimate result of the force bill. All this body were now opposed to the object of these petitions. Mr. C. saw where all originated—at the very bottom of society, among the lowest and most ignorant; but it would go on, and rise higher and higher, till it should ascend the pulpit and the schools, where it had, indeed, arrived already; thence it would mount up to this and the other House. The only way to resist was to close the doors; to open them was virtually to surrender the question. The spirit of the times (he said) was one of dollars and cents, the spirit of speculation, which had diffused itself from the North to the South. Nothing (he said) could resist the spirit of abolition but the united action of the South. The opinions of most people in the North and South were now sound on this subject; but the rising generation would be imbued by the spirit of fanaticism, and the North and South would become two people, with feelings diametrically opposite. The decided action of the South, within the limits of the constitution, was indispensable.

Mr. TIPTON expressed his surprise at the remarks of the Senator. He thought there was nothing in the petitions which had been read to produce such feelings. He called for the yeas and nays on the question of reception; which were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD moved to lay the question of reception on the table, after remarking that he believed this was the method which had been usually pursued.

This motion was decided by yeas and nays, on the call of Mr. MORRIS, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Cutbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Page, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Walker, White, Wright—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Knight, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall—13.

Mr. DAVIS presented about forty petitions on the same subject, from Massachusetts, and one from Philadelphia, and moved their reference.

The CHAIR stated the question to be on their reception.

Mr. BAYARD moved to lay the question on the table; which was done accordingly.

Mr. MORRIS presented a petition from abolitionists in Ohio, which he said he had received during the preceding debate; and having moved that it be received, read, and referred, with instructions to the committee to report on various points which he specified,

Mr. WHITE remarked that the two petitions from Tennessee, which Mr. MORRIS had before presented, did not originate in that State. In one of them, the word "Ohio" had been erased, and "Tennessee" substituted; and the place in the other was left blank, so that it might have come from any State in the Union.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, said he barely wished to correct an impression of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] that there was a material difference between the action on the petitions at this session and the last. A great proportion of the petitions at the last session were laid on the table precisely in the same manner as had just been done on motion of Mr. BAYARD. The question of reception at the last session was not, at first, discussed at all. But when the question on reception was taken, Mr. K. had voted in favor of receiving the petitions, and he should still do so if the question should arise. He thought the Senate ought to take a ground on which they could stand with all parts of the country. Southern Senators, he said, had been accused of becoming recreant to the rights of their constituents. But the reception, he maintained, was a mere matter of form, to satisfy the constitutional scruples of some of the Senators.

Mr. CALHOUN said he, for one, was extremely pleased with the decision of the Chair, (that a mere objection required a vote on the reception of the petitions.) But he ought to go further, and put the question of reception, whether the petition were objected to or not. According to the rule, he said, the burden of making a motion to receive should fall on those presenting the petitions. Mr. C. had formerly pressed the Chair twice on this point, but was then overruled. The question was, whether we were bound to receive the petitions by the constitution. That question the Chair had now yielded, and had admitted that it was in the power of the body itself to say whether or not the petitions should be received.

Mr. C. again argued that, if Congress were bound to receive petitions, they were equally bound to refer and act upon them.

Mr. SOUTHARD, after adverting to the deep feeling which was always excited in his mind when this subject came up for discussion, observed that it was a great error on the part of Southern gentlemen not to separate in this matter things which should never have been united. Some of these petitions related to the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, while others prayed for the prevention of what they denominated the slave trade in that District. The two questions were entirely different, and ought not to be blended together. Mr. S. then adverted to the practice of slave-dealers resorting to this District, and making it a mart for their traffic, in the conducting of which great abuses were perpetrated, both in the sale of slaves who had been stolen from their masters, and of others who never had been enslaved before. Mr. S. sought no interference with that relation of master and servant which was recognised by the laws of some of the States, and was protected by the constitution. But into the latter question he was willing to look, not as a Northern or as a Southern man, but in relation to the great principles of government and of the Federal Union. In this he was but following the lead of gentlemen from the South. It was from them that the proposition had first come; and the suppression of crimes of this kind, instead of aggravating those evils which the South most feared, would go far toward allaying the spirit which sought to interfere with slavery in the Southern States. The abuses he adverted to would never be tolerated at the South; why, then, should they be suffered here?

Mr. PRESTON replied with great warmth, and insisted that the distinction made by Mr. SOUTHWARD was a distinction without a difference. He objected to all interference with the subject in any shape. The proposition was delusive, and he regretted that it had been advanced by the Senator from New Jersey. The South was sore on the subject. The attacks made upon them were violent and incessant. Their nerves were irritated. Propositions to meddle with the slave trade in the District were but an entering wedge. If Congress once tampered with the rights of slaveholders at all; if the subject got the least foothold in the Senate, he would not give a rush for the rights of the South. He complained of the imputations cast by implication, in these petitions, on the people of the South, as violators of the laws of God, and living in open vice and wickedness, practising a standing sin, corrupting their own morals and those of their children. He considered himself as involved in the general denunciation. The charge was individually insulting, and was utterly false and calumnious, whether in its general or particular application. He denied that the language of the petitioners was respectful and decorous; it cast foul and false aspersions on him and his constituents, and ought not to be admitted into the Senate. He would not stoop to argue the truth of the charge; he pleaded to the jurisdiction; the Senate had no right to entertain it; the South would not consent to be arraigned at this bar.

Mr. SOUTHWARD defended the position he had taken. In the vehemence of feeling, men were often unable to see distinctions that were sufficiently obvious and palpable in their cooler moments. He appealed to the whole history of his life, to show that he had not advocated the principles of the abolitionists. He had cast no imputation whatever on the people of the South. He again adverted to the course of distinguished Southern gentlemen in reprobating the manner in which the traffic in slaves was conducted within the District, and even to bills which had been introduced by them into Congress for the purpose of suppressing it. All he asked was, that two propositions, so entirely distinct as the abolition of slavery in the District and the suppression of crimes and enormities in the traffic in slaves, should be kept distinct from each other. The one he would not touch, and had always refused to touch; but on the other he was prepared to act. He complained that his proposition had been represented as delusive, and utterly disclaimed all intention of a gradual interference with the rights of the South.

Mr. PRESTON admitted that Southern gentlemen, especially Mr. Randolph, had taken the ground adverted to, but he strenuously insisted on the difference of circumstances. The country had not then been filled with abolition principles; and what might then have been done very safely, would now be dangerous in the extreme. Nothing could be done on the subject of slavery in the District that would not immediately affect all the South. He knew nothing of the abuses to which Mr. SOUTHWARD referred; but he knew how the persons who got up these petitions were skilled in dwelling on themes of that kind, and in presenting false and exaggerated pictures, with a view to rouse the feelings of the community, and inflame the fanaticism which was so widely kindled. Sure he was that, if Mr. Randolph could now be on that floor, he would be the very last man to advocate a tampering with this subject.

Mr. BAYARD observed that it was very apparent that this was an exciting subject, and he had made the motion to lay on the table with a view to avoid the two questions of the right of petitions being received. The constitution, as at first draughted and presented to the States, said nothing about the right of petition; nor need it, for that right did not depend on the constitution, but must pertain, of course, to every people under a representative Government of any form. But, when the constitution was reviewed, a clause was inserted, not to confer, but to guard, this right of petition. It did not declare that the people had the right to petition, but it prohibited Congress from passing any law to prevent them from assembling and exercising that right. Mr. B. then made some observations on the rules of the Senate in reference to the reception of petitions, and quoted the journal to show that, under the rule, the question of reception might be raised, if any member chose to call for it. The presentation of a petition was in itself, virtually, a motion that such petition be received, and, if no objection was made, the reception followed of course, and the petition might be referred or disposed of as the Senate thought fit. But if any one objected, the question of reception must be put, and that question was subject to be laid upon the table. Mr. B. concluded by moving to lay the question of the reception of the petition now before the Senate upon the table. He withdrew the motion, at the request of

Mr. WEBSTER, who wished to present some petitions with which he had been charged on the same subject, so that the whole might be included under one. Having presented several petitions, he stated that the petitioners were undoubtedly of the opinion that these ten miles square were the common property of the people of the United States; that they had a common interest in its condition, and in the character of its legislation; and he repeated the sentiment which he had often before expressed, that the prudent and expedient course would have been to refer these petitions to the Committee for the District, and let that committee present a report upon them. As to the right of petition, the gentleman from Delaware was certainly right; nor did the right of reception rest on any rules of the House; it had a deeper foundation in the right of citizens to address their Government on what they conceived to be grievances. The right of petition, though more emphatic in a republic, belonged to the people under all Governments, unless, indeed, a Government like that of Turkey; for even Governments usually denominated despotic were supposed in theory to be formed for the good of the people, and to proceed from them. It was obvious enough that the relation of Congress to the people of the District was peculiar, and its inhabitants very naturally thought that, in a matter which immediately concerned themselves, it was fit that they should take the lead. Most of the petitions referred to two objects: one was the total abolition of slavery in the District, the other was the regulation of abuses connected with it, some of which were extremely offensive to the moral sense of the community. As the subject was one of common interest, if a petition was decorous in its language, it was the right of the petitioners to have it received and considered, not to have it filed away, and a resolve immediately passed not to consider it. Such a process was not in any proper sense the receiving of the petition. The receiving virtually involved some consideration, and he could not see how the Senate fulfilled its duty unless this was done.

Mr. BAYARD further explained the ground he had before taken. While the people under every representative Government had a right to petition, the Legislature had a right to judge of the petition, when received. Suppose a petition should be presented to Congress, praying them to pass a resolution that there is no God, or that the President of the United States be beheaded, or any other request equally extravagant, would the Senate be obliged to entertain it? Certainly they had a right to exercise a sound discretion in the case, and that for this reason: these petitions did not possess the dignity or authority of having emanated from the majesty of the whole people. It was assuming too much to say that they spoke the voice of the people. They were sometimes signed by several thousand petitioners; but what was this, in comparison to the people of the United States? If the whole people spoke, Congress would have no discretion in the matter.

Mr. CUTHBERT said that he had entertained the hope that the first decision in reference to these petitions would have been the last. He had hoped that they would all have been suffered to accumulate, and that one decision would have settled the whole. He regretted to find that there was a corps de reserve; that some had been kept back by the gentleman from Massachusetts, in the same manner as had been done by him last year.

Mr. WEBSTER explained, and observed that he had not been in his seat when the petitions had been presented in the morning.

Mr. CUTHBERT said that so far, then, he withdrew the charge; but he proceeded to refer to certain resolutions which had been adopted in Boston, in 1819, in which that gentleman had been concerned; one of which declared that Congress had authority to act on the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia, and the other that Congress had power to regulate the transfer of slaves from one State to another. He adduced this to show that propositions on this subject did not stand insulated, but as fast as one was yielded another was pressed on. Was it surprising that the indignation of the South should be raised to the highest pitch on witnessing the commencement of a course which was to end in the ruin of the country? It was alleged, indeed, that there were some points on which Congress might act without leading to that train of evils so justly apprehended by the people of the South. But he appealed to every Southern Senator to say whether Congress could touch the smallest mite connected with the entire subject, without sending a thrill of dread and horror through all the South. All who understood the human heart must be aware that when a great and widely diffused scheme of alleged improvement was on foot, the smallest acquisition could not be made without exciting a hope among its advocates of final success. The very smallest concession by this body, in reference to slavery, would immediately be made to ring through the Union; yes, through the world, as giving ground to expect that the abolitionists would at last gain all that they sought. The cry would be raised, we gain one point to-day, and another to-morrow; and the slaveholders concede one thing after another, until the great, the long-sought, the inappreciable benefit of liberating the last slave will have been accomplished. And were gentlemen prepared to sow that seed, the harvest of which must be universal blood and devastation?

Mr. C. took another view. Since the agitation of the abolition doctrine, there had been established a medium of intercourse with the slaves of the South, through which they were made to understand whatever is done in Congress. Take one step in this matter, and could any one satisfy the slaves that that step would be the last? It was impossible. The least tampering with the subject would excite apprehensions in the South which nothing could allay; would raise hopes at the North which nothing could quench, and would excite in the body of the slaves themselves expectations which must render them restless and discontented. He concluded by urging a total abstinence from all interference with the subject.

Mr. WEBSTER, after referring to what had been said as to keeping back petitions, and observing that he presumed Senators were at liberty to choose their own time for attending to their own matters, and regulating themselves by their views of the convenience of the Senate and the despatch of public business, went on to speak of the resolutions to which Mr. CUTHBERT had referred. He had no recollection of the circumstance alluded to, or of what the resolutions contained; but there was not in his mind a particle of doubt that Congress had an unquestionable right to regulate the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia, simply because they constituted the exclusive Legislature of the District. It appeared to him little short of an absurdity to think that there were certain subjects which must be tied up from all legislation. And as to the other point, the right of regulating the transfer of slaves from one State to another, he did not know that he entertained any doubt, because the constitution gave Congress the right to regulate trade and commerce between the States. Trade in what? In whatever was the subject of commerce and ownership. If slaves were the subjects of ownership, then trade in them between the States was subject to the regulation of Congress. But while he held this opinion, he had expressed none on the one side or the other as to the matter of expediency. He thought that ought to be discussed by those who were most concerned in it. A strong appeal had been made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] on the moral and religious aspect of this subject. The petitioners, he believed, felt fully aware of the extent of those considerations; but while he held the right of Congress to act on these petitions, he thought the more prudent course would be simply to refer them; and so as to the other subject, far be it from him to say that it was expedient for Congress to interfere, and to attempt to regulate the commerce in slaves between the States. It may have been discussed so far as related to the passage of laws to prevent slaves from running away, or restore them when they had.

[Mr. SOUTHARD was here understood to say that laws had repeatedly been passed on that subject.]

Mr. W. then asked whether, instead of exhibiting so much indignation that he should in 1819 have had any thing to do in carrying such resolutions as had been referred to, it would not have been better to show that the constitution, in speaking of trade and commerce between the States, did not mean to include slaves? While so much pains were exhibited to resist information on one side, there should not be pains to misrepresent on the other. To maintain the right of Congress was one thing, to hold the expediency of exercising it was another.

Mr. CUTHBERT replied, and said that the country now knew what were the sentiments of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and it would be impossible for him to give any other cast to them than an encouragement to legislation on the subject of slavery. The time and the circumstances under which the resolutions were adopted rendered this impossible. They had been passed in 1819, just after the issue of the Missouri question; taken in connexion with the time and the circumstances, the doctrines in the resolutions were calculated to revolt the whole Southern States, nay, to revolt the entire Union.

Mr. WEBSTER called upon the Senator to remember that he had not admitted that the doctrines referred to were contained in those resolutions.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, made a few remarks, the object of which was to show that the right of petition in the people was perfectly compatible with the rules of Congress as to the consideration of petitions, when presented; in illustration of which position, he referred to a petition recently presented by the authors of Great Britain, on the subject of copy-right. There was no obligation on the part of Congress to receive memorials; it was wholly discretionary; and so it might be in a multitude of other cases. On the general subject, all the South were perfectly agreed. Whatever he himself possessed of earthly good was connected with the tenure of slave property, and he perfectly agreed with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] as to any interference with it.

Mr. RIVES said he had witnessed the whole course of this discussion with great pain and mortification. He did not say which side was to blame, but he could not help observing that gentlemen from non-slaveholding States stood in a very different position from their Southern brethren. They might sit with great coolness, and indulge all the delicacy of their feelings with impunity. They had no cause to be disturbed in relation to their own communities; but when they came on that floor, and gratuitously put forth their notions on a subject which so deeply concerned others, he contended that they were aggressors, and that gentlemen on the other side were acting on the defensive. To present a petition, if respectful in its language, was a duty which Senators were bound to perform; but when, not satisfied with this, they came forward and volunteered their own views on so hazardous and delicate a subject, and claimed for this Government new powers, the calculation must be extraordinary on the passiveness of the South, if gentlemen suppose they were to sit in silence. If a solemn decision of the Senate was entitled to command respect, he would call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the overwhelming majority by which it had pronounced the determination that the subject of slavery in the District was not to be contested on that floor; a majority, if he recollected right, of 34 to 6. After such an expression of the views of this body, could any gentleman persuade himself that it was wise and patriotic to throw into the Senate such a firebrand?

The Senator from Massachusetts held that there was no value in the reception of petitions, unless it were done in substance as well as form, and the petitions were duly considered. But the Senate, the very moment memorials on this subject had been received, instantly turned round and rejected them. Now, would gentlemen have so little regard to the peace of the whole community as not to abstain from agitating a subject of this kind? The gentleman from Massachusetts had taken occasion not only to read sentiments, from the memorials, which were obnoxious to the South, but had volunteered the expression of his own opinion as to the constitutional power of Congress over the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia. Wherefore introduce that subject again? Why put forward the expression of an opinion in regard to the regulation of trade in slaves between the States, to warrant which the Senator could find nothing in the statute book? He had told the Senate that laws had been passed on that subject, and with the sanction of the South. Mr. R. joined issue with the Senator, and called on him to point to the law. He was very confident there was none. As to the laws to which he presumed the reference had been made, they did not touch the matter. Laws to prevent the escape of slaves, or to secure their restoration, were only in fulfilment of the constitution, which expressly provided for the delivering up of runaways; and, so far from being an unfavorable interference with the tenure of slave property, it was, on the contrary, a recognition of the right in slaves, and a guarantee of that right. Mr. R. had no objection that Senators should present their petitions, but he protested against the gratuitous exhibition of these horrid pictures of misery which had no existence. He was not in favor of slavery in the abstract. On that point he differed with the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.] But it was an existing institution; it was recognised and protected by the constitution, and he was at a loss to conceive why, on a subject of this character, honorable Senators would permit themselves to throw firebrands into that chamber. The only pacificating course was that which had been proposed; which was, to lay the question of reception on the table. And gentlemen might be assured that, as often as these petitions were presented, the preliminary question of reception would be moved, and that motion, with its appendages, would as often, he hoped, be laid on the table. Was the miserable farce of receiving these petitions, and then immediately rejecting them, a thing worth contending for? Surely not.

Mr. R. strongly disclaimed all desire to excite jealousy or ill feeling, but reminded Northern gentlemen of the very different circumstances in which they stood towards this subject. They might stir it with perfect safety to their constituents, and possibly with benefit to themselves; but it never could be mooted on that floor without exciting the profoundest feeling throughout the South. He begged gentlemen to desist from such a course. He used the language of expostulation, not of menace, although he felt that a proud consciousness of Southern rights might well warrant him in the use of other language. He appealed to the patriotism of the Senator from Massachusetts. He had on other occasions, and especially in defence of that very Union which is now again threatened, given proofs of it. Mr. R. did not doubt or call it in question. But he appealed to that feeling, and besought that Senator, and all others, to let this subject alone—not to invade the peace of the firesides of their brethren, and not to persist in a course which Southern men could view in no other light than as an aggression upon their dearest interests. When petitions were brought forward, the only proper course was that which had been pursued on his own motion last year, and which had now been renewed in so honorable and peace-loving a spirit by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. CALHOUN explained, and denied having expressed any opinion in regard to slavery in the abstract. He had merely stated, what was a matter of fact, that it was an inevitable law of society that one portion of the community depended upon the labor of another portion, over which it must unavoidably exercise control. He had not spoken of slavery in the abstract, but of slavery as existing where two races of men, of different color, and striking dissimilarity in conformation, habits, and a thousand other particulars, were placed in immediate juxtaposition. Here the existence of slavery was a good to both. Did not the Senator from Virginia consider it as a good?

Mr. RIVES said, no. He viewed it as a misfortune and an evil in all circumstances, though, in some, it might be the lesser evil.

Mr. CALHOUN insisted on the opposite opinion, and declared it as his conviction that, in point of fact, the Central African race (he did not speak of the north or the east of Africa, but of its central regions) had never existed in so comfortable, so respectable, or so civilized a condition, as that which it now enjoyed in the Southern States. The population doubled in the same ratio with that of the whites—a proof of ease and plenty; while, with respect to civilization, it nearly kept pace with that of the owners; and as to the effect upon the whites, would it be affirmed that they were inferior to others, that they were less patriotic, less intelligent, less humane, less brave, than where slavery did not exist? He was not aware that any inferiority was pretended. Both races, therefore, appeared to thrive under the practical operation of this institution. The experiment was in progress, but had not been completed. The world had not seen modern society go through the entire process, and he claimed that its judgment should be postponed for another ten years. The social experiment was going on both at the North and the South—in the one with almost a pure and unlimited democracy, and in the other with a mixed race. Thus far, the results of the experiment had been in favor of the South. Southern society had been far less agitated, and he would venture to predict that its condition would prove by far the most secure, and by far the most favorable to the preservation of liberty. In fact, the defence of human liberty against the aggressions of despotic power had been always the most efficient in States where domestic slavery was found to prevail. He did not admit it to be an evil. Not at all. It was a good—a great good. On that point, the Senator from Virginia and himself were directly at issue.

Mr. RIVES said he had no disposition to get up a family quarrel on a theoretic question between those who were practically agreed. It was certainly very remarkable that the Senator from South Carolina should take him to task for representing him as defending slavery in the abstract, when every word he had since uttered went directly to prove that such was his opinion. Every remark he had made tended to that, and to nothing else. There they differed. Though he (Mr. R.) came from a slaveholding State, he did not believe slavery to be a good, either moral, political, or economical; and if it depended on him, and there were any means of effecting it, he would not hesitate to terminate that coexistence of the two races to which the Senator from South Carolina had alluded, and out of which the present state of things had grown. Yet none had therefore reason to doubt that he should defend the rights growing out of the relations of slavery to the uttermost. No interference with that relation could be attempted without great and abiding mischief; and, if such attempts were persisted in, they must and would inevitably lead to the rupture of those ties which now bound the States in happy union. Great as might be the evil, no remedy for it had been found; and if any were to be devised, it must proceed from those only who suffer the evil; nor would the constitution tolerate the remotest interference by others. When such interference should be forcibly attempted, Mr. R. was prepared to throw himself into the breach, and to perish in the last ditch in defence of the constitutional rights of the South. But he was not on this account going back to the exploded dogmas of Sir Robert Filmer, in order to vindicate the institution of slavery in the abstract.

Mr. CALHOUN complained of having been misrepresented. Again denied having pronounced slavery in the abstract a good. All he had said of it referred to existing circumstances; to slavery as a practical, not as an abstract thing. It was a good where a civilized race and a race of a different description were brought together. Wherever civilization existed, death too was found, and luxury; but did he hold that death and luxury were good in themselves? He believed slavery was good, where the two races coexisted. The gentleman from Virginia held it an evil. Yet he would defend it. Surely if it was an evil, moral, social, and political, the Senator, as a wise and virtuous man, was bound to exert himself to put it down. This position, that it was a moral evil, was the very root of the whole system of operations against it. That was the spring and well-head from which all these streams of abolition proceeded—the effects of which so deeply agitated the honorable Senator.

Mr. C. again adverted to the successful results of the experiment thus far, and insisted that the slaveholders of the South had nothing in the case to lament or to lay to their conscience. He utterly denied that his doctrines had any thing to do with the tenets of Sir Robert Filmer, which he abhorred. So far from holding the dogmas of that writer, he had been the known and open advocate of freedom from the beginning. Nor was there any thing in the doctrines he held in the slightest degree inconsistent with the highest and purest principles of freedom.

Mr. WEBSTER could not perceive the cause of that warmth which had been exhibited by the Senator from Virginia, while he was so strenuously exhorting other gentlemen to keep cool. He did not, however, complain of it. But this he must observe, that that honorable Senator had never heard him say more in disapprobation of slavery than had been uttered by the Senator himself this day. He had used almost the very words of the petition which so greatly offended him, in declaring slavery to be an evil, social, moral, and political. Nor could that Senator express more strongly the want of power in the General Government to interfere with slavery in the States than Mr. W. had often and always done. The Senator had said, however, that those only were interested in this subject who were suffering in the immediate presence of the evil. This Mr. W. could not but consider as a great mistake. Mr. W., though living in a Northern State, and a State non-slaveholding, felt that evil, too, from the train of consequences which it inevitably drew after it. He had as deep an interest in the peace and the preservation of the Union as the Senator from Virginia. But what was there for that gentleman to complain of in the conduct of his fellow Senator? Some of them had received many abolition petitions. Had they presented them from day to day, and annoyed the Senate by a perpetual repetition of the same thing? Was not this the first time they had been brought forward? Mr. W. demanded the exercise of some candor and justice towards Senators situated as they were; and he should take care that such representations were here made as should remove from them imputations which were not deserved. He had himself presented petitions to-day which had been accumulating in his drawer for two months. And he had presented them at the same time with other gentlemen. He had not debated the subject at large, but had confined himself simply to a renewed expression of the opinion that it would be a better and more prudent course to refer the petitions to a committee, and have a report upon them. This was not a novel opinion. It had been entertained by others in that body; and a former member from Virginia had embodied it in a motion. He had expressed no opinion in which Southern gentlemen themselves had not heretofore concurred. Where, then, was the right to complain? But an honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CUTBERT] had gone out of his way to bring into this debate a paper which somebody had given him, and which referred to opinions said to have been expressed by Mr. W. some twenty years ago. In those opinions, as here stated, Mr. W. saw nothing to retract. Neither now nor at any time, in that body or out of it, had any one heard from him any other opinion touching slavery in the abstract, or the power of Congress to interfere with it within the States, than had been expressed by the honorable Senator from Virginia himself. His origin, his associations, his education, his habits of thought—all had taught him that slavery was an evil, and he held it to be an evil, moral, social, and political.

Mr. RIVES thanked the Senator from Massachusetts for the edifying lesson of coolness he had given him. He admitted the perfect justness and propriety of it in a general sense. But he begged leave to remind the honorable Senator that the spectator of a battle, occupying a distant and secure position, might look on with great serenity; while those who were in the midst of the conflict, defending their lives and persons from the point of the bayonet, would reasonably exhibit a very different temper and demeanor. The gentleman himself, if it so pleased his fancy, might disport himself in tossing squibs and firebrands about this hall; but those who are sitting upon a barrel of gunpowder, liable to be blown up by his dangerous missiles, could hardly be expected to be quite so calm and philosophic.

Abolition of Slavery.

[SENATE.]

The honorable gentleman claims great merit for the forbearance of himself and his friends, in holding back their memorials, and presenting them all at once. Now, sir, for myself, I had much rather take the medicine in broken doses, than in so large and overpowering a portion. Gentlemen have gone on, accumulating their petitions, day after day, and now come forward and precipitate them upon us like an avalanche. If these papers were presented one by one, as they are received, in the ordinary course of business, and permitted to take their quiet course to that "tomb of the Capulets" which the previous decisions of the Senate had prepared for them, I could find in my philosophy fortitude enough to bear it with patience. But when an entire day is set apart and consecrated to the business of presenting these memorials, in a long drawn and solemn succession, there is something in such a scenic parade which is well calculated to aggravate the annoyance to the sensibility of Southern men. Here we are, sitting day after day, among our brethren from the other States, perfectly unconscious of danger, while their desks are constantly filling with these combustible materials, and we know not the hour when we may be blown up by some great explosion. Permit me to say to honorable gentlemen that there is something of precariousness and insecurity in this situation, which is far from being comfortable.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has taken occasion also to say that he had expressed no opinion, in regard to slavery, which was not sanctioned by my own sentiments. Now, sir, has the gentleman ever heard from me any thing to countenance his broad and dangerous notions of interference with the subject of slavery in this District? As to the evil, or otherwise, of slavery in itself; as to the existence or non-existence of a power in this Government to interfere with it in the States; these are mere abstract questions, leading to no practical consequences. The real and only practical question is as to the interference of Congress with the subject of slavery in this District. Here is the fulcrum on which the whole lever of abolition turns; and if you give a foothold here, it is virtually a surrender of the whole ground. The surrender of this "vantage ground" to the abolitionists, if I have not misunderstood the vote of the honorable Senator against rejecting the prayer of the petitioners during the last session of Congress, is precisely what he has already done, and is prepared still to do.

I must now (said Mr. R.) address a few observations to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] in regard to the controversy he has thought fit to get up with me in regard to the merits of the institution of slavery. I may say, sir, without fear of contradiction, that no Senator has exhibited a more determined spirit to resist any interference with the subject of slavery than I have done. I deny wholly the power of this Government to act, in any manner whatever, on the subject, either here or in the States. I have been constantly ready to take the highest ground which has been proposed by any Senator here for repelling this interference, by voting at once not to receive the petitions. But, sir, while I have been thus prepared and determined to defend the constitutional rights and vital interests of the South at every hazard, I have not felt myself bound to conform my understanding and conscience to the standard of faith that has recently been set up by some gentlemen in regard to the general question of slavery. I have not considered it a part of my duty, as a representative from the South, to deny, as has been done by this new school, the natural freedom and equality of man; to contend that slavery is a positive good; that it is inseparable from the condition of man; that it must exist, in some form or other, in every political community; and that it is even an essential ingredient in republican government. No, sir, I have not thought it necessary, in order to defend the rights and the institutions of the South, to attack the great principles which lie at the foundation of our political system, and to revert to the dogmas of Sir Robert Filmer, exploded a century and a half ago by the immortal works of Sidney and Locke.

This is a philosophy to which I have not yet become a convert. It is sufficient for me to know that domestic slavery, whether an evil or not, was an institution existing at the time of the adoption of the constitution; that it is recognised and sanctified by that solemn instrument; that there is no right in this Government or in the other States, under any pretext whatever, to interfere with it; that, in regard to the slaveholding States themselves, it was entailed upon them by a foreign and unnatural jurisdiction, in opposition to their own wishes and remonstrances; that there is now no remedy for it, within the reach of any human agency, and, if there were, it must be originated and applied by those only who feel the evil; and that any interference with it by this Government, or the other States, would, in violating the most sacred guarantees of the constitution, rend the Union itself asunder. In pursuing this course, I have the satisfaction of reflecting that I follow the example of the greatest men and the purest patriots who have illustrated the annals of our country—of the fathers of the republic itself. It never entered into their minds, while laying the foundation of the great and glorious fabric of free Government, to contend that domestic slavery was a positive good—a great good. Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Marshall, the brightest names of my own State, are known to have lamented the existence of slavery as a misfortune and an evil to the country, and their thoughts were often anxiously, however unavailingly, exercised in devising some scheme of safe and practical relief, proceeding always, however, from the States which suffered the evil. Mr. Jefferson's writings, from the "Notes on Virginia" to the latest emanations of his great and patriotic mind, are full of the testimony he has borne on this question, in the most impressive language.

In following such lights as these, I feel that I sin against no principle of republicanism, against no safeguard of Southern rights and Southern policy, when I frankly say, in answer to the interrogatory of the gentleman from South Carolina, that I do regard slavery as an evil—an evil not uncompensated, I know, by collateral effects of high value on the social and intellectual character of my countrymen; but still, in the eye of religion, philanthropy, and reason, an evil. But, evil as it may be, it is now indissolubly interwoven with the whole frame of our society; and, if remedy there be for it, that remedy can come from the hand of Omnipotence only. In the mean time, it is inviolably protected by the sanctuary of the constitution itself, and no attempt can be made to disturb it without aiming a parricidal blow at that instrument, which forms alike the security of the rights and liberties of the whole nation. In occupying ground like this, I feel that I rest on solid and tangible principles, the force and justice of which every mind must acknowledge. On the contrary, by putting the defence of Southern rights on the abstract merits of slavery, as a positive good, as a natural and inevitable law of society, you shock the generous sentiments of human nature, you go counter to the common sense of mankind, you outrage the spirit of the age, and alarm the minds even of the most liberal and patriotic among our fellow-citizens of the other States, for those great fundamental truths on which our common political institutions repose. Unfavorable revulsions only, in the public sentiment, can be expected from bold abstractions of this kind; and nothing, I verily believe, has given so strong an impulse to the cause of the abolitionists as the obsolete and revolting theory of human rights and human society, by which, of late, the institution of domestic slavery has been sustained and justified by some of its advocates in a portion of the South. Sir, the true line of principle and policy is to stand upon the solemn guarantees of the constitution, the impregnable position of our acknowledged and indisputable rights; and, in the name of those rights, and of the peace and harmony of the Union, I now call upon the patriotism of the Senate to apply the only quietus the subject admits, by laying the motion to receive these memorials on the table.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. CUTHBERT, WALL, RIVES, CALHOUN, and EWING; when,

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the motion to receive the memorial was laid upon the table, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Cuthbert, Dana, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Nicholas, Norvell, Page, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Spence, Strange, Walker, White, Wright—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Knight, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster—15.

The Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 7.

MEXICO.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, through Mr. JACKSON, his private secretary:

To the Senate of the United States:

At the beginning of this session, Congress was informed that our claims upon Mexico had not been adjusted, but that, notwithstanding the irritating effect upon her councils of the movements in Texas, I hoped, by great forbearance, to avoid the necessity of again bringing the subject of them to your notice. That hope has been disappointed. Having in vain urged upon that Government the justice of those claims, and my indispensable obligation to insist that there should be "no further delay in the acknowledgment, if not in the redress of the injuries complained of," my duty requires that the whole subject should be presented, as it now is, for the action of Congress, whose exclusive right it is to decide on the further measures of redress to be employed. The length of time since some of the injuries have been committed, the repeated and unavailing applications for redress, the wanton character of some of the outrages upon the property and persons of our citizens, upon the officers and flag of the United States, independent of recent insults to this Government and people by the late extraordinary Mexican minister, would justify, in the eyes of all nations, immediate war. That remedy, however, should not be used by just and generous nations, confiding in their strength, for injuries committed, if it can be honorably avoided; and it has occurred to me that, considering the present embarrassed condition of that country, we should act with both wisdom and moderation, by giving to Mexico one more opportunity to atone for the past, before we take redress into our own hands. To avoid all misconception on the part of Mexico, as well as to protect our own national character from reproach, this opportunity should be given, with the avowed design and full preparation to take immediate satisfaction if it should not be obtained on a repetition of the demand for it. To this end, I recommend that an act be passed authorizing reprisals, and the use of the naval force of the United States, by the Executive, against Mexico, to enforce them, in the event of a refusal, by the Mexican Government, to come to an amicable adjustment of the matters in controversy between us, upon another demand thereof made from on board one of our vessels of war on the coast of Mexico.

The documents herewith transmitted, with those accompanying my message in answer to a call of the House of Representatives of the 17th ultimo, will enable Congress to judge of the propriety of the course heretofore pursued, and to decide upon the necessity of that now recommended.

If these views should fail to meet the concurrence of Congress, and that body be able to find in the condition of the affairs between the two countries, as disclosed by the accompanying documents, with those referred to, any well-grounded reasons to hope that an adjustment of the controversy between them can be effected without a resort to the measures I have felt it my duty to recommend, they may be assured of my co-operation in any other course that shall be deemed honorable and proper.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, February 6, 1837.

The message was read; and,

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, it was ordered to be printed, together with the accompanying documents, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. MORRIS presented an abolition petition from Ohio; which was read, at his request.

Mr. WALKER moved that it be not received.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to lay this motion on the table; which was done accordingly, (by yeas and nays, on the call of Mr. MORRIS,) as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Parker, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Strange, Walker, White, Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Knight, McKean, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Robbins, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson—11.

EXPUNGING RESOLUTION.

Mr. BAYARD presented the preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of Delaware, instructing their Senators to introduce and support a resolution to rescind the expunging resolution of Mr. BENTON, and to restore the journal of the Senate to the state in which it was before this act of violence was committed upon it.

Mr. B. said it would be impracticable, or at least improper, to obey these instructions at this session of Congress, as Mr. BENTON's resolution must be regarded as expressing the sense of the Senate as at present composed. But he gave notice that, in compliance with these instructions, he would introduce such a resolution at the next session, and would do so at every succeeding session, as long as he should continue a Senator, till the object should be accomplished; which attempt he hoped would be followed up by every Senator from Delaware. Being thus actuated by the same spirit of continuance which had been so much lauded by the Senator from Missouri, and which in his case had proved so successful, he hoped the day was not distant when they would restore the journal, and make it what he believed was, at this moment, the public sentiment of the people of the United States. He moved (after its reading) that the resolution be laid on the table, and printed.

Mr. BROWN said he did not doubt the perseverance of the gentleman. He would also vote for printing the document, as a matter of respect to the Legislature of Delaware; though, in one case which he instanced, he believed a motion to print such a document had not been carried.

The motion to print and lay on the table was then carried.

FOREIGN AGGRESSION UPON AMERICAN SLAVE PROPERTY.

A resolution offered by Mr. CALHOUN, calling on the President for information in regard to the aggression committed by the authorities of Bermuda on a Southern vessel, freighted with slaves, which was driven by distress into the ports of Bermuda, coming up for consideration—

Mr. CALHOUN observed that the cases referred to in the resolution presented one of the greatest outrages ever committed on the rights of individuals by a civilized Power. The resolution proposed to ask from the President copies of any correspondence that may have taken place with the British Government relative to the seizure, by the British authorities, of the slaves who were carried as passengers in two American vessels. One of these vessels had sailed from Wilmington, in the State of North Carolina, for New Orleans, having on board some slaves, the property of a gentleman removing from that State to the State of Mississippi; and she was wrecked near New Providence, where the slaves were forcibly seized and detained. The Legislature of North Carolina had, in consequence, expressed their disapprobation of such unwarrantable conduct, and unanimously passed resolutions calling upon the General Government to institute an inquiry into the matter. The other case was that of a vessel bound from Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, to Charleston, South Carolina. Having met with very stormy weather, she was forced into the port of Bermuda, where the British authorities took possession of the slaves, and set them at liberty. He insisted that there was not a clearer constitutional question than that a vessel sailing from one port of the United States to another was as free from search as the territory of the United States itself; and when a vessel was forced by stress of weather into a foreign port, she was entitled to commiseration on account of her situation. The claims of humanity, he held, were, in such cases, to be superadded to the laws of nations. These points being so clear, he was astonished that outrages of this kind had been committed for the last three years. He did not doubt, for a moment, but that the Executive had done his duty, and exercised his accustomed vigilance, in reference to these matters. But still he (Mr. C.) was at a loss to perceive how it happened, after such a lapse of time, that the slaves had not been restored, nor any compensation made to the owners. Now, this resolution he had introduced for the purpose of getting information on the subject, and in order that justice might be done to our citizens.

At the suggestion of Mr. GRUNDY,

Mr. CALHOUN modified his resolution, so as to insert in it the words "provided the President does not deem it incompatible with the public interests;" and the resolution, thus amended, was adopted.

DISTRIBUTION OF BOOKS.

The resolution authorizing the distribution, among the new Senators, of nineteen copies of the American State Papers, published by Messrs. Gales & Seaton, coming up for consideration—

Mr. KING, of Georgia, moved to refer it to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. PRESTON objected to the motion. It was a question, he said, of mere distribution; and, if an inquiry beyond that were instituted, it did not properly belong to the Library Committee.

Mr. GRUNDY was opposed to any reference. A committee could do nothing to assist the Senate on the subject.

Mr. LINN suggested the propriety of throwing all such documents into the library. He said he was perfectly willing to do so with his; and would make a motion to that effect to-morrow, unless some other Senator would do so.

Mr. SEVIER said that, if this resolution should not be carried, he should vote that the documents in the possession of the older members should be restored.

Mr. RUGGLES said that those could not be recovered which had been carried away, and some of the Senators would be unwilling to restore what they had received. He thought it was best to serve all alike. It had been said that it was stolen property. If it were so, he was disposed, like the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. SEVIER,] in regard to the public lands, to take his share of the spoils, whatever might be hereafter.

Mr. BENTON suggested two amendments to the resolution: first, to strike all out, and direct the members who had received such documents to restore them; and if that should fail, he would then move that the Secretary should get the documents at the lowest price for which they could be obtained. He would also move hereafter that each Senator should be furnished with the legislative history of the time during which he should remain in Congress.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the resolution was laid on the table.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the

LAND BILL.

And the question being on the adoption of the amendments to the bill reported from the Committee on the Public Lands—

The amendments were read, and Mr. WALKER, chairman of the Land Committee, explained, seriatim, the several points in which the bill, as now reported, differed from the shape in which it had been recommitted.

The sum amounted to this: that, instead of requiring occupation and cultivation for two years, in order to a patent, it required only one year; that, in order to a pre-emption, the land must have been occupied, resided on, and cultivated, prior to the 1st of December, 1836; that a parent must enter land for his children at private sale, and not over two sections for them all, (instead of a section for each child;) and that four quarter-quarter sections might be entered.

Mr. RUGGLES moved to amend the bill in the fourth section, so as to require that the proof of cultivation, &c., by two competent witnesses, should be made "to the satisfaction of the register and receiver," before whom it is to be proved.

The motion was resisted by Mr. WALKER, as being unnecessary, inasmuch as if proof was to be made to any one, it must, of course, be proof to his satisfaction, or the thing was not proved to him.

A long discussion ensued, in which it was insisted by the advocates of the amendment, that, as the bill pointed out how the fact in question was to be proved, viz: by the oath of two competent and disinterested witnesses, unless the amendment should be inserted, all discretion would be taken away from the register and receiver, and he must be obliged to receive an affidavit of two such witnesses as proof of the fact, though he might personally know to the contrary, or though a hundred witnesses should testify the reverse.

A law argument on this point took place between Messrs. BAYARD and BLACK.

Mr. EWING proposed that the inhabitation or cultivation itself should be required by the bill, and not the mere proof of it by two witnesses; the mode in which it should be proved might be added, if necessary; but,

SENATE.]

Public Lands.

[FEB. 7, 1837.]

as the bill now stood, the fact of inhabitation or cultivation was nowhere required. An affidavit was all that was required. He suggested a modification of the amendment, so as to effect this object by requiring a "residence for three months prior to the 1st of December, 1836, and that the same be proved before the register and receiver by two disinterested and competent witnesses."

But this was rejected, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Page, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Walker, Wright—25.

The amendment as at first proposed, requiring the proof to be made "to the satisfaction of the register and receiver," was then agreed to, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Walker, Wright—22.

Mr. SWIFT proposed to amend the 4th section, so as to provide that no pre-emption be granted to any individual for more than "one legal subdivision" of the public land.

But it was rejected, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Tipton, Walker, Wright—25.

Mr. RUGGLES moved to amend the 7th section by striking out the clause about quarter-quarter sections, and inserting a provision that all land purchased under the first five sections of the bill should be taken in subdivisions, according to the public surveys; that none should be entered in less than quarter-quarter sections, and in not more than four subdivisions by one individual.

Mr. R. spoke at some length in favor of the amendment, as necessary to prevent purchasers from roaming over the whole public domain, and selecting, in small parcels of 40 acres, all the choice spots, leaving the residue comparatively valueless. As the bill now stood, a man might enter twenty-one different tracts, in all the States and Territories where the public lands lie.

After a discussion of some length, in which the amendment was opposed by Messrs. MOORE, BLACK, and WALKER, and defended by the mover and Mr. EWING of Ohio, it was rejected, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Tipton, Walker, Wright—25.

Mr. MOORE moved an additional clause, introducing the graduation principle, and securing the pre-emption right of persons who had been deprived of their land by the location thereon of Indian reservations. After a brief discussion, in which Mr. MOORE and Mr. SEVIER took part, the amendment was rejected, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Fulton, Hendricks, King of Alabama, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Walker, White—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Page, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tomlinson, Wall, Wright—29.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, moved, as an amendment in the 4th section, to insert a proviso, "That the applicant shall make oath that he has not received the benefit of any pre-emption law heretofore passed."

Mr. K. stated that the object of this amendment was to break up the business of professional squatters. The object of Congress, he said, was to encourage settlement and cultivation. The restraint on squatting, which was in the 4th section of the bill when recommended, had been left out in this bill by the committee. This proposition, he said, was unanimously accepted by the committee at the last session.

Mr. BLACK opposed the amendment, because no such restraint on speculators existed.

Mr. WALKER also opposed the amendment, because he could see no reason why a pre-emption right should not be granted in a subsequent case as well as in a preceding.

Mr. MOORE said all the new States were not treated with equal justice by this bill. He had endeavored, by his recent amendment, in part to remedy this injustice in regard to his own State, but it had been voted down.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, said this bill was a great deal worse than when recommitted. It was now not a bill to encourage settlement and cultivation, but purely to encourage squatting and speculation. He called for the yeas and nays on the question; which were ordered.

Mr. MOORE vindicated his constituents from all opprobrious epithets, and remarked that the bill had been framed by the political friends of the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was rejected, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Calhoun, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Morris, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, White—22.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, moved an amendment in the 4th section, disallowing the occupancy of any land to which the Indian title had been not only extinguished, but from which the Indians had been removed.

On this amendment a debate of some spirit arose, chiefly between the mover and Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, in the course of which some rather sharp things were said, on the one side, respecting the treatment of the Indians by Georgia, and, on the other, of the character of those who had left Georgia to settle on Indian reservations in Alabama.

The amendment was rejected, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clayton, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Nicholas, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, White—16.

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Page, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Walker, Wright—25.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, moved to amend the 3d section so as to require a residence of two years, instead of one year. The Senate had agreed to this amendment by a decided vote before.

Mr. GRUNDY said that that had been done when the bill contained the feature of prospective pre-emption.

Mr. EWING replied that this had nothing to do with pre-emption, but referred to the regular entry of land by actual settlers.

The amendment was rejected, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clayton, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Morris, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, White—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Walker, Wright—26.

Mr. WALKER moved to correct a mistake in the bill, as printed, by inserting within the year 1836, instead of during the year 1836.

It was carried, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clayton, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, White—16.

The question now recurring on agreeing, as in Committee of the Whole, to the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands, as it had been amended—

Mr. CALHOUN said that the bill, especially since it had been reduced to its present shape, was beneficial neither to the new nor to the old States, and very oppressive to actual settlers. He should infinitely prefer ceding the lands entirely to the States in which they lie; and, with that view, he had prepared an amendment in the shape of a substitute for the present bill, and which he now moved. It was sent to the Secretary's table, and read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "that," in the first line, and insert—

All the public lands within the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Michigan, with the exceptions of the sites of fortifications, navy and dock yards, arsenals, magazines, and all other public buildings, be ceded to the States within the limits of which they are respectively situated, on the following conditions:

First. That the said States shall severally pass acts, to be irrevocable, that they will annually pay to the United States thirty-three and one third per cent. on the gross amount of the sales of such lands, on or before the first day of February of each succeeding year.

Secondly. That the minimum price, as now fixed by law, shall remain unchanged until the first day of January, eighteen hundred and forty-two; after which time the price of all lands heretofore offered at public sale, and then remaining unsold ten years or upwards, preceding the first day of January aforesaid, may be reduced by said States to a price not less than one dollar per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold fifteen years or upwards, preceding the first day of January, eighteen hundred and forty-seven, may thereafter be reduced by said States to a price not less than seventy-five cents per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold twenty years or upwards, preceding the first day of January, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, may then be reduced by said States to a price not less than fifty cents per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold twenty years or upwards, preceding the first day of January, eighteen hundred and fifty-seven, may thereafter be reduced by said States to a price not less than thirty-five cents per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold thirty years or upwards, preceding the first day of January, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, may thereafter be reduced by said States to a price not less than twenty cents per acre; and all lands that shall have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold thirty-five years or upwards, shall be ceded immediately to the States in which said lands are situated: Provided, That all lands which shall remain unsold, after having been offered at public sale for ten years, and which do not come under the above provisions, shall be subject to the provisions of graduation and cession aforesaid, at the respective periods of ten, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five, thirty, and thirty-five years, after said sale, commencing from the expiration of ten years after the same had been offered at public sale.

Thirdly. That the lands shall be subject to the same legal subdivisions, in the sale and survey, as is now provided by law, reserving for each township the sixteenth section, or the substitute, as heretofore provided by law; and the land not yet offered for sale shall be first offered by the State, at public auction, and be sold, for cash only, in the manner now provided by law; and any land now or hereafter remaining unsold, after the same shall have been offered at public auction, shall be subject to entry, for cash only, according to the graduation which may be fixed by the States, respectively, under the provisions of this act.

Fourthly. This cession, together with the portion of the sales to be retained by the States, respectively, under the provisions of this act, shall be in full of the five per cent. fund, or any part thereof, not already advanced to any State; and the said States shall be exclusively liable for all charges that may hereafter accrue from the surveys, sales, and management of the public lands and extinguishment of Indian title within the limits of said States, respectively.

Fifthly. That on a failure to comply with any of the above conditions, or a violation of the same on the part of any of the said States, the cession herein made to the State failing to comply with or violating said conditions shall be thereby rendered null and void; and all grants or titles thereafter made by said State, for any portion of the public lands within the limits of the same, ceded by this act, shall be and is hereby declared to be null and void, and of no effect whatever.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever the President of the United States shall be officially notified that any of the said States has passed an act in compliance with the above conditions, it shall be his duty to adopt such measures as he shall think proper to close the land offices, including the surveying department, within the limits of said State; and that the commissions of all officers connected therewith shall expire on a day to be fixed by him, but which day shall not be beyond six months from the day he received the official notification of the passage of said act.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That on such notification being made, the said States shall be relieved from all compacts, acts, or ordinance, imposing restrictions on the right of said State to tax any lands by her authority, subsequent to the sale thereof, ceded by this act; and all maps, titles, records, books, documents, and papers, in the General Land Office at Washington, relative to said lands, shall be subject to the order and disposition of the Executive of said State.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all lands of the United States within the limits of the State of Tennessee, with the exceptions enumerated in the first section of this act, shall be, and the same are hereby, ceded to said State.

Mr. BENTON objected to any arrangement which extended so far as was proposed by the amendment. We were near another census, when the representation of the new States would be greatly augmented, and they might come into Congress, and write their own terms.

Mr. BUCHANAN had heard a great deal said about bribing the people with their own money; arguments of that kind had been reiterated, but they had never had much effect on him. But speaking on the same principles on which this had been said, and without intending any thing personal toward the honorable Senator from South Carolina, he would say this was the most splendid bribe that had ever yet been offered. It was to give the entire public domain to the people of the new States, without fee or reward, and on the single condition that they should not bring all the land into market at once. It was the first time such a proposition had been brought forward for legislation; and he solemnly protested against the principle that Congress had any right, in equity or justice, to give what belonged to the entire people of the Union to the inhabitants of any State or States whatever. After warmly expressing his dissent to the amendment, Mr. B. said he hoped it would not receive the sanction of any considerable portion of the Senate.

Mr. BLACK was willing to take up the amendment as a substantive measure, independently of the present bill, but not as an amendment to it. He was not prepared to say whether it proposed a good bargain to Mississippi or not; but however that might be, he could not vote for it now. If the pending bill was to fail, it should be by some other means than the interposition of a proposal of this character.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, would vote for the substitute now proposed, in preference to the bill before the Senate. He believed it would be a hundred thousand times better for the people of the United States. He recognised the principles stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and he only regretted that that gentleman had not thought of them a little sooner, so as to apply them to the present bill.

Mr. WALKER said he should vote for the amendment with pleasure: the object it proposed was dear to every new State. It would put them on an equal footing with the other States of the Union; and, much as he was in favor of the pending bill, he should infinitely prefer the substitute. Come from friend of foe, it should have his most decided support, and he returned his thanks to the Senator from South Carolina for having introduced it.

Mr. LINN said he should be sorry if a majority were found to substitute the amendment for the pending bill, for he was well persuaded that then both would be lost. He might probably vote for it as an independent proposition, but could not as it now stood. He had set out with the determination to vote against every amendment which should be proposed, as the bill had once been nearly lost by the multiplication of them. If this amendment should be received, the residue of the session would be taken up in discussing it, and nothing would be done for his constituents. He wanted them to know that he had done his utmost, which was but little, to carry into effect their wishes, and to secure their best interests in the settlement of the new country. He was anxious to obtain the passage of an equitable pre-emption law, which should secure to them their homes, and not throw the country into the hands of great capitalists, as had been done in the case of the Holland Land Company, and thus retard the settlement of the West. As to the evasions of previous pre-emption laws, of which so much had been said, he believed they either had no existence in Missouri, or had been grossly exaggerated. In the course of his professional duty [Mr. LINN is a physician, in large practice] he had occasion to become extensively acquainted with the people concerning whom these things had been asserted, (he referred to the emigrants who had settled in that State under the pre-emption law of 1814,) and he could say nothing of the kind had fallen under his observation. They had come there, in the most cases, poor, surrounded by all the evils and disadvantages of emigration to a new country; he had attended many of them in sickness; and he could truly aver that they were, as a whole, the best and most upright body of people he had ever known.

Mr. SEVIER said that, like the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER,] he here returned his thanks to the honorable Senator from South Carolina for the proposition he had brought forward. It had been from the beginning well known to all the friends of the bill now before the Senate that that bill had never been a favorite of his. The only feature in it concerning which he felt any solicitude had been stricken out; and though he had promised its friends that he would lend them his help in making it as perfect as they could, (and to the very last hour he had kept that promise,) he had honestly apprized them that, when the bill came to the final vote, he should vote against it. He was prepared to go for the substitute proposed by the Senator from South Carolina. Nor did he consider that substitute as being at all at war with the principles of the bill. He regretted that the amendment had not been printed in time, so that its provisions might have been better understood. He was very sure, from what had been said by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] that that gentleman had misapprehended the nature of the bill. It did not propose, as he seemed to imagine, to give away the public lands to any body, but it pointed out a way in which the General Government would get clear of all the embarrassment connected with those lands, and would realize thirty-three and a third per cent. of their entire value. It was a proposition very different from those which had preceded it, and it was the only measure which would give full and final satisfaction to the people of the West. There was a spirit there which even the bill now before the Senate could never satisfy. They wanted the control of the soil within their own limits, and with nothing short of this could they ever rest content. They did not come here, and demand it as a right, but they earnestly desired it, and would most heartily rejoice should any mode be devised by which they could lawfully obtain it. They were freemen, and desired the exercise of sovereignty over their own soil. This was the object they set before them, and for it Mr. S. should never cease to exert himself, so long as he retained a seat on that floor. What did the amendment propose? To throw away the public lands? By no means. But to get clear of all the cumbersome machinery and complicated and expensive system which at present existed, and which had been accompanied with so much vexation and dispute in both Houses of Congress, and to give up the land, for a fair equivalent, to the States within which it lay, that they might dispose of it for themselves, and in their own way. They would of course be concerned to see that the land brought a good price, for they were in themselves to realize two thirds of the proceeds. The remaining third they were to pay to Government, in clear money, and it would be more than the Government had ever netted since they held the domain.

Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

The amendment proposed that which had long been a favorite subject with his constituents. He referred to the principle of graduation. This system had first been started by the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON.] To that gentleman belonged the honor of having first proposed it; and, for having done so, Mr. S. here returned to him his most heartfelt acknowledgments. It had endeared that Senator to multitudes in the West. They called their counties after him; they called their towns after him; they gave his name to their children; and it had secured to him an influence which nothing else could have obtained for him. The Western people had gazed upon his proposition with admiration and delight. They had the terms of it by heart. But the measure now proposed went even beyond this. The Senator from Mississippi, however, was apprehensive that it would endanger the bill. To Mr. S. this was no very formidable objection. But he would here say to that Senator, that if, when a proposal of this kind was brought forward, the men of the West refused to put their shoulders to the wheel, they never need expect to get the benefit, especially when it was brought forward by those who represented the older States. They had surely a right to calculate on the votes of the new States in its favor. Come from what quarter it might, he, for one, stood ready to advocate it. It was as good for the General Government as it was for the West. It got that Government at once clear of all its difficulties with the Indians, and it forever delivered it from squatters, pre-emption rights, and all. If the terms of this arrangement, when they should become known to the American people, would not be found acceptable, as well to the people of the old as the new States, he was greatly mistaken, indeed. He was for the amendment. Let who would vote against it, he would vote for it.

Mr. BENTON made some remarks, which were very imperfectly heard at our reporter's station in the chamber. He was, however, understood to say that he had brought forward a proposition of this general character some years ago; and it appeared, from what had just been stated, that the population of the West approved of the exertions he had made to carry it through; and if there were any votes or voices more decidedly against it than the rest, it was the vote and the voice of the gentleman from South Carolina. We were now within less than three years of the period for taking the new census, and after that time the State of Arkansas would enjoy three or four times her present weight in the councils of the nation. By that time we should probably have three new States: two on the Mississippi, and one on the Gulf of Mexico; while the representation of the new States already in the Union would be greatly enlarged. If the Senator from Arkansas would but restrain his impatience until that period should arrive, the West would settle this question of the public lands just as it pleased. They would settle this matter as they would settle the presidency; and the older States must look to them for both. He was not going to surrender advantages like these for thirty years to come, for the sake of the proposition now advanced. He! he who had introduced this measure; he who had originated it; he who had fought it up, was not going to suffer himself to be forestalled by any thirty years bargain. In three years more, they could write their own terms, and lay them on the table of the Senate. They would be bid for, and bid deeply for, by every candidate for the presidency; and no gentleman, by casting reproaches on him, should cause him, in the least degree, to swerve from his course. He had thus far been able to make himself intelligible to his own people, and he hoped still to be able to do so; and he should retain his position in patience, until Missouri, instead of having two, would have fourteen members in the other House.

Mr. SEVIER said that, if he could get better terms for the West than those now proposed, he would gladly do so. But he thought the Senator from Missouri misapprehended the terms that had been offered. The graduation clause in the amendment did indeed speak of terms of twenty and thirty years; but not of twenty or thirty years from the present time, but from the time the land had been proclaimed for sale. Now, in respect to some of them, that period had already elapsed; and, in regard to others, it was near at hand. It might be very true that presidential candidates would bid deep for the favor of the West, but that was no reason why the West should refuse a good offer when it was made. The present bill, he repeated it, would not satisfy the West; nor would the West ever be satisfied until the lands within their limits were, on terms of some sort, actually ceded to them. Here was a proposition to cede them, and he should vote for it.

Mr. LINN observed that, while the process of forming new States was going on, and the representation in Congress of new States already existing was rapidly augmenting, it ought not to be forgotten that the number of old States was also increasing, and that, consequently, the representatives who were in favor of the interests of the old States were becoming more numerous. Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and others, would soon be among the list of old States, and their influence would be exerted accordingly. Mr. L. said he was a practical man, though his temperament might be somewhat warm. He looked to things which were attainable, and in the near prospect of being obtained, rather than at those contingent and distant. Here was a bill, far advanced in the Senate, and, as he hoped, on the eve of passing. He believed it would secure a great good to his constituents; and he could not consent to risk that bill by accepting the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina. If the Senator from Arkansas would let this go, he might possibly find that it was a better thing than he could ever get again. He wanted that Congress should so regulate the public lands, and so arrange the terms on which it was disposed of, as to furnish in the West an opportunity for poor men to become rich, and every worthy and industrious man prosperous and happy.

Mr. MOORE said that, having heard the bill but imperfectly once read, he did not know as much of it as he wished to know previous to acting upon it. So far as he understood the amendment, he was for it. It seemed strange to him that the two Senators from Missouri should entertain such different views as to the prospects of the West. The Senator nearest him [Mr. BENTON] had very confidently predicted that, in three years, the people of the West would be able to make their own terms; while his colleague, on the contrary, seemed to think that the West would never again get as good a bill as that now before the Senate. He could not reconcile these two prophecies. However, he was not much in the habit of being governed by prophecies uttered in Congress. He thought the amendment offered better terms than had ever been presented to the West before. It was no new doctrine, however, that the new States were entitled to the jurisdiction of their own soil; and the constitution certainly looked to the time when those States would be free indeed, and no longer vassals under the control of this Government, through the public lands. This happy emancipation the amendment proposed immediately to accomplish. As to the payment of thirty-three and a third per cent. of the proceeds, it might, so far as money was concerned, turn out to be no very good bargain for the new States. But it would certainly be a very good one for the General Government, in a pecuniary as well as every other view. It would give that Government more money for the public lands than they would ever be able to realize on any other plan.

SENATE.]

Public Lands.

Besides which, it would most effectually put down the system of speculation so much complained of.

Mr. NILES made a short speech in opposition to the amendment, which he considered as a grand new land scheme, thrown into the Senate like the golden apple of discord. It was an extraordinary proposition in itself, and still more extraordinary as proceeding from the quarter whence it came—from a Senator who had been the very champion of the rights of the whole American people in the public domain. Had not the country had enough of land hobbies? He regretted that it should be deemed necessary to stimulate the spirit of cupidity and agrarianism. He hoped the proposition would be put down; but if it must prevail, away with your 33½ per cent. Let not the Government become a broker, but give up the whole domain, out and out. If the sceptre must depart from the old States, it would at least pass over to men of the same blood and of a common origin.

Mr. NORVELL said that the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina, if presented under any other circumstances, would be extremely acceptable to him, as a representative of the State of Michigan; but before he could vote for it he must have some guarantee that it would pass the Senate and House of Representatives. The prospect, indeed, was beautiful; it was most fair and inviting; and he, as an humble representative from one of the new States, should hail it with delight. But as the bill now before the Senate did not interfere with the principle of the substitute proposed, let this first be passed; then let the other be taken up as a distinct proposition, and, if it proved acceptable, a clause could easily be added at the close, repealing the previous bill.

Mr. ROBINSON moved that the amendment be printed.

Mr. BLACK and Mr. LINN remonstrated; referred to the previous course of the debate, and deprecated the risk of the present bill.

The question on printing was then taken, and decided in the negative: Ayes 16, noes 17.

Mr. CALHOUN then said that he wished the Senate to be assured that, in offering the proposition he had presented, he had no indirect or concealed purpose. He was perfectly sincere in proposing and advocating it, and that on the highest possible ground. When the Senate had entered upon the present discussion, he had had little thought of offering a proposition like this. He had, indeed, always seen that there was a period coming when this Government must cede to the new States the possession of their own soil; but he had never thought till now that period was so near. What he had seen this session, however, and especially the nature and character of the bill which was now likely to pass, had fully satisfied him that the time had arrived. There were at present eighteen Senators from the new States. In four years there would be six more, which would make twenty-four. All, therefore, must see that in a very short period those States would have this question in their own hands. And it had been openly said that they ought not to accept of the present proposition, because they would soon be able to get better terms. He thought, therefore, that, instead of attempting to resist any longer what must eventually happen, it would be better for all concerned that Congress should yield at once to the force of circumstances, and cede the public domain. His objects in this movement were high and solemn objects. He wished to break down the vassalage of the new States. He desired that this Government should cease to hold the relation of a landlord. He wished, further, to draw this great fund out of the vortex of the presidential contest, with which it had openly been announced to the Senate there was an avowed design to connect it. He thought the country had been sufficiently agitated, corrupted, and debased, by the influence of that contest; and he wished to take this great engine out of the hands of power. If he were a candidate for the presidency, he would wish to leave it there. He wished to go further: he sought to remove the immense amount of patronage connected with the management of this domain—a patronage which had corrupted both the old and the new States to an enormous extent. He sought to counteract the centralism, which was the great danger of this Government, and thereby to preserve the liberties of the people much longer than would otherwise be possible. As to what was to be received for these lands, he cared nothing about it. He would have consented at once to yield the whole, and withdraw altogether the landlordship of the General Government over them, had he not believed that it would be most for the benefit of the new States themselves that it should continue somewhat longer.

These were the views which had induced him to present the amendment. He offered no gilded pill. He threw in no apple of discord. He was no bidder for popularity. He prescribed to himself a more humble aim, which was simply to do his duty. He sought to counteract the corrupting tendency of the existing course of things. He sought to weaken this Government by divesting it of at least a part of the immense patronage it wielded. He held that every great landed estate required a local administration, conducted by persons more intimately acquainted with local wants and interests than the members of a central Government could possibly be. If any body asked him for a proof of the truth of his positions, he might point them to the bill now before the Senate. Such were the sentiments, shortly stated, which had governed him on this occasion. He had done his duty, and he must leave the result with God and with the new States.

After a remark or two from Mr. LINN and Mr. BENTON,

Mr. CALHOUN was understood to say that he had sincerely presented the motives of his course. He had in view but one object only, which was the benefit of the new States; although he believed the old States were as much interested to get rid of these lands as the new States to receive them. He thought the amendment contained provisions which would prevent any contest between the new States for this territory. But, provided the great principles of the amendment were adopted, he was not at all solicitous about the details. He should be very willing to submit them to a committee composed of individuals in part from the new and in part from the old States.

The question was now taken on Mr. CALHOUN'S amendment, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, King of Georgia, Moore, Morris, Robinson, Sevier, White—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Southard, Strange, Swift, Tomlinson, Walker, Wall, Wright—28.

The question was next put on agreeing, as in Committee of the Whole, to the amendment from the Committee on Public Lands, as amended, and carried, without a count.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, where the amendments were agreed to, and the bill ordered to its third reading, as follows:

NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. WEBSTER presented the petition of 1,400 or 1,500 persons, of the mercantile community of the city of New York, praying for the establishment of a national bank in that city.

In presenting the petition, Mr. WEBSTER said:

I rise, Mr. President, for the purpose of presenting to the Senate a petition signed by fourteen or fifteen hundred mercantile houses in the city of New York, praying the establishment of a national bank in that city. These petitioners, sir, set forth that, in their opinion, a national bank is the only remedy, of a permanent character, for the correction of the evils now affecting the currency of the country and the commercial exchanges. The petition is accompanied by a short communication from the committee raised for the purpose of preparing the petition, in which they state, what I believe to be true, from some knowledge of my own, that the petition is subscribed without reference to political distinction; and they inform us, on the authority of their own observation and knowledge, that, in their opinion, on no subject did the mercantile community of New York ever address Congress with more entire unanimity than they now approach it, in favor of a national bank.

Mr. President, (said Mr. W.,) my own opinions on this subject have long been known; and they remain now as they always have been. The constitutional power of Congress to create a bank is made more apparent by the acknowledged necessity which the Government is under to use some sort of banks as fiscal agents. The argument stated the other day by the member from Ohio opposite to me, [Mr. MONROE,] and which I have suggested often heretofore, appears to me unanswerable: and that is, that, if the Government has the power to use corporations in the fiscal concerns of the country, it must have the power to create such corporations. I have always thought that, when, by law, both Houses of Congress declared the use of State banks necessary to the administration of the revenue, every argument against the constitutional power of Congress to create a Bank of the United States was thereby surrendered; that it is plain that, if Congress has the power to adopt banks for the particular use of the Government, it has the power to create such institutions also, if it deem that mode the best. No Government creates corporations for the mere purpose of giving capacity to an artificial body. It is the end designed, the use to which it is to be applied, that decides the question, in general, whether the power exists to create such bodies. If such a corporation as a bank be necessary to Government, if its use be indispensable, and if, on that ground, Congress may take into its service banks created by States, over which it has no control, and which are but poorly fitted for its purposes, how can it be maintained that Congress may not create a bank, by its own authority, responsible to itself, and well suited to promote the ends designed by it?

Mr. President, when the subject was last before the Senate, I expressed my own resolution not to make any movement towards the establishment of a national bank, till public opinion should call for it. In that resolution I still remain. But it gives me pleasure to have the opportunity of presenting this petition, out of respect to the signers; and I have no objection certainly to meet with a proper opportunity of renewing the expression of my opinions on the subject, although I know that so general has become the impression hostile to such an institution, that any movement here would be vain till there is a change in public opinion. That there will be such a change I fully believe; it will be brought about, I think, by experience, and sober reflection among the people; and when it shall come, then will be the proper time for a movement on the subject in the public councils. Not only in New York, but from here to Maine, I believe it is now the opinion of five sixths of the whole mercantile community, that a national bank is indispensable to the steady regulation of the currency, and the facility and cheapness of exchanges. The board of trade at New York presented a memorial in favor of the same object some time ago. The Committee on Finance reported against the prayer of the petitioners, as was to have been expected from the known sentiments of a majority of that committee. In presenting this petition now to the consideration of the Senate, I have done all that I purpose on this occasion, except to move that the petition be laid on the table and printed.

Sir, on the subjects of currency and of the exchanges of commerce experience is likely to make us wiser than we now are. These highly interesting subjects—interesting to the property, the business, and the means of support, of all classes—ought not to be connected with mere party questions and temporary politics. In the business and transactions of life men need security, steadiness, and a permanent system. This is the very last field for the exhibition of experiments, and I fervently hope that intelligent men, in and out of Congress, will co-operate in measures which may be reasonably expected to accomplish these desirable objects—desirable and important alike to all classes and descriptions of people.

The petition and accompanying letter were then ordered to be printed.

COUNTING VOTES FOR PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, through Mr. FRANKLIN, their Clerk, informing the Senate that the House were ready to proceed to count the votes for President and Vice President of the United States.

The Senate accordingly adjourned to the hall of the House.

The Senate having returned to their chamber, and the President resumed the chair—

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, a resolution was adopted for the appointment of a joint committee, to wait on MARTIN VAN BUREN, and inform him of his election. And Mr. GRUNDY was appointed by the Chair to act on the part of the Senate.

Mr. GRUNDY, (then, from the joint committee on the election, reported a preamble and resolution, stating that no election of Vice President of the United States had been made by the college of electors; that Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky, and Francis Granger, of New York, were the highest on the list of persons voted for; and resolving that the Senate do now proceed to elect one of these gentlemen Vice President of the United States; and that Senators give their votes, viva voce, in their places, on the call of the Secretary.

The resolution was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to vote accordingly, the result of which was as follows:

FOR RICHARD M. JOHNSON.

Mr. Benton, of Missouri.	Mr. Fulton, of Arkansas.
Black, of Mississippi.	Grundy, of Tennessee.
Brown, of N. Carolina.	Hendricks, of Indiana.
Buchanan, of Penn.	Hubbard, of N. Hamp.

The President of the Senate (Mr. KING, of Alabama) then rose and proclaimed the result of the election, as follows:

The whole number of Senators of the U. States is	52

Quorum required by the constitution	35
Whole number of Senators present	49
For Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky,	33

From which it appears that RICHARD M. JOHNSON, having the votes of a majority of the whole number of Senators, as required by the constitution of the United States, is duly elected; and I therefore declare that RICHARD M. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, has been chosen by the Senate, in pursuance of the provisions contained in the constitution, Vice President of the United States for four years, commencing with the 4th day of March, 1837.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, a resolution was adopted for the appointment of a joint committee to inform RICHARD M. JOHNSON of his election; and the Chair was authorized to appoint the member thereof on the part of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER,
The Senate then adjourned.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SWIFT presented the petition of inhabitants of the town of Georgia, in the State of Vermont, praying the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. S. moved to refer that part of the petition which relates to the slave trade to the Committee for the District of Columbia, remarking that he believed the question on this subject had not been distinctly tried.

Mr. BROWN moved to lay this motion on the table; which was accordingly ordered, by yeas and nays, on the call of Mr. SWIFT, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Lyon, Moore, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Hendricks, Knight, McKean, Niles, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Wall, Webster—11.

CESSION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. CALHOUN introduced as a substantive proposition, and in form of a bill, the amendment he had the day before moved to the land bill; which proposes a cession of the public lands, on certain conditions therein specified, to the States, respectively, in which they lie. It was read once, and, by unanimous consent, received its second reading.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he wished it to be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, or to a select committee, as the Senate might choose.

Mr. ROBINSON moved to refer the bill to a select committee. The Committee on Public Lands were already burdened with business, and he was desirous that the Senator from South Carolina should have an opportunity of presenting his whole views on the subject in the form of a report.

Mr. WALKER supported the motion. He thought that, on a minute examination, the bill would not be found so objectionable to the old States as had, on its first presentation, been supposed. He believed it to be demonstrable that the new States would obtain but little more under this bill than under a distribution bill formerly proposed. He disclaimed any desire of perpetrating injustice on the older States; and should his constituents ever desire him (which he knew they did not) to advocate a measure of spoliation in their behalf on the common property of the Union, he would resign his seat.

Mr. NILES believed that no good could result from a special report in this case, however able it might be, and he therefore was opposed to a select committee. He believed that the further agitation of this subject at this time was calculated to do no good, and that the Senate had had enough of it, at least for the present. The question then before them was one of those unfortunate questions which had disturbed and divided the country; it was a sectional question, and they had had questions enough of this nature for some time past before them. They had been debating land bills, distribution bills, &c., to the exclusion of other important matters, and it was time to let the public mind settle down, before they revived them again. The time would come, and it would come soon enough, when it might be proper to take up this or a similar measure, and he would then be prepared to meet it with a liberal spirit, and would be willing to go much further, perhaps, than the bill contemplated; but in every aspect in which he could view the subject, he was convinced that it would be better to let it sleep for the present. This project struck him as being complicated and dangerous. It contemplated contracts and covenants with the new States, constituting them agents and brokers for this Government, and in the end making them debtors to an amount at present unknown. The land bill, which must come up on its third reading to-day, was an experiment yet to be tried. He admitted that he voted for it with much hesitation, and no small degree of fear and trembling; but he did so because he believed it would tend to lessen a great evil—an accumulation of too much revenue. Having made up his mind to give the bill he had just mentioned a trial, he was not disposed to add to it another experiment; and he was still less disposed to agitate and disturb the public mind by entertaining a question the discussion of which could do no good, and which it was not probable would lead to any practical result. If this matter was referred at all, it ought to be to the Committee on Public Lands, the standing committee specially constituted for such objects, and the members of which, having had the subject before them the whole winter, were better acquainted with it than were any other gentlemen of that body.

Mr. WEBSTER said that this bill looked to a matter of vast magnitude; and he hoped the honorable Senator from South Carolina would not consider it discourteous if he should move to reconsider the consent by which it had been read a second time, in order that the second reading of the bill might take place to-morrow, when they might have a vote upon it by yeas and nays; but he was not willing, for one, that the bill should make any progress in the Senate, which might create, out of doors, the expectation that such a measure could obtain the least favor in that body. He was himself entirely opposed to the proposition. If the Senate would consent to reconsider, he should, on to-morrow, ask the yeas and nays on its second reading, and no more.

Mr. CALHOUN hoped the vote would not be reconsidered. The subject was obviously of great moment; and, at a period very shortly to come, it must press itself home on the consideration of every Senator. It was in vain to expect, on a bill of this magnitude, a naked vote by yeas and nays. He should himself desire to be fully heard in its behalf, as he doubted not other gentlemen would, from both the new and the old States. It was a matter of perfect indifference to him in what form his views should be presented, whether by a speech on the floor, or through the report of the committee. A reference and report was the usual course, and he hoped that a bill of this character would not be treated with less courtesy than others.

Mr. WALKER demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. BROWN advocated the motion to reconsider, and deprecated the idea that the opinion should go forth that this Government, at one fell swoop, would seize upon the whole public domain, and transfer it to the new States.

Mr. CLAY said he was desirous of saying a few words on this bill, although his feelings would rather admonish him to be silent. Four or five years ago, contrary to his most earnest desire, this subject of the public lands had been forced upon him. With great labor, he had devised a scheme, fraught, as he conceived, with equity to all the States, according to which the object originally designed by the respective States which had ceded this domain for the common benefit of the Union would be accomplished, the proceeds of the whole divided, and an additional allowance made to the new States, such as should be called for by their increasing population. That scheme, although proceeding from a source which had now no influence in the Senate, and none in the country, had conciliated the favor of both Houses of Congress. It had been rejected by the President. Yet a large portion of the country, and, as he believed, a decided majority of the people of the United States, were, notwithstanding, in its favor. Mr. C. said that he had ever thought this public domain one of the most sacred of all the sacred trusts confided to the General Government, and that they were bound to take the utmost care of it, and to administer it fairly for the benefit of all the States of the present generation and of posterity. This he had labored to do, but had labored in vain; and now a project was brought forward, which aimed to wrest these lands from the common benefit of the Union, and appropriate them to the use either of a small portion of the States or of speculators. Mr. C. was equally opposed to the land bill now before the Senate, and to the project just introduced by the Senator from South Carolina. Indeed, he could see but little difference between them; for though the land bill before the Senate proposed, as its avowed objects, to restrict the sales of the public lands, to limit the amount of the revenue, and to repress speculation, it embodied principles which, in spite of all effort to the contrary, would continue to be carried out, re-enacted, and enlarged, until the whole of the public domain be swept away. In view, as he supposed, of this result, the Senator from South Carolina proposed at once to divest the country of the whole domain. To such a measure Mr. C. could not consent. He must do his duty faithfully and honestly, though it might be unsuccessfully. He was firmly opposed to the project already before the Senate, and to the kindred project of the Senator from South Carolina; and did he not fear it would be in vain, he would address himself to his brother Senators on all sides of the House, and would implore them, by every consideration of love to their country, and regard to their own reputation, not to allow a matter of this weight and moment to be made an object of party politics. He would conjure them to abstain from appeals, by the new States, to this or to that party. He would not say that honorable Senators were actuated by any such considerations, because it would be unparliamentary, and might not be true in fact; but he would ask them if the impression had not been created that the party now dominant in the country intended to appeal to the new States, and, by conciliating their favor, to perpetuate itself in power? He would ask the Senator from South Carolina whether, after such an impression had gone abroad, any gentlemen were there found offering to these States still better boons, those who should do so would not expose themselves to the suspicion that they were engaged in a similar design? To the Senators from the new States he would say, was it an enviable situation for them to occupy, to have appeals of this kind not only made, but openly avowed, and to witness proposals on which they were called to act, involving vast pecuniary advantages to the States they represented? Was it not inevitable, from the nature of the object in question, that, if one party made it an instrument to retain political power, another party would be induced to do the same thing? And the result must be an appeal, by both parties, to the new States, by the sacrifice of that great interest which ought sacredly to be preserved for the benefit of the whole.

Mr. C. said, in conclusion, that he hoped the members of the Senate would appreciate those motives which laid it as a duty upon him, out of a regard to the value of our public domain, and the purposes for which it had been given, to say thus much on the present occasion. He must repeat, in conclusion, that he should oppose himself firmly to both projects. He considered them equally liable to exception, and could, as he had before observed, perceive but little difference between them.

Mr. CALHOUN observed, in reply, that he had come there with a fixed resolution to resist all attempts at innovation upon our system in relation to the public lands; and, he might add, with no small hope that he should be successful.

Mr. C. said he took it as rather unkind, though he was sure it had not been so intended, that the Senator from Kentucky should say that there was any analogy between this bill and that from the Committee on the Public Lands, which Mr. C. had strenuously opposed. This measure, reluctantly forced upon him by the necessity of the case, had been introduced with a desire to terminate great political evils. He did assure that honorable Senator, whatever might be the obligation of duty which he felt in opposing this measure, a no less imperative obligation urged Mr. C. to bring it forward. There is, said Mr. C., too much power here; the tendency of this Government to centralism is overpowering; and among the many powerful instruments which can be and are brought to bear on the securing and extending of executive power, this control of the public lands is one of the greatest and most effectual. It now gives to any administration disposed so to use it control over nine States (eight, certainly) of this Union. Those States, so far as this regulation of the public lands is concerned, are the vassals of this Government. We are in the place of a great landlord, and they of tenants; we have the ownership and control over the soil they occupy. Can there be any doubt as to how such an ascendancy will be used in the present corrupt state of the country? Is there any doubt as to how it has been used, or that the influence derived from it is a growing influence? We must find some remedy for such a state of things, or sink under it. It is in vain to tell us that the Senators from the new States are as capable of giving an independent vote on measures connected with the public lands as those from the old States. It is impossible, in the nature of things. Their constituents have that feeling of ownership which is naturally inseparable from the occupation of the soil; and it must and will control the action of their representatives.

And now I put it to the bosom of every Senator, whether the mere moneyed income derived from the public domain is to be compared for one moment to the great advantage of putting these Senators on the same independent footing with ourselves? I look with sympathy upon their condition, and I feel very sure they will be liberated from it with joy. Such, I am very sure, would be my feelings in the like circumstances. So long as there was no attempt to use the control of the public lands for purposes of a political character, their condition was very different; but since this has been swept into the great vortex of political influence, their situation is wholly changed. I am for knocking off their chains. Sir, said Mr. C., I have, on a deliberate view of the whole case, entered upon this course, and I am resolved to go for this measure with all my power. I seek not its popularity or influence. I had rather that some other individual had moved in it, as more than one Senator here can bear me witness; but none would move, and I have therefore determined to proceed. I believe the time has arrived, and I am resolved to go on in the face of all the imputations to which my motives may be liable. I have often done my duty under very difficult circumstances, as all who hear me well know. As to popularity, I despise it. I would not turn on my heel to obtain it. It is a fleeting shadow, unworthy of the pursuit of an upright man. No, sir, I move here on a conscientious conviction of high and imperious duty; and I shall therefore go forward until I have effected my object, if it can be effected. I believe it will prove, in its practical results, a great blessing to the country. I am convinced no stronger measure can be devised for withdrawing the public lands from the great game of political scrambling and gambling for the presidency.

As to the details of the bill: I am under the impression that the sum demanded from the new States for the cession of these lands should be moderate, especially considering that they will be charged with the whole trouble and expense of their administration; and that, from the nature of the human mind, they will necessarily have the feeling that they possess a better right to these lands than others, from the fact of their occupancy. The next reason is, that we may prevent any disturbance from a feeling of discontent, but that the arrangement we make may be viewed as a liberal one, even by the new States themselves. So desirous am I to effect this object, that I will consent to modify this feature of the bill, by inserting almost any rate per cent. which the new States shall, on the whole, deem most prudent and advisable. Another reason why I have set the bonus at a low rate is a desire that the plan should operate as a benefit to the new States. I wish to counteract the tendency to running down of the price of land, and to secure its sale at prices calculated for the benefit of all parties. To secure this, I have inserted a provision, that if there shall be any departure from this condition of the cession, the grant itself shall be void, so as to make it a judicial question.

This measure is not, as has been said, a surrendering of the public domain to a few States of the Union. The lands are not surrendered; they are ceded, on terms by which this Government will make the most of them, even on a mere calculation of money. But I hope all such considerations will be held as entirely secondary and subordinate to greater and higher interests. All, I am confident, feel that there must be some remedy devised for the existing evils connected with this subject. There is too much action here; how it enures, and to whose advantage, we have fully seen. It is the great evil of patronage, which, if not limited and curtailed, will render perfectly futile all efforts to preserve the liberties of the country. My ideas on this subject are well known. It is the law of our political situation that, as our territory spreads, and our population is augmented, the action at the centre of the system must be diminished more and more. It should be confined merely to the sustaining of a harmonious intercourse of the several portions of the confederacy; a harmony of parts throughout the great and wide-spread system. I solemnly believe that a knowledge of this great fundamental law, and a steadfast adherence to it, are the only means by which our freedom can be preserved. We must watch the stealthy advance of power, and resist it, step by step. We must not suffer every power of this Government to be perverted into an engine for President making. Let us apply, at once, the axe to the root.

These are my motives in bringing forward this important measure, and not a grovelling desire of popularity, or any reserved hope of personal benefit to be enjoyed hereafter; I hold all such things light as air. I seek to do my duty, and to preserve, so far as I can, the liberties of my country.

Mr. WEBSTER said it was because he had thought it more respectful to the Senator from South Carolina to move a reconsideration, than to make a motion to lay the bill on the table, that he had moved the former. But if that gentleman could not consent to reconsider, he must, however reluctantly, be compelled to move that the bill be laid upon the table.

After some conversation,

Mr. ROBINSON withdrew his motion for a select committee, and

Mr. WEBSTER renewed the motion to reconsider; (which motion brings up the whole subject for discussion.)

He did this, he said, with a view to take the sense of the Senate, desiring that the bill might come up to-morrow. But if the Senator from South Carolina was disposed to enter into the discussion on the present motion, it could proceed in that way.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed his regret that the bill should be opposed at this early stage, and in so unusual a manner. As long as I have been a member of this and the other House, (said Mr. C.,) I cannot recollect more than three or four instances, before the present, in which a bill has been opposed at its second reading, and then under very peculiar circumstances. And why, may I ask, is the usual course departed from on the present occasion? Why not let this bill receive its second reading and be referred, as other bills are, to a committee, to be considered and reported on? The reply is, to prevent agitation; that is, as I understand it, to prevent the feelings of the public from being excited and its attention directed to this highly important subject. If that be the intention, I tell gentlemen they will fail in their object. The subject is already before the public; and, if my life be spared, I shall keep it there—shall agitate it till the public attention shall be roused to a full and thorough investigation of a measure that I firmly believe is not less essential to the interest of the whole Union than it is to that of the new States. I tell them more: that the very unusual and extraordinary course they have adopted, in opposition to this bill, will but more deeply agitate the public mind, and the more intensely attract its attention to the subject. It will naturally excite the inquiry, why not let this bill take the ordinary course? Why not let it go to a committee, to investigate its provisions, and present all the arguments for and against it, fully and fairly, so that its merits and demerits, such as they are, may be clearly understood? Opposition to so reasonable a course will make the impression that the object is to suppress investigation, whatever may be the motive of gentlemen, and will naturally excite suspicion and more diligent inquiry.

In making these remarks, I am not ignorant that the merits of the bill are fully open to discussion on the pending question; but it is impossible that a hasty discussion, at this last stage of the session, and when the time of the Senate is so fully engrossed with other subjects, can be so satisfactory as would be a report, in which the views of the majority and minority of the committee, after a full consultation, might be calmly and deliberately spread at large before the public. And why not adopt so natural a course? Besides being more favorable to investigation, it would consume less time; a point of no small importance at the present stage of the session. If referred, the committee would doubtless be so constituted as to comprehend both friends and opponents of the measure. Among the latter, if my wishes should be consulted, I would be glad to see the name of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WENSTEN,] who is so capable of doing full justice to whatever side he undertakes to defend. It is thus that the whole merits of the measure would be fully presented; and if it be so liable to objections as is supposed, the result might be to satisfy the new States themselves that it ought not to be adopted. But if, on the other hand, the argument should prove to be decidedly in its favor, as I firmly and conscientiously believe, the very agitation which gentlemen seem so much to dread would be promptly terminated by the adoption of the measure. Thus regarding the subject, I cannot but regret that this bill has not been permitted to take the usual course, and that I am compelled, in this hasty manner, without premeditation, to reply to the arguments of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WENSTEN,] which, after mature deliberation, he has urged with all his force against the measure. I shall begin with my reply to his constitutional objections. He holds that the measure is unconstitutional, because we have no authority to give away the public lands.

I do not feel myself obliged to meet this objection. It is not true in fact. The bill makes no gift. It cedes the public lands to the States within which they are respectively situated, subject to various conditions, and, among others, that they shall pay over one third of the gross amount of the sales to the United States; that they shall surrender all their claims against the Government under the two and three per cent. funds, and take the whole trouble and expense of the management of the land, including the extinguishment of the Indian titles. But I waive this decisive answer. I meet the Senator on his own ground, and with a conclusive argument, as far at least as he is concerned. He admits that it would not be a violation of the constitution for Congress to make a donation of land to an individual; and what, I ask, is there to prevent it from making a donation to two; to an hundred; or to a thousand? And if to them individually, why not to them in the aggregate, as a community or a State? He, indeed, admits that Congress may make a donation of public lands to a State, for useful purposes. If to one State, why not to several States—to the new States, if the measure should be thought to be wise and proper? If there be a distinction, I acknowledge my intellect is too obtuse to perceive it; but as the bill makes no gift, I feel under no necessity of pressing the argument further.

The Senator's next position is, that we have no right to delegate the trust of administering the public domain, confided to us by the constitution, to the States. Here, again, I may object, that the argument has no foundation in truth. The bill delegates no trust. It makes a cession—a sale of the public lands to the new States; and what the Senator calls trusts are but conditions annexed to the sales—conditions alike beneficial to them and to the old States. The simple question, then, is, can Congress sell public lands to a State? Suppose the State of Ohio were to offer to pay $1 25 an acre for the remnant of the public lands within her limits, could not Congress sell it to her? And if it may sell for $1 25, may it not for a dollar, for 75 cents, or a less sum, if it should be deemed the true value? Again: if Congress can make an absolute sale, may it not make a conditional one? And if so, why may it not make the disposition proposed in this bill? That is the question, and I would be glad to have it answered. If I ever had any constitutional scruples on the subject, the arguments of the Senator would have satisfied me that they were without the shadow of foundation. His reasoning faculties are well known; and if these are the strongest constitutional objections that he can advance, we may be assured that the bill is perfectly free from all objections of that description.

Having now despatched the objections against the constitutionality of this bill, I shall next consider the arguments which the Senator urged against its expediency. He says that I placed the necessity of this bill on the fact of the passage of the land bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands; and, as it was uncertain whether it would become a law, the ground on which the necessity of this bill was based may yet fail. The Senate will remember the remarks I made on asking leave to introduce this bill, and that I was for placing it on the simple fact of the passage of that bill. I took broader ground, and rested my motion on the character of the bill and the circumstances which attended its passage through this body. From these, I concluded that the period we all acknowledge must sometime come had actually arrived, when the public lands within the new States should on proper conditions be ceded to them. I do not deem it necessary now to go into a discussion of the character of the bill, nor the history of its passage through the Senate. We all have, no doubt, formed our opinion in relation to both. From all I saw and heard, I am satisfied that the bill had not the hearty assent of its supporters, whether from the new or old States; and I doubt very much whether there was an individual who voted for it, that gave it his hearty approbation. Many who had uniformly opposed all measures of the kind, and who represented portions of the Union which had ever been vigilant on all questions connected with the public lands, were found in the ranks of those who supported the bill. The explanation is easy. It assumed the character of a party measure, to be carried on party grounds, without reference to the true interests of either the new or old States; and, if we are to credit declarations made elsewhere, to fulfil obligations contracted anterior to the late presidential election. From all this, I inferred we had reached the period when it was no longer possible to prevent the public domains from becoming the subject of party contention, and being used by party as an engine to control the politics of the country. It was this conviction, and not the mere passage of the bill, as the Senator supposes, that induced me to introduce this bill.

I saw, clearly, it was time to cut off this vast source of patronage and power, and to place the Senators and Representatives from the new States on an equality with those from the old, by withdrawing our local control, and breaking the vassalage under which they are now placed. The Senator from Massachusetts objects to the term, and denies that Congress exercises any local control over those States. I used it to express the strong degree of dependence of the new States on this Government, whose power and patronage are ramified over their whole surface, and whose domains constitute so large a portion of their territory. I certainly did not anticipate that the Senator from Massachusetts, or any other, would deny the existence of this dependence, or the local control of the Government within their limits. Can any thing be more local than the lands of a State? and can any State be said to be free from dependence on a Government, when that Government has the administration of a large portion of its domain? Is it no hardship that the citizens of the new States should be compelled to travel nine or ten hundred miles to this place, and to wait our tardy justice on all claims connected with the public lands; a subject, in its own nature, the most local of all, and which ought, above all others, to be under the charge of the local authority of the States? I ask him if he would be willing to see Massachusetts placed in the same relation to this Government? and, if it were, whether it would not destroy its independence? I ask him if it must not give a great and controlling influence wherever it exists? Through its lands, authority and action of the Government pervades the whole territory of the new States, and their citizens become claimants at your doors, session after session, either for favor or justice. I do not say that all this is incompatible with the sovereignty of those States, but I do aver that it is in derogation of their sovereignty.

The Senator next objects to this measure, that it would not free Congress from its present difficulties, in reference to the public domain. He says that we should soon have the new States here, besieging us with memorials to alter the conditions of cession, with all the dependence and difficulties of which we now complain. My impression is very different. Make the terms liberal, and they will be satisfied. They will relieve Congress from the whole burden of business, as far as the lands are concerned, which now occupies so much of its time; and the public councils will no longer be under the dangerous influence inseparable from their management. If hereafter a new state of things should arise, and the arrangement proposed in the bill should require reversion, it will be for those who come after us to apply a remedy; and I have no fear but they will do their duty.

The Senator next insists that the acquisition of these lands will prove no benefit to the new States, and predicts that it would involve them in incessant agitation and trouble. Such might be the case, if the cession was absolute; but the bill contains provisions which will prove an effectual check against these difficulties. To place its provisions beyond alteration or attack, it is expressly provided that, if they should be violated by the States, the cession itself should be void, and all grants made subsequent thereto shall be null and of no effect. They are thus placed under the safeguard of the Judiciary, and the courts of the Union will determine on questions growing out of their infraction. For this purpose, the cession has assumed the form of a compact, and I feel confident that, under its provisions, the new States would administer the land without agitation or any serious trouble or difficulty. If this can be effected, I appeal to the Senators, whether the land within their limits ought not to be under their local administration? I, for one, feel that we of the old States have not, and cannot have, that full and accurate local knowledge necessary for their proper management. Of all the branches of our business, it is that which I least understand. From this defect of information, the Land Committee has it almost exclusively under its sole control, whenever it is so constituted as to attract in any degree the confidence of the House. This has been the case from the first. I well remember, that when I first took my seat in the other House, Jeremiah Morrow, a member from Ohio, a man of great integrity and good sense, was the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, and was, in fact, the sole legislator on all subjects connected with them; and in this body we have almost invariably yielded our judgment to the committee, from a conscious want of information. The difficulty is growing from year to year, with the vast increase of the new States and Territories, and the growing complication of our land code; and the consequent increase of business is such that we already have scarce time to despatch it with due attention. In a short time the increase will be doubled; and what shall we then do? By passing this bill, we will be wholly relieved from this burden, and the questions we are now compelled to determine without adequate knowledge will then be settled by those whose local knowledge will make them familiar and well acquainted with the subject.

But we are told by the Senator that the public lands have been well administered by the General Government, and that he cannot surrender his belief but that they will continue so to be. That they were well administered in the early stages of the Government, while they were not an object of much pecuniary or political interest, I am ready to admit; but I hold it not less certain, that as the number and population of the new States increase, and, with them, the value of the public lands and the political importance of those States, we must become year by year less and less competent to their management, till finally we shall become wholly so. I believe that we are not now far from that period. Does not the Senator see the great and growing influence of the new States, and that it is in the power of any unprincipled and ambitious man from one of them to wield that influence at his pleasure? Should he propose any measure in relation to the public lands, be it ever so extravagant and dangerous, the members from the new States dare not vote against it, however adverse to the measure. It is useless to disguise the fact that our possession of so much land in the new States creates and cherishes an antagonist feeling on their part towards the Government, as to every measure that relates to them. They naturally consider your policy as opposed to their interest, and as retarding their growth and prosperity, as great as they are. We must take human nature as it is, and accommodate our measures to it, instead of making the vain attempt to bend it to our measures. We must calculate that the means of control, which this state of things puts into the hands of the ambitious and designing, will not be neglected; and, instead of idly complaining, let us remove the cause by wise and timely legislation. The difficulties and dangers are daily on the increase. Four years more will probably add three more new States, and six additional Senators, with a great increase of members in the other House; and, what is more important, a corresponding increase of votes and influence in the electoral college. Can you doubt the consequences? The public lands, with their immense patronage, will be brought to bear more and more on the action of Congress; will control the presidential elections; and the result will be, that he who uses this vast fund of power with the least scruple will carry away the prize.

The Senator himself sees and acknowledges the approach of this dangerous period, and agrees that, when it does come, we must surrender the public lands within the new States; but is for holding on till it shall have actually arrived. My opinion is the reverse. I regard it as one of the wisest maxims in human affairs, that when we see an inevitable evil, like this, not to be resisted, approaching, to make concessions in time, while we can do it with dignity, and not to wait until necessity compels us to act, and when concession, instead of gratitude, will excite contempt. The maxim is not new. I have derived it from the greatest of modern statesmen, Edmund Burke. He urged its adaption on the British Government, in the early stages of our Revolution; and if the obstinate and infatuated statesman, Lord North, then at the head of affairs, had listened to his warning voice, it may be doubted whether our Revolution would have taken place; but events were ordered otherwise. The voice of wisdom was unheeded, and the Revolution followed, with all its consequences, which have so greatly changed the condition of the world.

I have thus hastily, and without the advantage of previous reflection, replied to the arguments of the Senator from Massachusetts. I would have been much gratified if a course better suited to the magnitude of the subject and more favorable for full and deliberate discussion, had been adopted; but, as it is, I have passed over no argument, as far as I can remember, which he advanced, and, I trust, have replied to none which I have not successfully refuted.

I shall now conclude with a few remarks in reply to the Senator from New Jersey, [MR. SOUTHARD.] He tells us that he will not bid for the new States. (I regret, said Mr. C., that I do not see him in his place.) Does he mean to intimate that, in introducing this bill, I am bidding for them? If he does, I throw back the injurious imputation. I indignantly repel the charge. No, sir, I am not a bidder. What I have done has been from an honest conviction of duty, and not less for the benefit of the old than the new States. The measure I conscientiously believe would be alike serviceable to both.

[MR. SOUTHARD, who had been absent, here returned to the chamber. Mr. C., seeing him, repeated his remarks; on which, Mr. S. disclaimed having said any thing like what Mr. C. understood him to have said. On which, Mr. C. resumed.]

I am happy to hear it. I felt confident that the Senator could not intend to cast so injurious an imputation on me, and I rejoice to hear from his own lips the frank and honorable disclosure he has made.

But I not only believe the measure to be beneficial and expedient, but I firmly believe it to be indispensable, in order to restore the Government to a sound and healthy condition.

The tendency of our system to centralism, with its ruinous consequences, can be no longer denied. To counteract this, its patronage must be curtailed. There are three great sources to which its immense patronage may be mainly traced, and by which the Government is enabled to exert such an immense control over public opinion—the public lands, the post office, and the currency. The first may be entirely removed. This bill will cut it up root and branch. By a single stroke we would not only retrench this growing and almost boundless source of patronage, but also free ourselves from the pressure of an immense mass of business, which encumbers our legislation, and divides and distracts our attention; and this would be done without impairing, in the long run, our pecuniary resources. In addition, the measure would place the Senators from the new States on the same equal and independent footing in this chamber with ourselves. In such results who would not rejoice? The Senators from the new States would especially have cause to rejoice in the change. Relieve them from the dependent condition of their States, and they would be found in the front ranks, sustaining the laws and the constitution against the encroachments of power.

But the Senator from New Jersey tells us that we have no power to pass this bill, as it would be in violation of the ordinance which makes the public land a common fund for the benefit of all the States; and that we, as trustees, are bound to administer it strictly in reference to the object of the trust. In reply, I might ask the Senator how he can reconcile his construction of the ordinance with the constant practice of the Government, in which, if I mistake not, it has been sustained by his vote? How many grants have been made out of the public domain to colleges, academies, asylums for the deaf and dumb, and other institutions of like character? If such concessions be consistent with the provisions of the ordinance, what prevents this bill from being so also? But I rest not my reply on that ground. I meet the Senator according to his interpretation of the ordinance. I assert boldly that the disposition this bill proposes to make of the portion of the public domain within the new States is the very best, under existing circumstances, that can be made, regarding it in reference to the common interest of all the States. Let it be borne in mind, that all sides agree the new States will soon be able to command their terms, when others less favorable to the common interest may be imposed. If we of the old States make it a point to hold on to the last, they will, by a necessary reaction, make it a point to extort all they can when they get the power. But if we yield in time, a durable arrangement may be made, mutually beneficial and satisfactory to both parties.

The Senator further objects, that if this bill should pass, its provisions would be extended, from necessity, to all States which may hereafter be admitted into the Union. I must say, I see no such necessity; but my present impression is, that such would be the course that wisdom would dictate. According to my mode of thinking, all the revenue we may derive from the sales of lands in a State, after its admission, is not to be compared in importance to its independence as a sovereign member of the Union; for there is no danger of the falling of our institutions for the want of pecuniary means, while there is no small danger of their overthrow from the growing and absorbing attraction of this central power.

Mr. WEBSTER objected to the delay, and to having any impression made abroad that a majority of the Senate could be brought to look favorably on such a scheme.

Mr. WALKER was opposed to having the subject referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, because a majority of that committee consisted of members from the new States. And, however upright and honorable might be their intentions, they would be liable to have their judgments warped by their position and prejudices. Mr. W. would be unwilling to trust his own judgment on such a question. He should greatly prefer that the bill be sent to a select committee, so organized that a majority of its members should consist of gentlemen from the older and larger States of the Union; so that, if possible, a plan containing the general principles of this bill might be devised, in which all parties would agree. It was no new proposition. It had been made long ago. Senators from the older States had sustained it by their speeches, and it had been repeatedly recommended by the President. It had been advocated by the Vice President also, by Mr. Tazewell, and by the venerable Macon, who advocated a measure even more liberal than that now proposed. Mr. W. hoped that the Senate would neither be excited nor alarmed by appeals from any quarter. He had no idea of any definitive action on the subject during the present session, but he wished that a full report might be obtained, and the whole subject maturely considered.

Mr. BENTON was opposed to the motion for reconsideration, and in favor of a select committee. He approved of both the leading principles of the bill—the cession to the new States and the graduation of price—but not of all its details. He was unwilling to bind his constituents for 30 years, as the Western strength would be very soon vastly augmented. He hoped that the Senators from the old States would take up the subject, and present a report upon it. This would be a preparatory step, and make some progress towards the object in view. No one could throw his eyes over the Union, without perceiving that in a very short time some adjustment of this matter must take place. Some of the Senators from the new States had repeatedly jumped up and declared that if the graduation principle was lost at this time, it was gone forever. Mr. B. was not to be so discouraged. The more votes they lost the more confident he felt of ultimate success; for where the fundamental principles of a measure were good and sound, he had often observed that the darkest period of its hopes was just before day. The more gloomy its prospects appeared for a time, the more sure were they soon to break out with the brilliancy of the rising sun. In this great measure of extinguishing the federal title to the land in the new States, (for he considered it a parallel measure to the extinction of the Indian title,) he had never doubted of eventual success. He could no more doubt this, than any future event which depended on natural causes. This did depend on natural causes—on causes fixed as nature herself—viz: on the increase of population in the West. Those States must in a very short time obtain a preponderance in the national council. If the West was not strong enough numerically to determine this question of the public lands, she would accomplish it by the perfect union of her representatives, and the consequent weight of their influence. He had always told his constituents that the time would come when the Congress of the United States would cease to be the local Legislature of the new States, to whom they must look, and on whose pleasure they must depend, even for the correction of an erroneous entry in the public lands—a sort of business for which Congress was eminently unfitted. Mr. B. was not going to enter into the question at this time; he would only repeat, that he looked forward with confidence to the extinction of the federal title to the soil of the Western States. Six years ago, the attention of the Senate had been strongly directed to that subject; and there was at that time a pretty general expression of the conviction that the period would soon arrive when this thing must be decided; and that whoever should be able to effect an arrangement of it on just and equitable terms would be entitled to be considered as a benefactor to his country. Things were then fast verging to the very point which they now seemed to approach. But a proposition to divide the proceeds of the public lands among the States had created an interest antagonistical ("yes, antagonistical") to that of the new States. From that day to this, the doctrine that Congress is to sell the public lands for as much money as they can get, and divide the proceeds among the States, had operated as an indudement, especially to the populous States, to oppose the original plan, and had for a time checked the current of public opinion. But that current was now recovering its force. The opposition which checked the principle of graduation and pre-emption and ultimate cession was fast running out, and things were reverting to their old channel. He had always known that the diversion was but temporary, and had looked with anxiety to the time when the new Senators from Arkansas and Michigan would take their seats in that chamber. If, however, they could not yet succeed, all they had to do was to sustain their position, and not think of surrendering because they had been once whipped. We will wait till Wisconsin comes into the Union; and, if Oceola should ever be conquered, till Florida too should come in. Let them only have patience, and the question would be in the hands of the new States. He said this not in a boastful spirit. He did not say that they would take the public domain on their own terms. He should be as far from wishing to do injustice, when the new States came to have the upper hand, as any gentleman on the other side could be, now that the old States had the upper hand. He hoped that the whole subject would be entered upon, with the desire of bringing it to a conclusion that should be just and equitable as well to the old States as to the new. On all efforts to this good end he would pray Heaven to shed its auspicious benedictions.

Mr. HUBBARD said that it was for the reason that there was so much public and private business now on the calendar, of high importance to the nation, and of deep interest to individuals, requiring the action of the Senate, that he was opposed, unqualifiedly opposed, to the consideration of the bill presented this morning by the Senator from South Carolina. He might ask, why was this subject brought to the notice of the Senate at this period of its session? Why has not the Senator from Carolina seen fit to introduce this measure before? Why did he not bring it forward at an early day, as a substitute for the bill which has received so much of the attention of the Senate, and which has so recently been ordered to a third reading? Certainly there can be no occasion for passing that bill, if this bill, now offered to the Senate, is to find favor. If the public domain is to be ceded at once to the respective States in which it is located, there can be no propriety or fitness in any further action upon the bill which has engrossed so much of the consideration of the Senate since the commencement of the session. It is for the reason that the Senate has well matured that measure—has made it acceptable to the majority of its members—that, in all probability, no further discussion will be had upon it—that no further opposition will be made to it—that it must soon receive the favorable and the final action of this body—that he was unwilling to have another, a different, and a distinct proposition, with reference to the public lands, presented to the Senate, when only the short period of three weeks remains before this Congress must close its labors. He could assure the friends of the land bill now ordered to a third reading, that the bill of the Senator from South Carolina must and will, in his judgment, embarrass if not prevent its final passage. He would then unhesitatingly advise the friends of that measure to permit this bill to remain without any further action. In his opinion, a proper regard to the present state of the public business requires that there should be no further agitation here in relation to the public lands. Every Senator conversant with the amount of business upon the docket, indispensably requiring the immediate consideration of Congress, cannot, he believed, feel ready and willing now to enter upon this bill. No Senator can for a moment doubt, that whenever this subject is presented, it must and it will be debated, at every point. The very character of the measure is calculated to agitate the country, and must elicit a protracted discussion here.

He was then utterly opposed at this time to the consideration of the bill offered by the Senator from South Carolina. As a friend to the bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands, he was opposed to it. And knowing, as he well did, the state of the calendar, he was opposed to any further notice of this bill; and, before he sat down, he intended to move to lay the motion made by the Senator from Massachusetts on the table; which, if adopted, would lay also upon the table the bill offered by the Senator from South Carolina; and there he was willing it should rest until the commencement of another session.

The Senator from Missouri had said that the time would come when the Government would cede the public lands to the respective States in which the lands are situated. That time may come; and, for one, he had full confidence in the justice of the country; and whenever public policy required the cession of the public lands to the new States, he had no doubt it would be done by the Government upon such just and equitable terms as would be acceptable both to the old and to the new States. But that time has not yet arrived. The public mind has not, as yet, been directed to this matter. There was no ground of public policy or of general expediency which at this particular time recommended the measure to the favorable consideration of the people. Enough has been done; the bill has been brought forward; it has been received and read, and will be printed. There let the matter rest. The public attention will necessarily be drawn to this subject, and all has been done that ought to be done. The action of Congress should follow the lead of public sentiment.

Public Lands.

Upon the all-important subject of the public domain—a subject in which the people of the whole country are interested—there should be no proceeding here tending to control the course of public opinion. Let the people come forward and express their wishes and their wants in relation to this matter; then, and not till then, ought Congress to act. He was, then, on every view of this subject, opposed to any further proceeding at this time upon the bill offered by the Senator from South Carolina. He was of opinion that evil, rather than good, to the cause of the new States, would be the effect of any premature action upon this subject on the part of Congress. He would, therefore, let it rest; and, in order to test the opinion of the Senate at once, he would now move to lay the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts on the table.

Mr. H. withdrew the motion, on request of

Mr. CALHOUN, who again pressed for a select committee. The time for action had arrived. The measure had already been presented to the public, and could not be unrepresented; and he wished the country to hear and consider the arguments both for and against it.

The question on reconsideration was now put, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hubbard, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Niles, Page, Parker, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, Wright—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Calhoun, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, McKean, Moore, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Robinson, Sevier, Tipton, Walker, White—22.

So the Senate resolved to reconsider the second reading of the bill, and it is therefore before the Senate on its first reading.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The question then recurring on the land bill,

Mr. CALHOUN said: I have received, within the last forty-eight hours, a communication from the Chief Magistrate, connected with the bill now before the Senate, of such a nature that duty to myself, as well as to this body, renders it necessary that I should lay it before the Senate.

[Here Mr. C. sent to the Secretary the letter, which was read, as follows:]

WASHINGTON, February 7, 1837.

SIR: In the Globe of the 6th instant I find the report of a speech made by you on the 4th, upon the land bill, which contains the following passages, viz:

"Was it not notorious that the President of the United States himself had been connected with the purchase of the public lands? Yes, the 'experiment' (Mr. Calhoun delighted in the word) was the cause of speculation in public lands; and if this bill should not be passed, speculations could not go on, and the price of the public lands must consequently be reduced. He contended that every man could not but see that it would be utter ruin to those who had borrowed money to speculate in lands, if the system was not to go on." In a former part of your speech, as reported, you say: "The speculation, which a particular state of things had given rise to, had been produced by those in power. They had profited by that state of things; and, should this bill be passed, it would only consummate their wishes," &c.

Knowing the liabilities of reporters to err, in taking down and writing out the speeches of members of Congress, I have made inquiry in relation to the accuracy of this report, and have been furnished with certificates of gentlemen who heard you, affirming that it is substantially correct.

You cannot but be aware, sir, that the imputations which your language conveys are calculated, if believed, to destroy my character as a man, and that the charge is one which, if true, ought to produce my impeachment and punishment as a public officer. If I caused the removal of the deposits for the base purpose of enriching myself or my friends by any of the results which might grow out of that measure, there is no term of reproach which I do not deserve, and no punishment known to the laws which ought not to be inflicted upon me. On the contrary, if the whole imputation, both as to motive and fact, be a fabrication and a calumny, the punishment which belongs to me, if guilty, is too mild for him who willfully makes it.

I am aware, sir, of the constitutional privilege under which this imputation is cast forth, and the immunity which it secures. That privilege it is in no degree my purpose to violate, however gross and wicked may have been the abuse of it. But I exercise only the common right of every citizen, when I inform you that the imputations you have cast upon me are false in every particular, not having for the last ten years purchased any public land, or had any interest in such purchase. The whole charge, unless explained, must be considered the offspring of a morbid imagination or of sleepless malice.

I ask you, sir, as an act due to justice, honor, and truth, to retract this charge on the floor of the Senate in as public a manner as it has been uttered; it being the most appropriate mode by which you can repair the injury which might otherwise flow from it.

But in the event that you fail to do so, I then demand that you place your charge before the House of Representatives, that they may institute the necessary proceeding to ascertain the truth or falsehood of your imputation, with a view to such further measures as justice may require.

If you will neither do justice yourself, nor place the matter in a position where justice may be done me by the representatives of the people, I shall be compelled to resort to the only remedy left me, and, before I leave the city, give publicity to this letter, by which you will stand stigmatized as one who, protected by his constitutional privilege, is ready to stab the reputation of others, without the magnanimity to do them justice, or the honor to place them in a situation to receive it from others.

Yours, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

The Hon. J. C. CALHOUN,
U. S. Senate.

P. S. I herewith enclose you the copies of two notes, verifying the correctness of the report of your speech in the Globe of the 6th instant.

A. J.

No. 1.

WASHINGTON CITY, February 6, 1837.

At the request of the President of the United States, I hereby certify that I was present in the gallery of the Senate of the United States on Saturday, the 4th instant, during a discussion upon the land bill, and heard some of the remarks of Mr. CALHOUN upon that subject, in which the President was charged with being a speculator in public lands.

On coming out of the Capitol, the subject was mentioned to me by a friend of the President; and my recollection of the words used accorded with what he understood had been said, and which is substantially the same as reported in the Globe of the 6th instant.

ARTHUR CAMPBELL.

WASHINGTON, February 7, 1837.

SIR: In answer to your inquiry of me, whether Mr. CALHOUN, in his remarks on the land bill, on Saturday last, used the words attributed to him by me in the report which appeared in "the Globe" of yesterday, viz: "Was it not notorious that the President of the United States himself had been connected with the purchase of public lands?" I would state that I have referred to my short-hand notes, and find that such was the language he used, according to the best of my knowledge and belief.

Yours, very respectfully,

W. E. DRAKE.

I certify that No. 1 and No. 2 are true copies of the originals.

Test:

A. JACKSON, JR.

I do not intend, (said Mr. C.,) in what I propose to say, to comment on the character or the language of this extraordinary letter. It has excited in my bosom the mingled feelings of pity for the weakness of its author, contempt for his menace, and humiliation that one occupying the office which he does should place himself in a situation so unworthy of his exalted station. Nor do I intend to invoke the interposition of the Senate to protect the privilege attached to a Senator from one of the sovereign States of this confederacy, which has been outraged in my person. I seek no aid to defend my own privileges; and, so far from being intimidated, I shall be emboldened to express myself with greater freedom, if possible, to denounce the corruption of the administration, or the violation of the laws and of the constitution, in consequence of this attempt to restrain the free exercise of the right of expressing my opinions upon all subjects concerning the public interests, secured to me by the constitution. I leave to the Senate to determine what measures the preservation of their own privileges demands.

Much less do I intend to comply with the request or demand made of me; demand has no place between equals; and I hold myself, within my constitutional privilege, at least equal to the Chief Magistrate himself. I, as a legislator, have a right to investigate and pronounce upon his conduct, and to condemn his acts freely, whenever I consider them to be in violation of the laws and of the constitution. I, as a Senator, may judge him; he can never judge me.

My object is to avail myself of the occasion to reiterate what I said, as broadly and fully as I uttered them on a former occasion, here in my place, where alone I am responsible, and where the friends of the President will have an opportunity to correct my statement if erroneous, or to refute my conclusions if not fairly drawn. I spoke without notes, and it may be that I may omit something which I said on the former occasion that may be deemed material, or express myself less full and strong than I then did. If so, I will thank any Senator to remind me, so that my statement now may be as strong and as full as then.

If my memory serves me, I opened my remarks, when I spoke formerly, by stating that so many and so subtle were the devices by which those who were in power could, in these times, fleece the people, without their knowing it, that it was almost enough to make a lover of his country despair of its liberty. I then stated that I knew of no measure which could better illustrate the truth of this remark than the one now before us. Its professed object is to restrict the sales of public land, in order, as is avowed, to prevent speculation; and, by consequence, the accumulation of a surplus revenue in the Treasury. The measure is understood to be an administration measure. I then stated that, so far from preventing speculation, it would, in fact, but consummate the greatest speculation which this country had ever witnessed—a speculation originating in a state of things of which those in power were the authors; by which they had profited; and which this measure, should it become a law, would but complete. I then asked what had caused such an extraordinary demand for public land, that the sales should have more than quintupled within the last three years? and said that, to answer this question, we must look to the state of the currency. That it was owing to the extraordinary increase of bank paper, which had filled to repletion all the channels of circulation. The Secretary had estimated this increase, within that period, at from six dollars and fifty cents per individual to ten dollars. I believe the increase to be much greater; the effects of which have been to double the price of every article which has not been kept down by some particular cause. In the mean time, the price of public land has remained unaltered, at one dollar and twenty-five cents the acre; and the natural consequence was, that this excessive currency overflowed upon the public land, and has caused those extraordinary speculations which it is the professed object of this bill to prevent.

I then asked, what had caused this inundation of paper? The answer was, the experiment, (I love to remind the gentleman of the word,) which had removed the only restrictions that existed against the issue of bank paper. The consequence was predicted at the time; it was foretold that banks would multiply almost without number, and pour forth their issues without restriction or limitation. These predictions were at the time unheeded; their truth now begins to be realized.

The experiment commenced by a transfer of the public funds from where they were placed by law, and where they were under its safeguard and protection, to banks which were under the sole and unlimited control of the Executive. The effect was a vast increase of executive patronage, and the opening a field of speculation, in describing which, in anticipation, I pronounced it to be so ample, that Rothschild himself might envy the opportunity which it afforded. Such it has proved to be.

The administration has profited by this vast patronage, and the prejudice which it has excited against the bank, as the means of sustaining themselves in power. It is unnecessary to repeat the remarks in illustration of this. The truth of the statement is known to all the Senators who have daily witnessed the party topics which have been drawn from this fruitful source. I then remarked that, if rumor were to be trusted, it was not only in a political point of view that those in power had profited by the vast means put in the hands of the Executive by the experiment; they had profited in a pecuniary as well as in a political point of view. It has been frequently stated, and not contradicted, that many in high places are among the speculators in public lands; and that even an individual connected with the President himself, one of his nephews, was an extensive adventurer in this field of speculation. I did not name him, but I now feel myself called upon to do so. I mean Mr. McLemore.

Having established these points, I next undertook to show that this bill would consummate those speculations, and establish the political ascendancy which the experiment had given to the administration. In proof of the former, I availed myself of the declaration of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, who had stated that the speculators had already purchased and held a vast amount of public land, not less, as I understood him, than twenty-five or thirty millions of acres; and that, if this bill did not pass, the scenes of the last two years would be repeated in this and the coming year. I then undertook to show, from the showing of the chairman himself, that these speculations would prove ruinous without the aid of this bill. He had stated that the annual demand for public land, resulting from our increased population, could not exceed five millions of acres.

Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

Now, assuming that the quantity on hand is thirty millions of acres, there would be six years' supply in the hands of speculators, even if the land offices of the United States be closed; and that if the bill did not pass, according to his showing, it would take double or treble the time to dispose of the lands which, in that case, will be in the hands of speculators. All must see the certain ruin, in that event, of those who have borrowed money to speculate in land; particularly if the sales of public land should be free and open to every one, as it now is, to purchase to the extent of his means. I next showed that the contest was between the Government, as a dealer in public land, and the speculators; that they held in market at least an equal quantity in value to that which the Government now has offered for sale, and that every restriction imposed upon the sales of Government land must, of necessity, increase the advantages of its rival dealers.

I then showed that very onerous and oppressive restrictions, of an odious character, upon the sales of the public lands, would be imposed if the bill should pass. No one thereafter could purchase land of the Government without a license—a license, in my opinion, as offensive and odious as would be a license on the press. To obtain this license, the oath of the applicant was required, and then it could only be obtained on payment of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, for which the citizen may now receive a grant in fee simple. After he had made his purchase, under the authority of his license, the purchaser has to comply with the condition of settlement and cultivation, and must, within the period of five years, prove to the satisfaction of the register and receiver, who are made high judicial officers, a compliance with these conditions, before he can receive his title; and if he failed to comply, by accident or otherwise, he forfeits both his money and the land. I stated that this was a virtual increase of the price of the public lands to the actual settler; so much so, that any sober-minded man would prefer to give the speculators two dollars per acre for land of the same quality, to giving the Government one dollar and twenty-five cents for a license with these oppressive conditions.

Having established this point, I then undertook to show that it would increase vastly the power of the Government in the new States, if they chose to exercise this patronage for political purposes. That they would so use it, we have ample proof in the past conduct of the administration, and in the principles which have been openly avowed by its friends. A former Senator from New York, high in the confidence of the party, and now Chief Magistrate of that State, has openly avowed, in his place on this floor, that to the victors belong the spoils; for which he was reprimanded at the time by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] in a manner worthy of his distinguished talents. Assuming, then, that the power would be exercised with a view to political influence, I showed that it would place a vast number of the citizens of the new States, probably not less than one hundred thousand, in a condition of complete dependence on the receivers, and of vassalage to the Government.

These are the sentiments which I delivered on a former occasion, and which I now reiterate to the full extent—omitting nothing that is material, as far as connected with the letter of the President; and for the delivery of which, my privileges as a Senator, and those of this body, have been so grossly outraged.

Mr. GRUNDY said that he had risen not to say any thing respecting the letter and certificates which had been read, nor of the feelings of the Senator from South Carolina towards the President, or of the President towards that gentleman. With their long continued and unhappy differences and misunderstandings he had nothing to do. He should rather say, with the poet,

He regretted greatly that any such misunderstanding should exist; and whatever the Senate might think proper to say or do in the case, if his judgment approved of it, he should cheerfully assent. Something certainly was due in justice to the Senator from South Carolina. Mr. G. did not so understand him as he had been represented. He had listened attentively, and had not heard any thing from that gentleman which induced him to believe that any intimation in his speech was directed against the President, personally or individually. The charge had been of a general character, and much in the language now stated. That which had chiefly arrested his attention in the recapitulation now made was the connexion between Mr. McLemore and the President of the United States. Mr. McLemore was one of Mr. G.'s nearest neighbors. He could not say that he was intimately acquainted with the nature of that gentleman's business, but he had a general impression as to what it was. And he might venture very safely to say that Mr. McLemore had not borrowed money to speculate upon since the removal of the depositories. Though certainly a man of great wealth, he had enough to do to pay his own debts; nor was it in his power to obtain as much accommodation from the banks as many others of less property than himself. Mr. G. did not believe that he had any interest in the proceedings referred to. He had been a locator of land for others, and Mr. G. had heard that he was in the habit of obtaining $200 for every tract of one mile square which he located. He did not, however, speak this from his own knowledge. From all he knew of Mr. McLemore's affairs, he did not believe that the operations of this Government were looked to by him for purposes of speculation. The remarks of the Senator from South Carolina, which he understood to relate to this gentleman, constituted the only part of his speech which at all affected the President. To be sure, it was impossible for Mr. G., at the time the Senator was speaking, not to think of certain individuals concerning whom he had heard reports in regard to speculation. There were individuals high in office who were said to be concerned, but Mr. G. had not understood the Senator from South Carolina as referring individually to the President.

Mr. G. said that Mr. McLemore was no relative of the President by consanguinity; he had married the daughter of John Donelson.

Mr. CALHOUN made some remarks. He was understood to say that he had not read the report of his remarks in the Globe, or in any other paper; he had often done so, and generally found them very incorrectly given. Nor was this surprising; the situation of the reporters, and the noise in the chamber, rendered it almost impossible that they should distinctly hear all that was said. The reporter who had certified in this case said, he believed, immediately behind him; and the reporters of the Globe were never in the habit of submitting to him any of their reports for revision.

Mr. C. did not impute any blame for what had been reported in the Globe. The President, however, had thought proper to take up that report, and, in commenting upon it, had used language which no gentleman was in the habit of employing to another, and which, indeed, was more worthy of the purlieus of Billingsgate than of the manner of the Chief Magistrate of a great nation.

Public Lands.

Mr. WALKER said he should make no remarks on the difficulty which had arisen between the Senator from South Carolina and the President. He had been an attentive listener during the speech referred to, and had not understood the Senator as making any charge against the President personally. The charges had been of a general nature, connecting the removal of the deposits with the system of speculation and with the introduction of the present bill. Mr. W. would say a few words as to the manner in which this bill had been introduced. An address had been delivered by himself in 1830, in which the proposition now embodied in the bill was substantially proposed; the address had been published, and—

Mr. CALHOUN here interposed, and disclaimed any imputation whatever on the motives of the honorable gentleman in introducing the bill; he had never doubted for a moment that they were honest and patriotic, and that the honorable Senator's whole course in the matter was prompted by his zeal for what he understood to be the interests of the new States.

Mr. WALKER went on to observe that the measure did not originate with the administration; but had in the first place been suggested in the address referred to, and had again been called up to public notice during a severe canvass in his own State during the year 1834. It had no connexion whatever with the removal of the deposits. That, on the contrary, was, he believed, the only administration measure which he had felt it his duty to oppose, not on grounds of constitutional law, however, but on those of expediency alone. Mr. W. then went into a defence of the bill, contending that it would have an effect the very reverse of that which had been predicted on the price of land in the hands of speculators.

Mr. CALHOUN would merely observe that, if he had been led into error in supposing that the funds derived from banks had been used for purposes of speculation in the public lands, he had been led into it by the President himself, who had said so in his message.

Mr. CLAY rose, and said that he had waited, under the expectation that the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER,] who had just resumed his seat, or some other friend of the administration, would make some motion founded upon the letter which had been laid before the Senate by the Senator from South Carolina. And if now (added Mr. C., pausing, and looking around the Senate) any friend of the administration has it in contemplation to submit any such motion, I will, with pleasure, give way that it may be made.

That most extraordinary letter (continued Mr. C.) has filled me with the deepest regret and mortification: regret that the illustrious citizen at the head of the Government should have allowed himself to address such a letter, in such a spirit, and in such language, to one of the representatives of a sovereign State of this Union; mortification that the Senate of the United States should be reduced to the state of degradation in which we all feel and know it now to be. That this letter is a palpable breach of the privileges appertaining to this body by the constitution, is beyond all controversy. It has not been denied, and cannot be denied. It is such a letter as no constitutional monarch would dare address to any member of the legislative body; and if he could so far forget himself as to do it, it would make the throne shake on which he sits.

We, Mr. President, who belong to the opposition, have no power to protect the privileges of this body, nor our individual privileges. The majority alone is now invested with authority to accomplish those objects. On that majority rests exclusively the responsibility of maintaining the dignity and the privileges of the Senate. And I have seen, with great surprise, that not one of that majority has risen, or appears disposed to rise, to vindicate the privileges which belong to the Senate. All of them, on the contrary, sit by in silence, as if they were ready to acquiesce in this new invasion of the rights of the Senate by the President of the United States, a co-ordinate branch of the Government.

I heard with satisfaction, from the Senator from South Carolina, that he intended himself to make no motion founded upon the President's letter, but should leave it to the Senate to protect its own rights. How can any member of the minority offer any motion, with that view, after the doctrines which were brought forward by the friends of the administration during the debate which arose on the removal of the deposits, and which have been more recently maintained during that on the expunging resolution, and supported by the vote of the Senate? Such is the lamentable condition to which the Senate is now reduced, how can the majority itself bring up any such motion? According to those doctrines, the Senate, being the tribunal to try the President in the event of an impeachment, has no power or right to express any opinion whatever on the constitutionality of any act which he may perform. He may insult the body or its members; he may enter this chamber with an armed force, disperse the members, and imprison them; but we must submit without murmur or complaint, and patiently wait until the majority of the House of Representatives, composed of his friends, shall vote an impeachment against him; which, if it were possible for them to do, there stands here a majority, composed also of his friends, ready to acquit him!

Let those who have contributed to produce the present unhappy state of things—who have stripped the other branches of the Government of their powers, one by one, and piled them on the Executive, until it has become practically the supreme power—answer for what they have done. Under all the responsibility with which they stand to our God and our country, let them respond for this flagrant violation of the constitutional privileges of the Senate. As for us, the poor privilege only remains of announcing to the people and to the States that the Senate, once a great bulwark of the public liberty, by a succession of encroachments, is now placed at the mercy of the Executive, exposed to every insult and outrage which the unbridled passions of any President may prompt him to offer.

The Senate then proceeded to debate the

LAND BILL.

The bill was then read a third time, and the question being on its passage,

Mr. DAVIS said, in substance, that he had, unfortunately for himself, been detained from the Senate most of the time while this measure had been under discussion, and had lost the benefit of the remarks of gentlemen who were well acquainted with the subject; but as it was a measure of great public importance, involving great interests and a vast amount of property, he had felt anxious to express his sentiments in regard to it. He hoped he might at this late period be indulged in adverting to some of the leading objections (for he should attempt no more) which had pressed themselves upon his mind.

The public domain, said he, is almost boundless in extent, and its value can scarcely be estimated. It is at least several hundred millions of dollars—a treasure greater than was ever possessed by any nation as public property. I consider it as common property, belonging to the people of the United States, and to the whole people. All have a deep interest in it, and have a right to know what disposition is made of it. If it were money, the public would be watchfully alive to the preservation and appropriation of it to the common good; but it is not of the less value, nor is it the less useful, because it consists in what may be converted into money.

The opinion was put forth a few years ago, that the new States alone had a right to the land within them; and as fast as new States were admitted into the Union the right of the United States to such lands was extinguished. We now hear almost daily on this floor pretensions set up of large rights in such States. Members here talk of our lands, and claim, in one form and another, exclusive privileges and advantages for their own constituents. The Senator from Arkansas asserts that any and all persons have an unquestioned right to occupy the public lands. The man who squats, as the phrase is, or seizes the public lands without color of right, and against the laws of the United States, is not only countenanced, but no language of encomium is sufficiently adulatory to express his merits.

Sir, I repeat, the public lands are public and common property, belonging to the whole people, and the whole people have a right to the benefit of them; and my principal motive in rising is to protest against partial and unjust legislation; to deny the right of the Senate to bestow them upon a class of favored individuals.

It is well known that the original boundary of the United States on the west was the Mississippi river. The country lying east of it, and between the Atlantic and the British provinces, was achieved by the common treasure, sacrifices, and blood, of the revolutionary war. This is the region declared by the treaty of 1783 to be free, sovereign, and independent. This was the great work of the old thirteen--the noble achievement of three millions of colonists, without funds, and almost without arms and ammunition, against the colossal power of Great Britain. It was the noble daring of lofty spirits, and will go down to all ages as a marked proof that a people resolved to be free cannot be subdued.

Of this territory, all west of the Alleghanies and north of the Ohio river was, with the exception of some military posts, then a vast wilderness. Indeed, the whole valley of the Mississippi was substantially so. Each State claimed limits coextensive with the charter granted to it as a colony by the Crown of Great Britain. When these charters were granted, the geography of the country was very imperfectly understood, and the grants, for the want of accurate boundaries, interfered with each other, covering often the same territory. This gave rise to conflicting claims in all parts of the country, some of which are not adjusted to this time. The charter of Massachusetts, for example, stretched across the continent, from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean; and so of some other States. Virginia claimed to the lakes. In 1783, all these conflicting claims were adjusted by deeds of cession from several States to all the States of this wild territory north of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi, for the benefit, as the deeds express it, of the States; and it was to be held and enjoyed for the benefit of the States, the United States not being named as such. This is the manner in which it became common property, in which each State was thus interested, and it was pledged for the redemption of the public debt. While the deeds of cession thus make it the property of the States, by language which admits of no evasion or misconstruction, they also provide for the division of it into States, and their admission into the Union when the territory should be inhabited.

It is thus rendered entirely clear that the new States were not to be the owners of these lands; for the pledge of them to pay the public debt, and the declaration that they should be held for the common benefit, are inconsistent with such a claim.

The lands west of the Mississippi and in Florida were purchased by the United States from France and Spain, and we paid for them twenty millions of dollars out of the public Treasury. The title to this vast domain is also equally clear. In addition to this, enormous sums have been paid to extinguish the Indian title.

The title, therefore, of the United States cannot be made questionable. The public lands are common treasure, and must be dealt with as such. The United States have always so treated them, and I must be allowed to recur to the general course of policy which has been pursued, to show what has been public sentiment.

A system of selling and settling then was at once, after the cession, adopted, the details of which I need not enter into, beyond what is necessary to prove that the public interest was guarded with watchful vigilance, and all attempts to give it away or to encourage intruders firmly resisted. As far back as 1796, I find that the subject of pre-emption rights was brought before Congress, and the Committee on Public Lands reported "that, inasmuch as illegal settlements on the lands of the United States ought not to be encouraged, and as yielding to the said claims [for pre-emption] would interfere with the general provisions for the sale of said lands, in their opinion, the prayer of said petitions ought not to be granted," that is, the petitions of persons asking for pre-emption rights, because they had entered without authority upon the public lands.

In 1801, the Committee on Public Lands reported--

"That [certain petitioners represented that] with much labor and difficulty they had settled upon, cultivated, and improved, certain lands, the property of the United States, between the waters of the Scioto and Muskingum rivers, and had thereby not only enhanced the value of the lands upon which they had respectively settled, but of other lands in the vicinity of the same, to the great benefit of the United States, and prayed for a pre-emption right to those lands, at two dollars the acre," [then the minimum price of public lands.]

"Your committee are of opinion that, as there are many others in the situation of the petitioners, if the indulgence prayed for be granted, it ought to be general; but, whatever may be the hardships sustained by the petitioners, and however great our disposition to relieve them therefrom, believing, as the committee do, that granting the indulgence prayed for would operate as an encouragement to intrusions on the public lands, and would be an unjustifiable sacrifice of the public interest, report, as their opinion, that the prayer of the petitions ought not to be granted."

In 1806, I find another report on pre-emption rights, which concludes thus:

"An indulgence in the present instance would encourage abuses in future, and might eventually lead to an entire abandonment of the existing land system, in exchange for one wholly incompatible with the idea of deriving revenue from the sale of public lands, and, by encouraging migration beyond its natural and necessary progress, create an interest hostile to the general welfare of the Union. It might be observed, further, that, by an extension of this right to the claimants, we enable individuals to select and engross the most eligible spots, in point of situation and soil, and thereby destroy all competition in the public sales."

How prophetic these remarks were, will be seen in the sequel.

In 1812, the committee, in regard to pre-emption rights, hold the following language:

SENATE.]

Public Lands.

"The committee are of opinion that promiscuous and unauthorized settlements on the public lands are, in many respects, injurious to the public interests; good policy forbids that any encouragement should be given to such intrusions. It was prohibited by the Congress under the confederation, and has been made penal by an act under the present form of government. Congress cannot, in the opinion of the committee, grant the prayer of the petitioners, in its full extent, without destroying the effect intended to be produced by the law prohibiting intrusions on the public lands. To legalize a direct violation of the law must, by obvious consequence, encourage future violations."

This law is now in force, and this report was made by Mr. Morrow, of Ohio, a gentleman well acquainted with the public land and the interests of the United States. By a departure from this wise policy, all the pernicious consequences which he so distinctly points out have been realized.

In 1824, the Committee on Public Lands again reported as follows, in regard to pre-emption rights:

"The committee are of opinion that an extension of these principles would be injurious to the Government as well as to those who may hereafter become the purchasers of public lands, and probably to those who may venture to settle upon Government land without authority hereafter.

"It cannot be perceived by what principle persons having no color of title should, after lands on which they have settled were known to belong to the United States at the time of making such settlement, claim the pre-emption right to such lands.

"Should the Government sanction applications of this nature, an inducement would be offered to persons of an enterprising disposition to anticipate, in every quarter, the Government in its sales of the public lands, and to settle upon and improve the most valuable tracts of land, which they would claim at the minimum price, whenever such lands were brought into the market by the authority of the United States.

"Purchasers of lands, finding themselves prevented from acquiring good lands, would abstain from purchases, and resort to illegal settlements, in the hope of obtaining that at the minimum price, which they could not obtain at fair and open sale.

"Thus, a competition would be excited among a certain description of our population to locate themselves upon the public lands, without regard to lines or boundaries, and with very little respect for the rights either of the Government or their Indian neighbors. * * *

"A system of indulgence to those who trespass, by making unauthorized settlements upon the public lands, after those lands are known to belong to the United States, would, in the opinion of the committee, be productive of much perplexity to the Government, as well as of injury to those concerned in the purchase and settlement of the public domain."

Without troubling the Senate further by reference to the doings of Congress, I may here remark that this was the wholesome doctrine which guided and regulated action here in regard to the public lands until 1830. A deaf ear was invariably turned upon all entreaties to grant what are denominated pre-emption rights. None stood more firmly against them than the members from the new States. The injurious consequences were foreseen, and our predecessors comprehended how difficult it would be to retrieve a false step. In 1830, the minimum price of public lands was reduced from two dollars to a dollar and a quarter an acre, and all credit abolished; which system is now in operation.

In 1830, the first pre-emption law, which extended to the public lands generally, was passed, under pretence of quieting the possessions of a few poor people who had established homes upon the public land, and asked for a few acres, at the minimum price, which they had cultivated about their houses. The argument addressed to the humanity of Congress prevailed. The speculators, in the guise of poor men, seduced Congress. It seemed just in itself; and we will now see what have been the results of that law, and learn something from experience. If the public documents speak the truth, it has been the means of awakening cupidity, and has served to disguise and cover up the most disgusting frauds, perjuries, and speculations. This law, in its terms, provided for retrospective cases only, for cases where settlements and cultivation had been actually made, and was designed to secure to the poor man his home, not to invite new settlers, or to enlarge the domains of the rich. A pre-emption law, as it is styled, gives to the occupant the exclusive right to enter for himself, to become the purchaser of a given quantity of land, on which he has made his improvements, be its quality or value what it may, at a dollar and a quarter the acre, which is the lowest price at which public land is sold. The least quantity which the United States, in their singular liberality, proposed to let a pre-emptor have was 160 acres, or one quarter of a section—the public lands being surveyed into sections or squares of 640 acres each.

This act of 1830, it was supposed, would apply only to the relief of a few cases of poor people, who had penetrated the public land, and commenced the process of clearing farms. But, sir, Mr. Brown, the late Commissioner of the Land Office, was required to state, at the last session of Congress, how much revenue had been diverted from the public Treasury by this act. His answer was, that he had no certain data by which to estimate it; but he adds:

"Considering the many tens of thousands of claims that have arisen under it, and the prevailing desire, in the mean while, to invest money in public land, the conclusion seems fair that the selected spots would have been sold for a price proportioned to their excellence, if no such law, nor any improper conspiracy, had existed. The estimate of three millions of dollars, which I had the honor to submit to you on the 28th of January last, appears to me now to underrate, much rather than to magnify, the difference between the receipts for pre-emption concessions and the sum the same lands would have brought into the Treasury."

Under this law, where two persons had made improvements on the same quarter section of land, it was decided, as they could not both have it, that one should have what is familiarly called a float—that is, a right to enter his quantity upon any of the surveyed and unsold public lands; thus giving to him a vast range, and an opportunity to select the most valuable spot.

The Commissioner, in speaking of the manner in which these floats were obtained, says:

"The virtuous and patriotic citizens of Louisiana have been disgusted and alarmed by the extent to which fraud and perjury are asserted to have been carried on in the manufacture of such claims within that interesting State, threatening to cover a large portion of the most valuable lands that have been surveyed." * *

"The law, as its title imports, is in favor of settlers. But pretensions have been set up by persons dwelling in town with their families, and there following mercantile pursuits, while they caused a little show of improvement, that scarce deserved the name, to be made for them by others; no proof being produced of their personal superintendence or direction on the spot. Cultivation by slaves or hirelings in 1833, and one or the other, or a growing crop on the place on the following 19th of June, have been assumed as fulfilling the required conditions."

Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

"Among the pretences to cultivation, there have been disclosures as follows, viz: where the cutting and burning a small patch of cane; where an enclosure, not entitled to be called a fence, around a space only large enough for a small garden, and the planting a few culinary vegetables; and where scattering an undefined quantity of turnip seeds or grass seeds, and, in one case, planting a few turnips or onions, have been claimed as cultivation to meet this condition." Again:

"If the propriety were conceded of making the pre-emption policy a part of our land system, there would be still no evident fitness in extending the concession to a full quarter section of land. An allowance of half that quantity of the very best land is surely munificent, and, if presumed poverty be one of the considerations for the grant, it may be observed that many a good farm in the West contains no more than an eighth of a section." Again:

"The temptation to abuse the charity of the Legislature is so radically intermixed and so inextricably interwoven with the operation of the pre-emption laws, that I should despair of laying before you altogether effectual means for the prevention of fraud on the part of claimants. It seems to me a hopeless task to project any modification of existing enactments that shall silence perjury, and defeat the devices of sagacious speculators, so long as their ingenuity shall be sharpened and stimulated by the prospect of immense gain attending their success."

Such are the extraordinary and disgusting developments made by the officer who was last year at the head of the General Land Office, and whose means of intelligence cannot be questioned; and such is the effect of legislating the public domain into the hands of individuals. It offers such temptation to an easy acquisition of wealth, that it superinduces every species of fraud.

I will now ask attention to some parts of a statement made by the attorney of the United States for the western district of Louisiana in regard to these floats and pre-emption rights:

"I will here mention a construction of the law which was adopted by the officers at Opelousas, and most of the pre-emption floats have been admitted under that construction: Two persons living on a quarter section, or who pretend that they do, on lands not worth a cent an acre; men who can neither read nor write; men who have never seen a survey made, and know nothing about sections or quarter sections of land; and who, in point of fact, live five, ten, and, in many instances, twenty miles apart, go before a justice of the peace as ignorant as themselves, and swear to all the facts required by law to make their entry; this, too, in a section of country never surveyed by the authority of the Government, nor any competent officer thereof. Would it be believed that any officer of the Government would admit an entry under circumstances like these, upon the oaths alone of the parties interested in making them, and upon lands not surveyed, approved, and returned, by higher authority? Can it be possible that an entry of that kind can either be in conformity with law, justice, or right?

"I state, of my own knowledge, that many of these pre-emption floats are precisely in the situation above detailed. I am authorized to name Colonel Robert A. Crane, of Louisiana, who states, positively, he knows many of them to be founded upon the same corrupt perjury—persons swearing that they lived on the same quarter section, when, in truth and in fact, they never had lived so near each other as five miles. It is not believed that there are thirty honest pre-emption floats in the whole district of Louisiana; and yet, since the 1st of January, 1835, up to the 27th of May, they have passed at the land office at Opelousas at least 350. And who are the owners of these floats? Principally one, and not more than three speculators. Since the 1st of January of this year, up to the 27th of May, day after day, week after week, I might say months after months, a notorious speculator (and who must have been known as such to the officers of the land office at Opelousas) was seen occupying that office, to the almost total exclusion of every body else. No other person appeared to understand how to get pre-emption floats through, and no one did succeed until an event which will be stated below. He could be seen followed to and from the land office by crowds of free negroes, Indians, and Spaniards, and the very lowest dregs of society in the counties of Opelousas and Rapides, with their affidavits already prepared by himself, and sworn to by them before some justice of the peace in some remote part of the county. These claims, to an immense extent, are presented and allowed. And upon what evidence? Simply upon the evidence of the parties themselves who desire to make the entry! And would it be believed that the lands where these quarter sections purported to be located, from the affidavit of the applicants, had never been surveyed by the Government nor any competent officer thereof, nor approved, nor returned surveyed? I further state that there was not even a private survey made. These facts I know. I have been in the office when the entries were made, and have examined the evidence, which was precisely what I have stated above."

Such has been the result of the experiment of the law of 1830, made for the benefit of a few poor settlers. It has swept away more than three millions of dollars from the public chest, and introduced a system which corrupts and demoralizes the citizens, to an extent surpassing belief. It comes to us fraught with all the evils prophesied of it, and has already invited hordes to seize upon the public property, indulging the hope that new laws of this description will be passed. Indeed, they come boldly to our doors and demand them. This city is now filled with greedy claimants; not your poor and helpless individuals, who have raised a log cabin over their heads in some nook of public property, but men who enter the fashionable walks of life and boast of their fortunes.

And yet this law of 1830 was guarded and protected by oaths and required proofs. The settlement and the cultivation must be proved under oath, and to have occurred before 1829, to entitle the claimant to the benefit of the act. But, sir, what is cultivation? Any act upon the soil; raising a handful of vegetables of a few weeks' growth; sowing a little grass seed, which is up in a few days. What is occupancy? Feeding a horse upon the soil has been claimed as such. And such miserable frauds, aided by the perjury of hired and interested witnesses, have been employed, with the connivance of public officers, under a benevolent act, to steal the most valuable parts of the public land. Such has been our sad and appalling experience under the law of 1830.

Now, sir, what is the character of the bill on your table? A thousand-fold worse than the act of 1830. It is a pre-emption, for the exclusive benefit of the States in which the public lands lie. A monopoly in their hands; an appropriation of the public lands to their use, to the exclusion of all others; a gift of this vast treasure to the citizens of those States. And can I vote for such a profligate disposition of public property? How can I meet my constituents and justify such an act? You have hardly the modesty to disguise this bill, by holding it up as a measure for the benefit of the poor; but gentlemen stand boldly forth, and contend that every man's farm should be made up to at least 1,280 acres out of the public land. Ay, more: that he shall have the right to select from no less than twenty-one sections of 640 acres each, the best parts and portions, to make up his complement, at a dollar and a quarter the acre. And more: you do not confine him to lands surveyed, but permit him to range in regions never yet exposed to sale, and to select the richest gifts of nature. Nor is your bill confined to retrospective action, but whoever will may go and seize the public domain. And what do you require of him? Oaths and proofs of occupancy and cultivation; such, substantially, as were required by the act of 1836; provisions just as easily evaded. And titles were manufactured under that act in vast numbers, by the oaths of perjured witnesses and the certificates of false magistrates. If you were robbed of three millions of dollars under that act, what may you not expect by thus opening the flood-gates to the cupidity of the greedy and avaricious?

We have, I know, heard much fulsome panegyric lavished upon the hardy pioneers, as they are styled; much of their sufferings, and much of their perils and bravery. But, sir, who invites them to these sufferings? Who asks them to seize the public land? For whose benefit is it? The laws of the United States forbid their entry upon it, they restrain by heavy penalties all intrusion, they declare all such persons to be trespassers and liable to indictment. These intruders are, therefore, disturbers of the public peace, and by interfering with the Indians they provoke hostilities, and create the very wars in which they affirm they have suffered, and then claim our compassion. It is my firm belief that if these disturbers were kept within lawful bounds, we should have no hostilities with the Indians.

But, sir, if fighting is meritorious, have we no fighting men to be provided for? Are those who achieved our independence forgotten? Do Bunker Hill, and Lexington, and Saratoga, sink into forgetfulness before the exploits with Black Hawk and Osceola? We have heard much, too, of the poor settler; and that there are some of this class on the public land is doubtless true. If they, and they alone, can be provided for by being quieted in their possessions, they shall have my vote. Show me a bill for them, which will bar frauds and speculation, and it shall have my most hearty support. But what sort of a bill is this for poor men, which proposes to let each person who may choose to take up for himself or to annex to his estate 1,280 acres of the most choice spots of the public land? Cannot something short of an estate equal to that of a nobleman satisfy the poor? The poor, sir, are used as the stalking-horse to disguise the measure; its features are, however, too apparent to mislead any one. But if the poor are to be provided for, then I claim that all are alike entitled. I regret it, but we have many poor, too poor even to be able to make the long journey to your public land. They are meritorious, and they suffer all the privations incident to their unfortunate condition, and I claim for them a share of the public bounty, if the public property is to be distributed. There is a great class of widows and orphans, aged and infirm, whose condition makes a strong appeal to your humanity. Let your bounty reach them, and gladden their sorrowful hearts, instead of adding to the boundless acres of the rich planters.

We have been told that great numbers of respectable people have emigrated, and settled upon the public lands, in the expectation that a pre-emption law would pass for their benefit. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HUBBARD] says that he knows of a great number, and that a large majority of the Territorial Council of Wisconsin are squatters. I doubt not it is true, and that they have left their poor neighbors behind them in New Hampshire. They are doubtless men of comfortable means; and why do they go to Wisconsin to settle upon public lands which have neither been surveyed nor brought into the market, when there are millions on millions of acres which have been surveyed this side of that Territory, which are of superior quality for agricultural purposes, and which they might lawfully enter and own at a dollar and a quarter? This boundless region does not satisfy the ambition of these poor men who are seeking a home. They pass by all this, as unworthy of their notice, and light upon regions where they may have the first choice, and not wait to get rich by the slow process of ordinary accumulation. These are the poor men knocking at our doors for pre-emption rights.

But this is not all. We have proofs here that they are banded and associated together to resist the laws of the United States, and to maintain their claims against all opposition. They have constitutions, as they term them; and for what? To stand together and maintain their possessions. To set at defiance the title of the United States to their own property. To make war upon all persons who shall dare to bid for these lands at the sales made by the United States, and by such high-handed violence to secure to themselves great tracts of country, the most valuable portions of the public domain, at the paltry sum of a dollar and a quarter the acre, though it is well known that purchasers stand ready in many instances to give a hundred-fold more. Many of these settlers, it is said, are banded with the speculators by an agreement to divide the booty; and when the rights are thus once secured in a place, like birds of prey, they rise up and light upon some other favored region, to convert it to private property by the same process of lawless violence.

I was informed by a gentleman, last winter, who lived at the Grand Rapids, in Michigan, among the Ottawa Indians, that the south bank of the rapids was owned by a squatter, who had obtained a section of 640 acres, at a dollar and a quarter the acre, and that it is worth, at this moment, without any important improvements, half a million of dollars. I could not easily credit the word of a man of the strictest veracity, until I saw, by the treaty made with these Indians, and ratified here at the last session, that a section on the other bank was estimated to be worth a much greater sum. This is not an isolated case of the accumulation of vast wealth by the erection of a bark cabin and the planting of a few peppers or tomatoes. The end, aim, and purpose, of the great body of pre-emptioners is to make themselves rich out of the public property. It is, in a word, to defraud the United States in the manner described in the documents from which I have read.

I have recently conversed with a distinguished member of the other House, from the West, who passed through Wisconsin during the last summer, and he informs me that the path leading through the public lands was, for a large portion of the way, skirted by a furrow or two of the plough, which turned off at intervals, and entered the prairies or the openings. On inquiry, he found that this was the proof of occupancy and possession. Those who had done this considered themselves as having established pre-emption rights to all enclosed by the furrows. Some went round a thousand, some more, and some less, acres, and some marked out, in this way, many lots. Almost all the choice land had been thus seized, in anticipation of the passage of this or some pre-emption act. He added, that when one crossed the furrow of another, this was called jumping, and then a fight with deadly weapons ensued.

I have seen also a letter, giving an account of a treaty made in Wisconsin the last summer with the Iowas, who lived on the Iowa river, west of the Mississippi. The lands upon this stream are represented to be of extraordinary fertility; and, after the general terms of the treaty were agreed upon, the commissioners proposed that a stipulation for a speedy removal of the Indians and a surrender of the territory should be inserted. When this proposition was interpreted to the Indians, the ariter, who was present, declares there was among them a general laugh, which was viewed as a singular comment upon a grave proposition, and an explanation was requested. They instantly replied that the proposition for such an article was absurd, and wholly unnecessary, as they had no possession. They affirmed, what was ascertained to be true, that before they assembled to make the treaty, the pre-emptioners had begun to run their ploughs round the land; and no sooner had their agreement to negotiate been made public, than the whites began to take possession of their cabins, and they did not doubt they were now occupying every one of them. The author of this letter is a gentleman, well known as a respectable citizen of the United States.

I have now said enough to show what is the general character of pre-emption rights—that they fill the minds of sharpers with golden dreams, and that the poor are the last class of people who are to be benefited by them.

If this bill passes, the public lands are gone, irrevocably gone; for such will be the rush upon them, and such the reliance upon future legislation of this character, that this Government can never reassert its authority. I have heard that the number of persons waiting on the public domain for this law may be estimated at 50,000; whether it be more or less is not material, for it is known to be great. When we hear that the Government itself of Wisconsin is of this class, we can have little doubt of the character of the population. Now, sir, I again ask, what necessity is there for such a partial, unjust measure? Why should we in this manner waste the public treasure, and corrupt the morals of the citizens? Why should we do injustice to the whole country, by lowering the value of real estate? Are not the landholders, the farmers of the old States, to be regarded? You cannot change the price of the public lands without its being felt by a correspondent change in the value of real estate from Maine to the farthest West. It seems to be thought here that the farmers of the old States have no right to open their mouths, if you legislate away half the value of their estates, which have been acquired by long, patient, and laborious industry. They may be left to take care of themselves, or to abandon their homes, and scramble for a share of the public property; for they seem to attract little of the sympathy that is so liberally extended to those who grasp at the alluring booty. Are not the rights of the farmers of the older portions of the new States to be regarded? They have bought and paid for their lands to the United States. Can it be just to them to give away adjoining lots? You indirectly acknowledge that it would not; for you bribe such persons, by allowing them to enlarge their farms to very extraordinary dimensions. But why are we urged to pass a law thus full of injustice?

The great and leading argument is, that the Treasury is too full of money, and it is better to annihilate a source of vast revenue, than to possess the money. Better to throw away public property than to keep it! Better to give it to a few, than that the great whole should have the benefit of it! Sir, you may talk of the poor; of the necessity of settling the public lands; of the gallantry of the pioneers; of their sufferings, their respectability, and whatever else the human mind may invent in its proneness to fiction; but you can never reconcile the people to such an argument. You can never satisfy them that it is better to waste the public treasure than to apply it to public uses; that it is better and more just to pamper a few with it, than to let the whole feel the blessings which a Government may secure by an administration for the benefit of all.

If there should be a surplus of revenue, (which the Secretary of the Treasury denies, and which the committee that report this bill deny, for they have recommended the rejection of the bill to renew the deposit with the States,) why should it not follow the surplus of last year? Is not this better than to cast it into the sea?

But there is still a wiser and a better measure—one that at all times has strongly recommended itself to the consideration of the country: I mean the bill which has repeatedly passed both Houses by a large majority, and has met with an insurmountable obstacle in the veto of the Executive—the land bill. This act provided for the distribution of the avails of the sales of the public lands among the States, upon just and equitable principles, to aid them in their great cause of education and internal improvements. It was in conformity with the terms of the cession of those lands; for they were given to the States, and not to the United States.

And, sir, if this salutary measure had been adopted, what signal blessings would it have conferred upon the States? Who does not see that it was every where needed, and that the hearts of the people would have been gladdened in all the country, by such a just distribution of a treasure acquired by the common blood and sacrifices of the American people? A more munificent, wise, and just act, was never devised within these chambers. This money would have been applied by the States to lighten the burdens and to increase the happiness of the people. I know of nothing in which the poor are more emphatically blessed than in enlarged means of education, or in which the whole people are more clearly benefited than in the extension of internal improvements, which bring the products of labor by cheap and easy means to the markets of the country.

Such was the general design of this beneficent act; and while I lament that any causes should have arrested its progress, I do not despair of yet seeing a returning sense and more just regard to public rights in this matter.

Can any one for a moment hesitate between the land bill and the act before us? They both relate to the public property: the one proposes to dispose of it for the public and general good; the other to advance the interests of a few clamorous individuals, most of whom are greedy speculators; the one to enlighten the public mind and to promote the public convenience, the other to create an odious monopoly in the hands of a few, while the great public is excluded from all participation in its own property; the one to ease the Treasury of its burdens, by returning to the people what is their own, the other to build up a class of favored individuals at the expense of the people. The one creates a sectional, undisguised monopoly, not of privileges alone, but by taking what belongs to us of the old States, as well as to those of the new, and giving it to others. Can there, ought there to be a moment's hesitation in choosing between these measures? If the Treasury is too full, (which your Secretary in his report and estimates denies,) shall the people have their own, or shall a favored few be pampered with it?

Have we reached a crisis which demands the absolute sacrifice of the public lands? What would be thought of an individual so profligate as to commit his property to destruction? It would be deemed a sin so gross as to provoke the displeasure of Heaven. And we need not be surprised if we soon reach a period when the people will look back with incredulity upon this era, in which we are puzzling ourselves to devise ways to get rid of the revenue. They will be amazed that so little wisdom existed here as not to apply any surplus that possibly can exist to great and useful purposes; but, above all, they will credit no man with sincerity who argues that it is necessary to sacrifice the public property; for you cannot persuade men that their condition is above amendment; that they need nothing more; that public money cannot yet be expended so as to promote their happiness.

But if, from political prejudice or any other cause, the land bill is objectionable, still we may easily reduce the revenue without throwing the public property overboard. Why not limit or stop the sales of the public lands? Why not offer a limited portion of those which have been surveyed, instead of exciting the cupidity of the greedy, by offering a choice of the whole domain? There surely can be no difficulty in reducing the revenue from public land, if it is necessary. Small financial talent can bring that about, and leave the public property to meet future emergencies. The Treasury can never be so plethoric as to require blood-letting.

But another matter has been pressed with extraordinary zeal, and, I fear, more for effect than any other purpose.

This chamber has literally resounded, ever since the opening of the session, with denunciations of speculators in lands. The pre-emption law of 1830, I have shown, disguised and gave effect to the most disgusting, injurious frauds among speculators that have ever been perpetrated; and this bill opens a passage a thousand times wider and safer for the workers of iniquity. I have, therefore, been greatly surprised that those who denounce speculators should be found among the advocates of this measure. Let those who have defrauded the poor Indians, and through them plundered the United States, answer for their gross misconduct. No denunciations for them can be too heavy, no punishment too severe.

But what have those persons done who, for the most part, have purchased the public lands, and paid this troublesome revenue into the Treasury? Just what the United States have invited them to do. We have a law of long standing, which requires, after the public lands have been surveyed, that they shall first be offered at public auction, and those which will sell at more than a dollar and a quarter shall be thus disposed of. It further provides that, whatever remains of the quantity thus offered, any person may enter in any quantity not less than one eighth of a section, and become the owner by paying the price into the land office of the district where the land lies. All persons are alike invited, both to attend the sales and to make entries of what remains. The great body of the public lands have been sold under the provisions of this law, and the purchasers have done precisely what we have invited them by law to do, and precisely what all honest purchasers before them have done. You offered your land on your own terms, and they have paid all you demanded. This is the extent of their offence; and does it become us, while that law stands on the statute books, and while the public offices are kept open under public authority from Congress, to stigmatize those who give us just what we ask—who deal openly, fairly, and honestly? If you have too many purchasers, if the land is too rapidly taken up, then alter your law; change your terms, instead of denouncing the purchasers. You can make terms that will put a stop to the sales. It ill becomes us to spend our breath in scolding about those who have done nothing but comply with our terms, nothing but to conform to the laws made here.

It is further urged that the public lands have excited a disposition to speculation and trade which ought to be suppressed, because it is injurious to the country. That an extraordinary spirit of trade and speculation is abroad admits of no doubt; and that its ends will not contribute to the general prosperity is perhaps equally certain; but I cannot agree that the public lands have been the exciting cause. Nothing seems to me more unfounded.

The origin of this state of things may be found in the attempts of the Executive to regulate the currency of the country. These attempts, all agree now, have been futile and positively injurious; and so will all attempts to regulate speculation prove. Every one thinks he can clearly see proofs of over-trading in others; but there are few, I believe, who do not entertain the opinion that their own affairs are judiciously conducted. They need no regulation themselves; indeed, they are willing to submit to none; for that is a matter that belongs exclusively to their private judgment; but their neighbors may with propriety be regulated. The Executive may put his hand upon them, because they buy or sell a little too much. It is a kind of indefinable public injury, which may be corrected by the interference of executive power; and there is no harm in applying a regulator to the judgment of others. To ourselves it is not necessary, as our opinions are as good as the King's. But I said speculation did not find its origin in the public lands, but in the removal of the deposits. That extraordinary measure gave the death-blow to the Bank of the United States, and established the belief that such a bank hereafter was to be dispensed with. What a host of banks have risen upon its ruins! What a sea of paper has inundated the country, under pretence of suppressing bank notes! In 1830, the bank capital in the United States was estimated at $145,192,268; and it is now believed to be little, if any, short of $400,000,000. Banks have been every where created, with an amount of capital that would have startled the public mind before this war began. Where is the boasted hard-money currency? Who sees it? Who feels it? It jingles in the press, and nowhere else. But what has been the effect of this remarkable creation of banks? It has every where greatly added to the amount of circulation. The very evil complained of exists in a vastly more efficient and all-pervading character. Wherever new banks have been created, there hopes have been excited that money could be reached, and there these hopes have begot the spirit of speculation. A new batch of bills was to be thrown out, and those who would add to their mass of wealth, and those who would mend broken fortunes, or amass riches by sudden acquisitions, seized these opportunities to lay hold of the means. The success of one has stimulated another, until the contagion has spread, with the spread of banks, over the land. This system, I fear, has grown to be an alarming evil; and whenever distress and suffering shall overtake us, as it bids fair to do speedily, then will the eyes of the public be turned to this place for relief, and the just power of the States, instead of being respected, will be trampled under foot. Pennsylvania, democratic Pennsylvania, has already appealed to this power to rid her of her State banks.

Let not the public lands be charged with exciting this gambling spirit. The only reason why you sell the public lands is, because they are supposed to be cheap; and if you think them so, it is easy to ask more. Let the currency alone; place your surplus money with the States, instead of piling it up in your pet banks, so that it rises above their capital, and the people will soon learn how to do business, and you will find little cause to complain of speculation; but so long as you undertake to regulate it, and fit that regulation to suit the fortunes and wishes of favored capitalists, so long you will hear complaints, and just complaints, of the partial and oppressive action of this Government.

But with what force can those who censure speculation advocate this bill? It proposes to legalize the most stupendous speculations that the country has ever witnessed. If we cannot extricate ourselves from the petty law of 1830, if that has enlisted an army of 50,000 men to band themselves together to insist on pre-emption rights against all law and all color of right, what number do you think this bill will array upon the frontiers? I tell you, sir, that the whole power of the United States will exert itself in vain against the current. Your public domain will be lost; instead of three millions, your bill will take from you three hundred millions. The temptation is such as never addressed itself to cupidity; and the speculators, those who can run furrows and hire the strongest force to make violence and to resist violence, will be the chief participants in the plunder. He who can raise the strongest clan, and flourish the most knives, will acquire the greatest possessions.

The bill also invites and protects fraud; for you authorize a person to enter upon his two sections, to make his cultivation, and to hold the land, but he is to have no title for five years. Whoever, therefore, chooses to defraud his creditors, may salt his money down in these lands, and it will be beyond the reach of the law; for the title will be in the United States, while the actual possession and full enjoyment will be in the pre-emptioner. This will be one of the most convenient modes ever devised of abstracting property from the reach of creditors.

But there is another reason more extraordinary than any to which I have hitherto adverted. I commend the frankness of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] when he says earnestly, and too emphatically to be misunderstood, it is time the federal title to the public lands was extinguished; the time is coming when we will have them. These are plain declarations—"we will have them." The old States, then, are to have no part or lot in the public lands. The children hold themselves justified in seizing the estate, in robbing the ancestor while alive; and those who propose this complain of all who buy land at the legal price as greedy speculators; as men preying upon the public prosperity, and enriching themselves at the expense of the settlers. This can only mean that what goes into the public Treasury is grudging to it. It is time for the public to rouse up and look to this usurpation, if there is such a determination abroad. It is time for the old States to awake from their repose, and see that their inheritance is not sold for a mess of pottage. These public lands afford a most alluring temptation to those who seek for popular favor, and the old States may rest assured that they will constitute a political capital to trade upon, and he who will offer them upon the most favorable terms will hope for most popular favor in the West. The halls of Congress have long furnished ample proof of this. Sir, I hope the time has not come when the people are to be purchased by largesses; when, in imitation of the corrupt days of Rome, favor is to be gained by a distribution of corn or money. Yet, from the signs here, I have long feared the approach of evil. I hope, sir, the people place a higher value upon public liberty; that they will consent to be the followers of no one who does not, by his conduct as well as sentiments, show his respect and regard for the institutions achieved and established by the Revolution of independence. Men that can be bought and sold by petty hopes of pecuniary advantage are unworthy of the great public blessings they inherit.

The Senator from Missouri, I agree, understands the sentiments of his part of the country better than I do, for he has long been a sagacious observer of public opinion. It is enough for me that he declares the purpose exists to assert title to the lands in the new States. It is enough for all who value their property to look to it with vigilance, when one of his standing and influence declares that the federal title shall be extinguished. The new States, I trust, are more wise, just, and patriotic, than the suggestion would imply.

I have, sir, (said Mr. D.,) glanced at some of the important matters connected with this measure, and I cannot view it in any aspect in which it presents itself, that is not pregnant with vicious consequences; and, though I fear it will be unavailing, I earnestly hope the bill may be rejected.

Mr. TIPTON said he had hoped that the bill would have been brought back from the committee in some shape in which he could cheerfully give his vote in its favor; and although there was now only one feature of it which recommended it to him, (that of pre-emption,) he should still vote for it. Though the bill would, on the whole, be of little benefit to Indians, yet some there would be eminently benefited by the revival of the pre-emption law. Every Senator must see that this was a great national object.

Mr. T. regretted extremely that a bill with such provisions as this did not limit the sales of the public lands at all. For five years past, the Senate and the country had been much agitated in relation to the public lands. In regard to them, three measures had been presented. The first was Mr. CLAY's land bill, to which, if it were possible to pass it in connexion with the pre-emption principle, he would give his support. The second measure was the one proposed by Mr. CALHOUN, to cede the public lands to the new States on certain conditions, which would relieve those States from an undue subjection to the Federal Government, give them the power to tax the lands, and enable them to advance more rapidly in improvement and prosperity. Mr. T. did not believe, with Mr. HUBBARD, that the time had not arrived for this measure. The proper time, he thought, had arrived, and he wished the bill might have a report made upon it by a committee, and go abroad to the country. The third measure was this bill, to which Mr. T. especially objected, because it was limited to three years. He hoped, therefore, that the new States would be put in possession of the public lands.

Mr. EWING spoke in decided opposition to it, on constitutional among other considerations.

Mr. CLAY said it had been his wish and intention, in the progress of this bill, to express his sentiments at large upon it; and he would now do so, but he did not wish to inflict on the Senate a long speech. He would say but a few words.

He had not purchased, he said, either directly or indirectly one acre of land for twenty years past, with the exception of a quarter section to complete a grazing farm in Illinois; and in saying this he did not imply a reproach against purchasers of the public lands. If individuals evaded the law, or made use of official power in such purchases, to these he objected, but not to the general purchaser.

Mr. C. recollected three different epochs at which speculation had raged. The first was from 1792 to 1796, when it raged throughout the country. Among these speculators were Morris, and Nicholson, and others, merchants of Virginia. Beautiful maps were made out, dry lands were turned into meadows, barrens into fruitful fields, and streams were found where they were never found before. That speculation was disastrous to all concerned. In 1816, after the late war, it had raged again. Land was bought in Alabama at from $40 to $70 per acre. This general speculation was also most disastrous, and many of the speculators had got relief from the Government, by a reduction of 36 per cent. on their purchases. Most of the speculators suffered. Again the spirit arose a year or two ago; and Mr. C. doubted not that the crisis of the disease was already past, and if it were let alone it would remedy itself. Very many purchasers would be great sufferers, as in 1796 and 1818-19. The evil required no physician to arrest its progress, and it was best to leave it where it was.

This bill, Mr. C. said, had been founded on two ideas: first to reduce the revenue, and then to suppress speculation. If Mr. C's views were correct, speculation would go down of itself, so low even that it would be necessary to stimulate it, and the revenue would fall to the ordinary wants of the Government. There would not again be a surplus to require legislation. But even if the public lands should net twenty or twenty-five millions of dollars annually, was this bill the proper remedy? Some gentlemen would say the object would be attained by increasing the price of the land, and thereby reducing the sales; another would keep the lands out of the market. Another remedy would be the bill which Mr. C. had had the honor of proposing so often, and which had met the sanction of this body. By adopting this, Congress would execute the great trust reposed in them, and the States would be more benefited by it than by the present bill. Mr. C. could not see how gentlemen could give their assent to this bill, if they saw the constitutional objections as he did. What power had Congress thus to dispose of the public lands? This bill supposed that Government had some power over the land, beyond and after its disposition. It seemed to Mr. C. that when they had sold the land their power was exhausted.

But again: what right had Congress to legislate on the law of contracts within the bosom of the States? What relation did they bear to the land within the States? Nothing more nor less than that of a proprietor, which drew after it no legislative powers whatever. The property was secured in the new States by compact, so as to be exempt from taxation by the States; but when these States were erected, they had otherwise the same power over it as the old States. The legislative power of Congress over the territory ceased to exist, and they had no power to declare what contracts should be valid or not valid.

But again: the constitution of the United States declared that the judicial power created by this Government should be vested in a Supreme Court of the United States and such inferior courts as Congress should establish. But by this bill was not this power vested in the registers and receivers of the public lands? They were to examine evidence and decide on the rights of property. And, further, between two pre-emptioners they were to decide without appeal, without trial by jury, without reversal. Mr. C. would agree that a copy of this provision was to be found in another act of Congress; but it was an act granting military bounties in consequence of the war with Great Britain. And the tracts granted by these laws were all in the Territories, over which Congress held the power to legislate.

Again, Mr. C. said, this law provided that a man who lived in the new States, and owned a tract of land, should have privileges which were denied to citizens in the other States. That was, they might hold pre-emption to other tracts of land, to the entire quantity of two sections allowed by the bill. What right had Congress to create this inequality? What right had they to give one who owned a farm in the new States privileges which were not given to one who owned a farm in the old States?

Again: this bill professed to be a settlement law to people in the new States. Where had Congress the authority to act on this principle. The States had the power, but had Congress any such power? Mr. C. called especially on the State rights men to vindicate the bill from these charges which he brought against it.

Mr. C. saw insuperable objections to the bill, on the ground of affidavits. Each settler might enter eighteen different tracts, each of which would require three affidavits, making fifty-four for each settler. All these were to be filed by the registers and receivers, and examined by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. Could any estimate be made of the aggregate number? Here would be millions on millions of affidavits, so that algebra itself could hardly reach the amount. The bill, also, was founded on an inference of the security of affidavits. But who would examine them? Nothing would be more unpopular than to scrutinize an affidavit; and they would therefore amount to no security.

And then, as to speculators, nothing had surprised Mr. C. so much as to hear the chairman of the Land Committee contend that a direct effect of the law would be to benefit speculators; and that it would be a great security to the free sales. To have much land in the market, and the terms easy, secured against speculation! How could the speculator, then, enter into competition with the United States? In proportion to the quantity of the article, so would be the lowness of price. But if the United States withdrew the lands, or placed restrictions on the sales, the lands which could be without all this would sell more readily. Security against speculation consisted in the quantity of land in the market, and in exemption from restriction. Mr. C. declared that if he had speculated, he would hail the passage of this law as one which would secure to him a fortune.

Then, as to the pre-emption clause; it was not correct that pre-emption was the subject of early legislation. There was a law passed in 1807, which was in force till the admission of Louisiana into the Union, the 14th section of which provided, that if any person should make a settlement on the lands of the United States, within the limits of Louisiana, he should be subject to a fine not exceeding $1,000, or to imprisonment not exceeding twelve months; and such persons were liable to removal by the military force of the United States. Till within a few years, Mr. C. said, the laws on this subject were rigorous enough, Congress designing to take care of the property for the benefit of the whole Union. It was only within five or six years that pre-emption laws were passed at all, except under peculiar circumstances. But if this bill should pass, Mr. C. said he would not give a pinch of snuff for its limitation to December 1, 1836. Pass this now, and another and another would follow, however firmly the impression might now be made that this was the end of pre-emption forever. It would still go on, and settlers in hordes would take possession of the public land; and they would come here with all the power they could exert, to procure the passage of pre-emption laws. Pass it, and such laws would be as regular as the general appropriation bill.

But it was asked, why refuse pre-emption? Only a few dollars more; it was said, than the minimum price was on the average obtained at the free sales. But Mr. C. said this lowness of price was itself owing to pre-emption. But if it were not so, was it not fair that there should be no other than free sales? No one had a just right to complain. But when motives were offered, as by this bill, to go and seize the public lands, the necessary effect was dissatisfaction. Members here represented the whole, pre-emptioners and others; but those who came here felt that they must take care of pre-emptioners, since one good turn deserves another, pre-emptioners having helped them to office. Mr. C. would not reproach them; their motives were such as were powerful in our nature, and they were not at liberty to disregard them. But they should recollect that not all their constituents were pre-emptioners.

Mr. C. believed, therefore, that when this beginning should reach the Rocky Mountains, every security to the public land would be gone. A few years ago such grants were only made in forty-acre tracts, and even then only for the sake of completing a farm; but this bill would sweep off all restrictions.

The bill thus extended the power to purchase, withdrew the exemption from taxation for five years after sale; and by pre-emption it would sweep over the whole country. The Senate were told to do this now; but in a few years there would be more Senators from new States, and they would then use their power to appropriate to themselves the entire public domain of the country.

It was with the deepest regret that Mr. C. had witnessed these proceedings. It was the duty of Congress to vindicate the property of the entire Union, from supporting a bill by which, in a few years, the public domain would be unknown to the legislation of Congress. Mr. C. hoped the bill would be arrested here or somewhere else, and that the land system would remain unchanged and unaffected. One great advantage of the system had been the security of titles. Would they not be put in jeopardy by this bill, and would it not renew the afflictive scenes which Mr. C. had witnessed in his own State? And it would drive the best of our citizens to find refuge in the new country.

The Secretary of the Treasury was required to mark those lands which were reserved; but supposing he should not do so, he incurred no penalty. Here, again, there was danger and an increase of risk, instead of security. In these remarks, Mr. C. said, he had acted under a profound sense of public duty.

The question being at length obtained, the bill was passed, by yeas and nays, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, McKean, Morris, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, White—23.

The title was amended by adding the words, "and for other purposes."

The Senate then adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 10.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SWIFT said that either the journal of yesterday's proceedings, as read by the Secretary, was incorrect, or several Senators had voted under a misapprehension of the question on the petition presented by him yesterday in relation to slavery and the slave trade in the District.

Mr. CLAYTON stated that he had understood the question to be on the motion of Mr. SWIFT to refer that portion of the petition which related to the regulation of the slave trade in the District (over which subject he thought Congress had power) to the Committee for the District; and he had therefore voted in the affirmative, because he regarded that trade as an infamous and inhuman traffic, which ought to be abolished.

The CHAIR said the journal was correct; and that, objection having been made to the petition, the question was simply and exclusively on its reception.

Mr. CLAYTON's vote, by unanimous consent, was then altered from the affirmative to the negative.

STEAM BOILER BILL.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, the bill authorizing the appointment of a commission of three persons to make experiments on inventions to prevent the explosion of steam boilers, was considered; the blanks filled by appropriating $6,000 for the expense of the experiments, and $300 each for the pay of the commissioners. Amended, on motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, by appropriating $3,000 additional for the trial of the "double self-acting safety valve," on the Western waters; and, together with the amendments, ordered to a third reading.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the Hon. MARTIN VAN BUREN, and inform him that he has been elected President of the United States, reported that they had performed the duty assigned to them, and had received for answer that he desired to express the grateful sense that he entertained of the distinguished honor which his fellow-citizens had conferred on him; and requested them to assure their respective Houses that they might rely on his unceasing endeavors to execute the responsible trust which devolved on him, in a manner most conducive to the public interest.

TREASURY CIRCULAR.

After morning business had been disposed of, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to designate and limit the kinds of funds receivable for the public revenue.

Mr. HUBBARD moved an amendment to the bill, requiring the registers and receivers to receive the same scrip in payment for the public lands as heretofore.

Mr. CLAY remarked that the bill in its present form left the Treasury order unrescinded, the subject of that order being still wholly in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. He had an amendment therefore to offer, which, if accepted by Mr. HUBBARD as a part of his, and adopted by the Senate, would reconcile him to the bill. This amendment declared that it was not lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to make any discrimination in the funds so receivable as public revenue.

Mr. HUBBARD accepted this addition to his amendment; which amendment, so amended, was adopted by unanimous consent.

Mr. EWING called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill; which were ordered.

Mr. BENTON gave extracts from a letter which he had lately received from Missouri, stating that all parties there were now in favor of the Treasury order, which he accompanied with some remarks; and afterwards spoke for some time in favor of specie and against paper money and the Bank of the United States.

Mr. BLACK said that in Mississippi all parties were now united in condemnation of the Treasury order; and he had just learned, by a respectable gazette, that resolutions condemning that order had just been introduced into the Legislature of Mississippi, and had received the unanimous vote of the House of Representatives in their favor.

Mr. EWING remarked that the bill, as now amended, was nearly all he desired. He would therefore now give it his hearty concurrence.

Messrs. NILES, BENTON, and WALKER, participated for a while in a general financial discussion, having an especial reference to banks, paper money, and the Treasury order.

Mr. CALHOUN said he had been very anxious to express his opinions somewhat at large upon this subject. He put no faith in this measure to arrest the downward course of the country. He believed the state of the currency was almost incurably bad, so that it was very doubtful whether the highest skill and wisdom could restore it to soundness; and it was destined, at no distant time, to undergo an entire revolution. An explosion he considered inevitable, and so much the greater, the longer it should be delayed. Mr. C. would have been glad to go over the whole subject; but as he was now unprepared to assign his reasons for the vote which he might give, he was unwilling to vote at all.

The bill was then passed, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, McKean, Moore, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Walker, Wall, Webster, White—41.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Linn, Morris, Ruggles, Wright—5.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the Senate held an executive session.

When the doors were opened, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to amend the Judiciary System of the United States—Fortifications, &amp;c.

[FEB. 11, 1837.]

JUDICIARY SYSTEM OF THE UNITED STATES.

An amendment reported from the committee, altering the order of the several circuits, was adopted.

Mr. GRUNDY offered several amendments, one of which made the districts of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, the seventh circuit, and others made the number of terms in the new States and Territories one instead of two in a year.

At the request of Mr. GRUNDY, who wished for further time to incorporate his amendments with the bill, having failed in a motion to reconsider the vote on the committee's amendment, with which his were designed to be connected, the action on the bill was suspended by unanimous consent.

FORTIFICATIONS.

The bill making appropriations for fortifications, &c. for the year 1837, coming up in its order,

Mr. CALHOUN moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. BENTON called for the yeas and nays on this motion; which were ordered, and the motion negatived: Yeas 8, noes 20.

Mr. BENTON remarked that the bill was precisely the same which had passed the Senate at the last session.

Mr. SOUTHARD remarked on the great importance of the bill, and wished that action upon it might not be hasty.

Mr. CALHOUN, also remarking on the impropriety of haste on such a measure, moved to lay the bill on the table till to-morrow.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, moved an adjournment; which was negatived: Yeas 12, nays 21.

Mr. CALHOUN said that this bill was so unexpected, and the hour so late, that he should decline making the observations which he intended to make, unless further time should be allowed. He modified his motion, so as simply to lay the bill on the table; which motion was negatived, by yeas and nays, on the call of Mr. BENTON, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Ewing of Ohio, King of Georgia, Moore, Prentiss, Robinson, Southard, Swift, White—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Dana, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, Linn, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Sevier, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wall, Wright—23.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and ordered to a third reading, without a division.

The Senate then adjourned.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the honorable RICHARD M. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, and inform him that he had been elected by the Senate to the office of Vice President of the United States, reported that, on Saturday last, they had performed that duty, and had received the following letter, which they were requested to present to the Senate:

To the Senate of the United States:

GENTLEMEN: I have received, with no ordinary emotions, the notice, through your committee, of my election to the office of Vice President of the United States by the Senate. I accept the station assigned me. This token of regard from the representatives of the States will ever be held in grateful recollection. Permit me to tender you my sincere thanks.

Observing that your decision is in harmony with a majority of the States and a moiety of all the electors in the primary colleges, my gratification is heightened, from the conviction that the Senate, in the exercise of their constitutional prerogative, concurred with and confirmed the wishes both of the States and the people. Called, in virtue of this preferment, to preside in the deliberations of your enlightened body, from and after the 3d of March next, permit me to make use of this opportunity to say that I cannot feel insensible to difficulties which I must anticipate, and the frequent occasion I may have for your forbearance. Though for thirty years a member of one or the other of the two Houses of Congress, yet I have never been accustomed to preside, even temporarily, over either, or in any deliberative assembly. My attention has generally been engrossed by the more immediate acts of legislation, without special regard to the minuteness of rules and orders, so necessary to the progress of business, and so important to the observance of the presiding officer.

Contemplating the character of my distinguished predecessors, and considering my deficiency in point of talent, and the want of experience for the appropriate duties of the station, it is impossible for me to overcome entirely the diffidence with which I meet this call of my fellow-citizens. But this reflection will always console me, that any errors on my part will affect me personally rather than the public; the intelligence of the Senate will guard the country from any injury that might result from the imperfections of its presiding officer, and its magnanimity will cover these imperfections with the veil of charity. In this conclusion, I find a warrant in contemplating among the members of your body so many friends with whom I have been associated in public life. It is only in the event of an equal division of the Senate that the presiding officer is called upon to give his vote. My hope is, that there may be always sufficient unanimity to prevent such a contingency. If, however, it should happen, this duty will be familiar to me, and I shall perform it without embarrassment. In exercising this power, I shall expect the same indulgence that I have ever extended to others, where differences of opinion existed.

To the Senate the most important trusts are committed. Its duties are legislative, executive, and, in certain contingencies, judicial. As citizens, every branch of our Government is dear to us; but, from my more immediate relation to this, by your choice, I shall regard it with special interest. It stands pre-eminent in talent and character. In presiding over its deliberations it shall be my effort to act with perfect respect and impartiality towards every member, and endeavor, by this course of conduct, to merit the approbation of all.

R. M. JOHNSON.

CITY OF WASHINGTON, Feb. 10, 1837.

CESSION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill [Mr. CALHOUN'S] to cede the public lands, on certain conditions, to the new States, came up in its order for a second reading.

Mr. HUBBARD remarked that he presumed that all those who wished to be heard in support of this bill had enjoyed the opportunity; and he would at once make the motion to lay the bill upon the table, in order to test the opinion of the Senate as to the policy of the measure, if he did not consider himself called upon to make some few general observations in relation to this subject. He intended, however, to submit that motion before he resumed his seat. And he would now proceed to state the particular reasons which will induce him to submit the motion. He certainly could not, with any truth, be charged with entertaining any feeling unfriendly to the new States. He was their friend. He had been their friend; and he could appeal with confidence to the records of this and of the other House, as evidence of the truth of the assertion. He had sustained, here and elsewhere, every measure which was calculated to advance their interests, unless it could be inferred that he had given evidence of his hostility by opposing a general reduction in the price of the public lands, wheresoever they may be located. This he had done. He could not believe that such a course was necessary to the interests of the States northwest of the Ohio. Certainly such a course could not be just to the interests of the old States. He would not be found in opposition even to the application of the graduation principle, whenever he was satisfied that any portion of the public domain was over-valued at $1 25 per acre; but, for one, he entertained no doubt that a very large portion of the public lands liable to private entry was not only worth the minimum price, but would command it at any time in market. In making the motion which he designed to make, he would assure his friends from the new States that he was actuated by no unkind feeling to them, but from a sense of public duty. The course of the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina would lead any one to suppose that he had brought this subject forward out of pure regard to the interests of the new States; that he considered there was existing a great inequality in privilege between the new and the old States, in this and in the other House of Congress; that there was a degree of subserviency on the part of the new States—a want of independence; and that this bill, if it should become a law, would give to the new States equal rights—would free them from the thralldom now imposed upon them, and place them on a footing equally independent with their sister States. Can this be so? Where is the evidence of this inequality—of this embarrassment on the part of the new States? Where is the evidence of any disposition on the part of the old States to hold the new States in check? It is not to be found. The history of the legislation of Congress, from the foundation of the Government, cannot fail to furnish evidence of an unceasing and unflinching devotedness among the representatives of the old States, in the Senate and in the House of Representatives, to the best interests of the new States. The honorable Senator from Mississippi farthest from me, [Mr. BLACK,] and the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. LINN,] have, on more than one occasion, admitted that the representatives from the old had not only been just, but generous to the new States. The fact is so; and the Senator from South Carolina is mistaken, if he supposes that the interests of the new States have been embarrassed in the slightest degree by the action of Congress heretofore. The reverse is the fact. Their interests have been invariably promoted, even at the sacrifice of the rights, in some measure, of the old States themselves.

The Senator expresses his surprise that this bill should be opposed at this stage; that it should be refused a second reading; that the Senate should object even to its printing. He was not aware that the question of printing had been made. He certainly had no objection to have the bill printed; but he was opposed to its second reading; because, if read a second time, it would have to be referred to a committee, and would be open to a full discussion.

He could not but regret that the Senator had introduced this bill; and might he not now ask, as he had on a former day, why has he done this at this late period of the session, when only seventeen working days could come before this Congress must terminate its labors? Why has the Senator seen fit, at this time, to introduce this subject before the Senate and the nation?—certainly a subject of higher importance than any other—a subject more immediately affecting the interests of the whole people than any other. The Senator himself says that he does not expect that the bill will receive any definite legislation during the present session, but he wishes the bill referred, and a report made. He wishes the subject debated. He considers it so important a subject that it should be debated at large, and for days, before any report for or against the project should be sent forth to the people. He was entirely opposed to any such proceeding; and if there was a public, a pressing necessity for the measure, if it was founded in general policy, it is somewhat remarkable that the Senator from South Carolina did not at the commencement of the session bring this bill forward, when there would have been time not only for deliberation but for action. He must object, therefore, most strenuously, to any further proceeding at this time upon this subject; and he could not but feel some surprise that the Senators from the new States are among those who are urging action upon this measure. As a friend of the new States—as a friend of the bill which has so recently passed the Senate, and been sent to the House of Representatives, he would say that no further action ought to take place upon the measure now before the Senate. It occurred to him, and must occur to every Senator, that the pendency of this bill here would greatly embarrass, if not entirely defeat, the final passage of the bill to which he had just referred. There certainly could be no occasion for passing that bill, if there is to be a favorable action upon this.

The bill presented by the Senator from South Carolina proposes to cede to the new States, on certain terms, all the unsold lands within their respective limits. Should this become a law, there would be much propriety in permitting the new States, respectively, to make their own pre-emption regulations, for the benefit of their own citizens. There cannot be, in his judgment, a single good reason assigned for the passage of the bill before the House of Representatives, if this bill is to be passed. He would therefore most sincerely advise the Senators from the new States, friendly to that bill, not to urge action at this time upon this bill; such a course must be known to the members of the House of Representatives, and must prevent action upon the bill now before that body. He was aware that some of the Senators from the new States were not very strongly in favor of that bill; but it was, nevertheless, regarded as a measure for the benefit, and, in his judgment, for the exclusive benefit, of the new States. His worthy friend, the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. LINN,] had frankly admitted, what he believed to be truth, that the bill which had been so recently passed by the Senate was a most advantageous measure to the new States; that they had no reason to ask for or to expect a better bill; and whoever will carefully examine all its provisions must concur in opinion, most fully, with the Senator from Missouri. And yet Senators from the new States, before that bill could have left this hall, are found advocating, and with all their power and influence supporting, the bill offered by the Senator from South Carolina. He must be permitted to say that such a course is full of danger to the bill now before the House. He had not a single doubt that, unless the bill now before the Senate is put to rest, there will be no further action upon the bill now before the House of Representatives. He was, therefore, as the friend of that bill, which had been so fully considered by the Senate, and which had so long engaged the attention and the time of the Senators, and which had so recently passed this body, unwilling to take a step which would embarrass its further progress. He should vote, for this reason, to lay the bill offered by the Senator from South Carolina on the table, as he considers such a course would be more respectful than to deny it a second reading.

He was opposed to any further proceeding upon this bill, because, as he had before stated, the public and private business now on the calendar imperiously demands all the consideration and all the time of the Senate. There is no time for an extended discussion upon this measure. Such a course would be most unjust to the public, and would be most ruinous to individual, to private interests. There are hardly days enough remaining of this Congress to give to the public business now on the docket the attention and consideration which that public business demands. But, in addition to this, there are also individual claims which have long been before the Senate, and which are of the greatest importance to the persons concerned, and which it would be most oppressive and unjust to postpone for the sake of a mere debate upon this measure. He was therefore opposed to further proceeding on this ground. But even if there was time, he would object, and strenuously object, to any interference with the public domain in the way proposed by the Senator from South Carolina. His own State had a deep interest in this property; it belonged to the people of New Hampshire, in common with the people of the other States and Territories. And who has asked the Senator from South Carolina to move in this affair? He would not agree that the property of his people should be ceded away without their consent. He would not himself take such a step, unasked and unsolicited, and he should protest against any other person taking such a course. The history of the Revolution will show full well what had been done by his native State in the acquisition of the public domain; and he never could or would lend his aid in the disposal of the public lands without the approval and without direction of his people. There are no memorials before the Senate, even from the new States, for this cession. Those which had been referred to would be found to ask only for particular cessions, and for special purposes. He would not, then, move further. Enough has already been done. The Senator has introduced his bill; it has been discussed. The bill and the arguments in its favor will be printed; they will go forth, and will have the effect of calling the public mind to the consideration of the subject; and there he would leave it, and wait for the expression of the will of the American people in relation to this absorbing subject.

The Senator from Mississippi says that the subject ought to be debated, that the bill ought to be committed, and that reports containing arguments for and against the measure ought to be sent forth to the people; and he could not but consider it disrespectful to the feelings of the new States to deny this favor. He certainly, for one, meant no disrespect to the feelings of the new States, and yet he could not yield his assent to the proposition, for the reason which he had assigned. He was utterly opposed to a report going forth to the people, under the authority of the Senate, in favor of the measure. Such would be inevitably the case if the Senate proceeded further. If it was committed, a majority of the committee would be the friends of the measure; the report would be the report of that majority; it would go forth to the American people as the act of the Senate. The time has not yet arrived when any such proceeding would be or ought to be justified. The question involved is one affecting the interests of the whole people; and nothing would do more to prejudice the very measure in contemplation than to send forth, at a time like the present, a report, as the act of the Senate, calculated to forestall public opinion.

He must, therefore, oppose any further proceeding of the Senate upon this measure. He viewed it as calculated to embarrass the bill for which he had voted, and which had been so recently sent to the other House. He considered this measure uncalled for; as calculated to agitate the public mind in a way and manner prejudicial to the eventual success of any such measure; as standing in the way of all the public and private business now on the calendar; and as proposing to cede the property of the whole people, and that without their consent or knowledge, to particular States; and, in truth, from every view which he had taken of this subject, his mind had been brought to the conclusion that this movement was premature, replete with evil rather than good to the new States, and that it ought not to be at this time further discussed. He would, therefore, move to lay the bill on the table, and called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. H. afterwards withdrew his motion, at the request of Mr. BEXTON and Mr. TITTON.

Mr. NORVELL hoped that this bill would be permitted to take the usual course. It appeared to him that a measure involving so many important considerations was at least entitled to a reference and consideration by one of the standing committees.

Mr. WEBSTER rose and said, that in what he had to say on this subject he should be very brief, as it was to be disposed of that day. He had gone along with the Senator from South Carolina in opposition to the bill which had just passed the Senate, (the land bill,) and which he had hoped would not receive the sanction of this body. In this, however, he had been disappointed; for so far as the sense of the Senate was concerned, the bill would become a law.

But the leading motive, it would appear, which had induced the honorable Senator to present his bill at this time, was that the land bill had passed, however objectionable might be its provisions. With the general features of that bill, he (Mr. W.) had very great fault to find. The principal feature of the bill was nothing less than a clear, plain, palpable monopoly. It was a bill to confer a benefit upon the few at the expense of the many. The bill had not, as yet, become a law. Considering the small majority by which it passed, considering the reluctance with which many gentlemen voted for it, and considering that the feeling by which they were actuated would have more weight elsewhere, it was probable that the bill would not become a law. And if it should, it was to be in operation for a limited time only; and, if found not to meet the public judgment, Congress would be called upon to do something which would be better calculated to give general satisfaction.

With regard to the present proposition, he would say there were only one or two lights in which it could be viewed. The object was to cede the lands upon certain terms, and to divest the Government of all control over them. Now, he would ask, where was the power to make this grant? If we looked upon it as a cession for the benefit of the States in which the lands lie, if it was a gratuitous grant in any degree, where was the power obtained to authorize Congress to give away the public domain? Well, the answer to this question might be, that the proposition was not to make a gift of it, as certain returns were to be made to Congress by the new States. Now, by the constitution of the country, the trust, the management, the disposition of the public lands, was conferred on Congress; and he would ask, was it possible that any man could maintain the proposition that, as they were placed in their hands, as belonging to the whole people of the United States, they could transfer the general disposition of them?

It appeared to him that they might just as well entertain this proposition as one to farm out the custom-house in New York on certain terms. Nor did he know that Congress had any more authority to give away these lands than the proceeds of a custom-house on particular stipulations; nor could they surrender the control of it any more than they could assign to others the power of collecting the revenue of the custom-house in Boston, or elsewhere. He saw, therefore, objections insurmountable, whether they assumed the shape of a gratuitous cession or a trust. In either case, it transcended the power of Congress. What was the real duty of Congress? It was to make the public lands a common fund for the benefit of the whole people of the Union. The great object was to sell it gradually. And while it was in a state of ownership, he had always held that Congress might make it more valuable by the creation of roads, canals, and other improvements of that sort. He had felt no difficulty, therefore, in supporting grants to accomplish these objects, because it was a very efficient mode of increasing the value of the public domain.

The duty of the Government, as he had just remarked, was to dispose of it; but that must be done in the simplest and most unembarrassed form. And whatsoever embarrassed the title, whatsoever embarrassed the conditions, and whatsoever had a tendency to create dissension, in regard to the purchase of lands lying within the jurisdiction of the new States, should be cautiously avoided. Now, the Senate had heard much relative to the thralldom under which the new States were; of their being subjected to another legislation; of the condition of individuals who could not get a little act passed without coming to Congress. He wished to say that, so far as respects the equality of footing upon which the new States stood to the old, he saw no reason to impute inferiority. He maintained that nothing had been done by Congress which encroached on the sovereign power of the new States. The General Government exercised no legislation over the land lying in a State, except so far as that State had agreed to it. No power was now exercised by the Government over the new States which had not been exercised over the old.

And as to the proposition under consideration, supposing that Congress sold the public lands upon a long list of conditions, a long list of terms, how long would it be before the new States would come here, and ask for a modification of those terms? Did the gentleman expect, by any system of this kind, to accomplish perfect unanimity of feeling and harmony between the new and old States? He (Mr. W.) saw no difference of feeling on the subject existing between them; and if there was any difference, why, he thought it would show itself. Arguing against the practicability of ceding the lands, he observed that he did not mean to say that the time would not come when Congress should sell some of the residuary lands to a State; and when that time came, it must be a direct sale, in his opinion, and not a conveyance in trust. And he did verily believe that it would by no means promote the interests of the new States themselves to enter upon the career proposed; and he spoke it with great deference to honorable Senators who might be supposed to understand their own interests better than he could possibly do. He contended that it was the most exciting, embarrassing, and irritating thing that could be conceived for a new State—a small State, for instance, like Michigan—to be troubled with the management of a vast quantity of land.

He objected to the bill, not only on constitutional grounds, but those of expediency also. He entertained the opinion that any system of selling lands, and confining the sales to actual settlers, brought on mischief, an interference between the legislation of Congress and the States.

With respect to lands in the hands of the Government, there was no objection to a slow and reasonable graduation. He did not mean to say that all land must be of the same value. The lapse of time would raise its value. The principle of graduation he believed of no importance at all in the northwestern part of the country—for it might be said there was no land which could not shortly realize the value fixed by Congress.

As to the taxing power, he confessed that he had no objection that lands, the moment they should pass out of the hands of the Government, should be subject to taxation by the respective States in which they may lie.

Adverting to the land bill just passed, he remarked that nothing but the pre-emption clause saved it; and that the system of pre-emption, to a certain extent, had a tendency to demoralize a State. For his own part, he would rather, at once, than grant a prospective pre-emption, see a provision inserted in the bill, that whosoever shall take the character of a settler of any surveyed lands of the United States, shall be entitled to a donation of eighty acres of land. Congress had the power of making donations, and he would prefer seeing all the pre-emption rights turned into them; for making donations was far more reasonable, and had a greater tendency to produce moral habits and good order among society, than any pre-emption system that could be adopted.

The whole foundation of the present proposition was, that there was not sufficient impartiality and care exercised, on the part of the Government, in carrying on the land system. He, however, was not prepared to surrender it, under any idea that it could not be administered as it had been hitherto. He concluded by remarking that Congress had no more power to transfer a trust than to cede the public lands. He hoped that no further agitation would take place on the subject, the country being unprepared for it. Indeed, he knew the proposition would strike the people generally, as it did him, as sudden, unnecessary, and leading to a policy which neither Congress nor the constitution would authorize to be adopted.

Mr. SEVIER, in rising, had no idea of saying any thing in regard to the merits of the bill before them. He was not prepared to discuss this important subject then as it ought to be, and therefore should not attempt it; but he could not forbear expressing his astonishment that a proposition of this description, and one too in which nine of the sovereign States of this Union had so deep an interest, should not be deemed worthy of the ordinary reference to a committee. That proposition, said Mr. S., in which you, [referring to Mr. KING, of Alabama, President pro tem.] and I, sir, and every Western man, well know is so interesting to the section of country we represent, is to be summarily and unceremoniously disposed of, without a hearing; and his astonishment at this want of courtesy was somewhat heightened when he reflected that they had refused even to print the bill. What was in this bill? Mr. S. asked. Was there treason in it? If so, publish it and let us see it. Can you not give this bill to the public, to let them look at it, examine it for themselves, and judge of its contents. The people, said Mr. S., do not know what is in it, what we are driving at, nor what the measure is to lead to. Publish it, then; and if we are wrong, if our propositions are unconstitutional, or unjust, or inexpedient, let the people see the bill and find it out. We are a rational people, said Mr. S., and easy to be convinced by presenting the truth to us.

He knew how totally incompetent he was to combat with the Senator from Massachusetts on constitutional points, and therefore he should not attempt it; but as the gentleman had contended that Congress could not constitutionally pass this bill, he would read a clause of the constitution, to show that if Congress possessed any power at all, it was over the public lands. Mr. S. then read the following:

“Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property belonging to the United States.”

Could any thing be more plain than this clause? He knew that the Senator from Massachusetts construed the constitution very liberally, and therefore it was impossible for him to imagine how the gentleman could see any constitutional objections to this measure. The bill provided that the States should survey and sell these lands precisely as the United States now does. There was to be no change, either in the mode of surveying or selling the lands; but Congress would cease to be the local Legislature of the new States, and thus save a great deal of trouble, both to itself and them. The States would have too great an interest in the property ceded to them, not to manage it with care and prudence. They would graduate the price of the lands only when it ought to be done, and sell only in proportion to the demands of increasing wealth and population. Both these matters would be regulated by the public interest. He was glad to hear the Senator from Massachusetts repeat the doctrines advanced by him some years ago, on the subjects of graduation and encouragement to actual settlers; and he was so well pleased with the gentleman's remarks on those points, that he, for one, would vote to place him on the select committee, if such a one, as he hoped it would be, should be appointed to consider this bill, in order that he might have an opportunity of carrying out his doctrines. The gentleman said that he did not entertain any objections to the making of donations of lands for school purposes, or to a road or canal company. Now, where was the difference between making a donation to a canal company and making it to a State? In both cases it was a donation, and Congress possessed as much the right to make it in the one as the other. But he did not (Mr. S. said) intend to discuss this subject now; he only rose to express the hope that this bill might be referred to a committee, and reported on. When it came up, on its merits, he should be prepared to discuss it; at present, all he wanted was the reference and printing of the bill.

Mr. WALKER remarked, that while the Senator from Massachusetts was found on a former occasion advocating the right to present abolition petitions, and desirous of having an elaborate report in relation to them, he was found on this throwing every embarrassment in the way, to defeat the important interests, not only of eight or nine States, but of the whole confederacy. He [Mr. WEBSTER] asked Senators to pursue a course, in the present instance, more disrespectful than the one suggested in regard to the abolition petitions. He had said that if the public mind could be put right at all, it would be by the reports of committees. Now, he wished to see whether a majority of the Senate would concur in the opinion which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts had expressed. He wished to see whether they were prepared by their votes to say that Senators favorable to the proposition should not have the poor privilege of a reference to a committee, in order that they might have a report thereon.

Why should this proposition be treated in a different manner from any other? He had heard no reason for the adoption of such a course, and he thought that none could be given. The present Chief Magistrate himself, in 1832, had recommended a cession of the public lands to the new States. Were the people alarmed? Not at all. One of the ablest speeches ever delivered by the President elect was on this very subject, and he was favorable to a cession. And if we looked back to the debates of 1828, then some of the most distinguished sons of the South had warmly and ardently, although respectfully, advocated a cession of the lands. He could not think that the public mind would be alarmed at the measure. What was proposed in this bill? A sale, upon terms, of the lands within the States in which they are situated. It did not create a trustee; it was an absolute sale—a sale for a consideration.

The title must remain, after this bill passed, in the Government of the United States. But the bill contained a proposition making the cession upon payment; and he could not refrain from expressing his surprise and astonishment that the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] distinguished for his liberal and latitudinarian construction of the constitution, should make objections in reference to the terms of the bill. The Senator admitted that land might be sold to an individual on these terms; then, why not sell to a State? He admitted, too, that Congress could make a donation of eighty acres to a few individuals. On the same principle, they could make a donation of a million of acres to one or more persons. And yet, said the Senator, "you cannot sell the lands lying within their limits to the new States." He (Mr. W.) believed that that argument would be found to be untenable; and if there was a constitutional objection in the way, the gentleman from Massachusetts himself was the author of it. But the Senate had been told that alarming evils were to follow this measure; that Congress could dispose of the public lands in a much better manner.

Could the constituents of the Senator from Massachusetts, or those of any other Senator living as distant as he, at a distance of 2,000 miles from the new States, be apprized of what was best for the people of the West? They could not. Mr. W. argued that the new States ought to be put on the same footing as the old; and he contended, therefore, that the lands ought to be ceded to them. Was there any reason why, if it could be done, the new States should not have the power of legislating in regard to, and of purchasing, the public lands, as the old States have? He could see none.

With respect to the provisions of this bill, the Senator from Massachusetts had said that difficulties would arise between the new States and Congress, in respect to them; that the new States would prove faithless, and would violate the conditions. Mr. W. felt certain that they would do no such thing; for there was a clause in the bill revoking the grant, if any of the acts of cession should be violated. And not only were they revoked, but the title was rendered utterly null and void.

He next adverted to some of the consequences that would result, if the cession should take place. The time now spent by Congress in granting rights of preemption to individuals would be saved. That reason alone was a powerful one to induce the passage of the bill, without taking into consideration the enormous saving that would accrue to the Government by abolishing a great number of offices, which, under the new state of things, would be unnecessary.

If the cession could be made, (and he would not, so help him Heaven, vote for it unless it was just,) the most happy consequences would follow from it. The people of the new States were placed, from year to year, in the condition of medics; their Senators here were calling upon Congress to do justice to their constituents. Titles, instead of emanating from the local authorities, were obtained some thousands of miles off. Individuals had to come all the way to Washington, and remain here some time, and were put to a very heavy expense in so doing, in order merely to get their titles amended. As the sales of the lands increased, so would the difficulties also. It was, under every aspect in which the matter could be viewed, very natural that the people of the new States should wish to be put on the same footing as the old.

Mr. NILES, after a few remarks, observed that a proposition was made by the Senator from Mississippi, on the passage of the land bill, to change its title, and call it a bill to arrest the monopolies of the public lands. Now, he thought that with more reason this bill might be called a bill to monopolize the time of the Senate for the remainder of the session. Now, do gentlemen of the West (asked Mr. N.) think it reasonable that we should spend the short time of the session yet remaining (only seventeen working days) on the business of the public lands, when that same subject has already taken up six or seven weeks, almost to the exclusion of every thing else? Gentlemen surely ought to see how unreasonable this was, and to suffer this subject to lie on the table, and to proceed to something of more importance. It would seem from the remarks of some gentlemen that there was a crisis in our affairs, and that there was about to be a secession of the Western States, unless there was something done with regard to the public lands to meet their demands. What, then, he would ask, was there from that section of the country, which caused this measure to be so earnestly pressed on Congress? Were there any petitions or memorials, or had public meetings been called on the subject? Not so. This measure was the voluntary act of an individual member of the Senate, and one too who did not represent any one of the new States; and though it was loudly hailed by the Western members, nothing was presented from the people they represented to support it. He did not mean to call in question the motives of the gentleman who introduced the bill. His object was no doubt liberal and patriotic; but it appeared that he was so entirely opposed to the land bill which had just passed, and looked upon it as so mischievous in its tendency, that he brought forward the present measure, in order to divest the United States at once of an interest which, in his opinion, was so liable to abuse. The manner in which this subject was now pressed had caused him to look back to a period when Congress was operated on by an extraordinary pressure. He alluded to the time when the act in regard to the funding system was pending, and when the Eastern States threatened a secession unless it was adopted. The Eastern States carried their point, and from that time to this Congress had always acted under an irresistible pressure.

Mr. N. said that this was not a proper time to act on this subject; it was premature, and therefore inexpedient. If, said he, public sentiment exists in the new States, as it is represented to be, they will before long present the subject to the consideration of Congress; and when they did come forward and demand a hearing, far be it from him to deny it to them. He was willing to give them a full hearing, when they came forward of themselves; but he could not agree that it was proper in Congress to create public feeling. This was tried in 1834, when the panic season was brought on, and they had all seen the results. It was time for Congress to act, when public sentiment took the lead, but it never could be right for Congress to direct it. One great objection he had to this measure was, that the land bill just passed had not yet been tried. It was true it was but an experiment, but, having voted for one experiment, it seemed to him unreasonable to vote for another till that one is tried. He should therefore vote not only against the second reading of the bill, but against its reference.

Mr. ROBINSON did not see any direct connexion between the bill that had been passed and the one then before them. He voted for this land bill with more reluctance than he ever voted for any measure in his life, though it came from his friends. This bill, however, he looked upon in entirely a different light. It was not a temporary measure, like the land bill, but one in which the new States felt the deepest interest, and which promised them the most lasting benefits. We view it, said Mr. R., as a struggle in which money is the object on your part, and sovereignty and independence that on ours. Thus circumstanced, what, said he, do we ask? Only that this subject may be laid before the people of the United States, and not that it may be acted on at this session, but that it may be maturely considered and prepared for action on it at the next. Now, why did gentlemen object to these simple and reasonable propositions? Were they afraid of the truth? Let the report on this measure go to the people, and abide by their decision; but do not, said Mr. R. muzzle us, and prevent us from explaining what our object is, and how we propose to accomplish it. With regard to this bill, he was highly gratified that it should come from the quarter it did. We of the new States, said he, might propose such a measure, and make speech upon speech upon it, and year after year, without success; but coming, as this bill did, from a member from one of the old States, and therefore from a disinterested source, he indulged the most flattering hopes of its ultimate success. On the part of the new States, he begged leave to express his most heartfelt thanks to the gentleman who had brought forward this measure, promising them such important advantages. It was worthy of the occasion, and worthy of the man, and he was entitled to the lasting gratitude of the West.

Mr. SOUTHARD said that if the minds of Senators were made up on the subject, they were prepared to vote now as well as at any future period. It was not a new question; it had been agitated at former times; but it was a new question, so far as the opinions of Senators from the new States were to be regarded. He did not wish that the subject should be agitated now; and, in saying this, he did not mean any disrespect to the Senators from the new States. The Senate had been told that the people of the new States had asked a hearing. When did they? He was not aware of the fact, not having seen any paper in which they asked Congress to cede the public lands.

[Mr. WALKER. We have several memorials before the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SOUTHARD. It may be so; I was not aware of it.

Mr. WALKER. There are memorials from the Legislatures of Arkansas and Missouri, asking a cession of lands within their limits.]

Mr. SOUTHARD said he was under the impression that the prayer of the memorials would be found not to go to the extent of asking what the bill contemplated, but merely a special cession. Adverting to the provisions of the bill, he contended that Congress, having once ceded the lands, would not have the power of compelling the new States to fulfil the terms under which they received them. He argued that Congress did not possess the power to cede the lands, that it would be a violation of the grant by which they were bound to preserve the public domain for the benefit of the whole Union. He concluded by saying that he should vote against the second reading of the bill.

Mr. CALHOUN observed that one of the reasons assigned against reading the bill a second time was, that it would prevent agitation. The subject had already been agitated; and he, for one, so long as he should have a seat on that floor, would continue to agitate it, until public attention should be thoroughly aroused. He contended that this attempt to prevent the bill from being again read and referred would only cause the subject to be the more deeply agitated. The provisions and principles of the bill could not be so well tested as if sent to a committee, where they would be deliberately examined. They would then make a report on the bill, which would go out to the country, and the people would have an opportunity of forming a deliberate judgment respecting it, and the effect might be to convince the new States themselves that the measure was wrong; and if so, an early termination would be put to it. Then, why should this not be done? He felt a profound regret that Senators did not think fit to permit the bill to take the usual course. He had not risen for the purpose of advancing a new argument, but merely to reply to the constitutional objections of the Senator from Massachusetts. If it were necessary, he could at least present an argument ad hominem.

If Congress possessed the right to make donations to individuals of eighty acres of land, as was remarked by

SENATE.]

Cession of the Public Lands.

the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER,] had they not equally, on the same principle, the power to make donations of hundreds, or one hundred thousand? If there were any distinction, he (Mr. C.) was not able to see it. Congress had a right, as was said by the Senator from Massachusetts, to make donations to States for certain purposes. Now, if they could make a donation for any purpose—for a deaf and dumb asylum, for an infirmary, or for any purpose whatever—he would ask, why not make a gift of the public lands? He repeated, that if there were a distinction, he, for one, was incapable of perceiving it.

The Senator from Massachusetts had said Congress had no right to give up the trust delegated to them. The object of the bill was to make a sale, and not a trust. It was a series of conditions of sale, which were intended to be beneficial to the new States as well as to the old; and the question was, "Can you make a sale of the public lands?" Congress could dispose of lands to individuals: then, why not to a State? If they could make an absolute sale, could not they make a conditional sale? That was the simple question. If they could not, then all he could say was, that he did not understand the argument. He must say that if he ever did entertain any constitutional scruples on the subject, the Senator's argument had satisfied him that there were none. He knew that the gentleman was capable of presenting (if there were any) objections in the strongest possible light; but he had not succeeded in convincing him (Mr. C.) that there were any. But the Senator had said that the grounds upon which he (Mr. C.) had put his bill at this time was the passage of the land bill, objectionable as it was, and which he [Mr. WALKER] said might not yet become a law. Now, that was not so; he did not place the bill upon the naked fact of the land bill having passed this body. It was the character of the bill which had satisfied his mind that we had reached the time when something must be done on the subject. He would not characterize the bill, for he had already expressed his opinions on it. He asked whether every Senator opposed to the administration had not opposed the land bill? Did gentlemen not see there were political causes in operation? The time had arrived when the corrupt tendency of such bills should cease, which was controlling, to a certain extent, the action of Senators on that floor. These were the indications which induced him to introduce this bill.

But the Senator from Massachusetts said that what he (Mr. C.) proposed to effect could scarcely be effected by this measure, or rather that the evil did not exist; that the present condition of things did not affect the sovereignty of the new States, or that they are in a state of vassalage. He admitted that this was a strong term, and he had used it in the heat of debate. He begged gentlemen to look at the fact. Could any thing be more local than the territory of a State? And was there no small state of dependency in a people being obliged to come here from a distance of eight hundred or a thousand miles?

He would ask the Senator from Massachusetts, whether this was not giving the General Government an unreasonable control over the new States? Their officers were diffused every where, creating a state of dependence, which did not exist in the other States of the Union. People were obliged to come here, session after session, to get what they claimed to be just. If the control at present exercised by the General Government was not inconsistent with the sovereignty of a State, it was at least a derogation.

The Senator remarked that this bill would not stop agitation, and that the new States would come here before long, and ask that the conditions should be altered. He (Mr. C.) did not think it improbable that they would do that, but it would probably be eight or ten years first; and in the mean time our councils would be free from the control under which they at present suffered, and from political agitation, growing out of the discussion of questions connected with the public lands.

And if, at the end of that time, any of these conditions should be found burdensome, it would remain for those who might be here to apply the proper remedy. But the Senator argued that the bill would prove of no benefit to the new States; that they were small in population, and would be subject to agitation themselves, and might not fulfil the conditions of this bill. The bill, however, provided certain restrictions, which could not be overcome. Should any one of them be violated, the grant would be null and void. After some further remarks, in explanation and defence of the provisions of the bill, he concluded by an expression of his hope that Senators would permit it to be read a second time and referred; so that an opportunity would be given the country to examine and deliberate on the report which would be spread before it, in relation to this important measure.

Mr. TIPTON said the Legislature of Indiana had, in 1829, sent a memorial to Congress, for the purpose of obtaining a cession of the public lands, and claiming it as a right. Other memorials also had been sent on the same subject. The proposition, therefore, was not new. All the Senators of the new States felt a deep interest in it, and were desirous that it should be referred, and a report made upon it. Mr. T. had voted for the restrictive land bill with great reluctance. He preferred that the lands should be ceded to the new States for a fair consideration.

Mr. HUBBARD said he was aware of the memorial or resolution of the Indiana Legislature, to which the Senator had alluded. But that resolution was, that Indiana had a right to possess the public lands within her limits, without purchase. That doctrine, he said, did once prevail, but it was now set up by no one.

Mr. BENTON rose for the purpose of supporting what had been said by the Senator from Indiana. He thought, if gentlemen would look over the documents, they would find a dozen memorials in which both the principles of this bill were embraced—he meant graduation and the extinction of the federal title to the lands in the new States. Yes, he said, "extinction of the federal title," for he always spoke on this subject in the same sense as speaking of the extinction of an Indian title. He had, he believed, had more correspondence with the West than any other gentleman in the Senate; and, when writing on the subject, he always said that these two propositions (graduation and extinction of the federal title) had been thrown by the proposition to divide the proceeds of the land sales; and that they must first fight down and kill this distribution scheme before they could hope for success. He told his correspondents, also, that the greatest service that President Jackson ever rendered to his country was to put his foot—his large foot—on this proposition. He might say, further, that if he (Mr. B.) had ever rendered any service to the country at all, it was in helping to kill that bill; and it now lay prostrate, a corpse. That impediment being now removed, we can, said Mr. B., now begin again. I shall put my shoulders to the wheel, and keep pushing till we carry it through. He was for both the principles contained in this bill; and as to the details, when he was cordial about a principle, he never should balk at them; he would give and take. While up, he would express the hope that the subject might be referred to a select committee; and, having said this, he would say, further, that he had no expectation of accomplishing any thing at the present session.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that we were now less than three weeks from the close of the session, and it was impossible that within this period we could transact all the necessary public business; yet it was at such a moment that this measure was urged upon our consideration. It was an apple of discord thrown into this body, which must cause the waste of much precious time, and give birth to protracted and angry discussion, unless we should promptly resolve to relieve ourselves from it. One effect which it would most probably produce was the defeat of the land bill in the other House—a consideration which ought to have its weight, especially in the minds of Western Senators.

Mr. B. asked, what did this bill propose? Why, sir, an absolute gift to the new States of two thirds of all the proceeds of our public lands within their limits, whilst we retained but one third for ourselves. No such request had ever been made to Congress by any of these States, within his knowledge; certainly not during the past or present sessions of Congress. They had never asked for any thing so unreasonable and so unjust. The applications from Mississippi and Arkansas, which had been referred to in this debate, were altogether of a different character. He would venture to say that there was no new State in this Union which, if the question had been submitted to its own intrinsic sense of equity and justice, would have ever thought of making such a proposition to Congress as that contained in this bill. When these States shall come forward with any reasonable and well-digested plan of their own, asking for the cession of the public lands within their limits, upon fair terms, he should then be prepared to hear them most respectfully. There was no occasion to stimulate them to pursue this or any other course in which they felt their own interests were involved. We had abundant evidence that their Senators on this floor were both able and willing to enforce any just proposition proceeding from their constituents.

Senators ought to recollect that there would be two parties to any such arrangement. The people of the old States had and felt as deep an interest in this question as those of the new. If reasonable terms should be proposed, it was probable that the old States might consent to the adjustment of this difficult and embarrassing question, in such a manner as would give satisfaction to their brethren in the West. But, said Mr. B., let me tell gentlemen that I would almost as soon think of putting my hand into the pocket of one of my constituents, and taking from him two thirds of the money it contained, for the purpose of giving it away to a stranger, as I should agree to vote for this bill, in opposition to the wishes of those who sent me here. If any equitable arrangement of this question could be made between the parties interested, he should rejoice at such a result. For his own part, he felt disposed to grant liberal terms to the new States; but he should never consent to abandon the rights of his own constituents, in order to propitiate the people of the West, however much he might regard their good opinion. He would not, if he could, to use the language of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. ROBINSON,] become their Magnus Apollo upon any such terms.

What, then, did the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] ask us to do? To send this bill to a select committee. And for what purpose? Not that there shall be any final action upon it during the present session, because that was manifestly impossible, but to obtain a report in favor of its provisions. This report, containing a long, ingenious, and able argument, in favor of giving all the public lands to the new States, with the exception of one third of their gross proceeds, would be circulated far and wide throughout the whole Union. Whilst it would excite unfounded hopes in the minds of the people of the new States, it would produce an alarm equally groundless throughout the old States. It would have a tendency to exasperate the feelings of both parties, and might, and probably would, greatly retard, if not forever prevent, the adoption of any fair compromise on the subject. This report, we had a right to presume, would be altogether on one side, whilst the other would not be heard. It might prevent the new States from offering such terms as we of the old States could think of accepting. He should wait until the new States themselves thought proper to move in this business. They were not slow to act in any manner which they thought might promote their own welfare.

Mr. B. said he was now determined to ascertain whether the Senate would, at this session, spend any more of their precious time upon this subject. He should, therefore, renew the motion which had been made by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HUNBARD,] to lay the bill upon the table; and he gave notice, in advance, that he would not withdraw it on the request of any Senator whatsoever.

Mr. NORVELL trusted that the bill would be allowed to be read a second time, for reference. He believed that no bill of any kind, with perhaps one exception, had, for a long time, been refused a second reading and reference. That now before the Senate was of such deep importance, and involved interests of such magnitude, especially to the new States, that he thought its rejection at this stage of the proceeding would not only be unusual, but very extraordinary. He therefore expressed the hope that Senators would suffer the bill to be again read, and referred, either to the Land Committee or to a select committee, that it might be maturely considered and reported upon.

The question was then taken, and the bill was laid on the table: Yeas 26, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Crittenden, Dana, Ewing of Ohio, Hubbard, Kent, Knight, Niles, Page, Parker, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, Wright—26.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The Senate then proceeded to take up a bill making provision for the collection of materials and the purchase of sites for certain fortifications therein designated. [It appropriates about a million and a half of dollars to these objects.]

Mr. CRITTENDEN demanded further information in reference to the necessity of these works, the estimates upon which the appropriations were founded, and the total expense of completing the works for which this bill, appropriating a million and a half of dollars, proposed only to make preparation.

Mr. BENTON, chairman of the Military Committee, who had reported the bill, stated, in reply, that it was identically the same bill which had passed the Senate at the last session. The Senator was, therefore, in possession of full information in regard to it.

Mr. SOUTHARD opposed the bill in most of its features. It was a carrying out of the plan which had been laid down by General Bernard. And though the scheme of defence by fortifications proposed by that celebrated engineer might have been wisely adapted to the state of the country at that period, its condition had since been so greatly changed, by the increase of its population and the augmentation of its power, that many of the features of the plan were no longer necessary, and might advantageously be dispensed with. The improvements which had been made in the means for transportation of the munitions of war rendered it now a comparatively easy thing to concentrate large bodies of the militia at any point that might be threatened by a foe. And thus the necessity of many forts otherwise requisite was superseded. And forts, if not judiciously located, were not only of no valuable service, but, owing to the train of consequences they drew after them, were a positive evil.

Mr. S. had carefully examined the report of the Secretary of War on this subject, made to Congress at a preceding session, and he had then become satisfied that many of the proposed works were of this description. He wished to have further time to examine the bill; and therefore moved to lay it upon the table till Monday; but withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. BENTON, who briefly replied, stating that the estimates upon which the bill was founded had all been submitted and explained at the last session, after which the bill had passed the Senate. He admitted the facility with which large bodies of troops might be thrown into any city or town that was threatened by an enemy. But when they were there, though there should be half a million of them, of what avail would they be against a bombardment? A bomb charged with bushels of powder and balls could be discharged at the distance of 4,000 yards, and if it exploded in the midst of a squadron of horse or a column of troops, it would scatter or destroy them. A man-of-war would desire no better amusement, while its crew would remain in perfect safety from the force on shore. Forts were also necessary for the protection of merchant vessels, and even of our ships of war, when pursued by a greatly unequal force.

Mr. SOUTHARD now renewed his motion to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. BUCHANAN demanded the yeas and nays; which, being taken, were: Yeas 12, nays 26.

So the Senate refused to lay the bill on the table.

The bill being at its third reading, and the question being on its passage,

Mr. BENTON demanded the yeas and nays; which were taken, and stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Dana, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Walker, Wall, Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Moore, Prentiss, Robinson, Southard, Spence, Swift, Webster, White—12.

So the bill was passed.

MILITARY APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the Senate then took up the military appropriation bill, in which he proposed a slight amendment, to include an appropriation for the Tennessee volunteers, who were ordered into service, and then discharged.

As the bill was at its third reading, this motion could only be made by unanimous consent.

Mr. SOUTHARD said that he felt favorably disposed towards the amendment, but, wishing a little further time to look at it, suggested that the bill be laid on the table until Monday; to which

Mr. WRIGHT assenting, the bill was laid on the table accordingly.

The Senate then adjourned.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 13.

PATENT OFFICE.

On motion of Mr. RUGGLES, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill supplementary to the act for the improvement of the useful arts.

A variety of amendments, offered by Mr. RUGGLES, were all adopted, with the exception of the salary of the two examining clerks, which was made $1,500 instead of $1,700, as Mr. R. proposed.

Mr. KNIGHT moved to strike out the 4th section of the bill, which provides for restoring the most important models, which were all destroyed by the burning of the Post Office building.

Mr. RUGGLES remarked that it was only proposed to restore the most important models, and that the expense of doing so would be paid from the contributions of patentees.

Mr. NILES spoke at some length in favor of the motion.

Mr. WEBSTER remarked on the impossibility of the examining clerks, for whose appointment and support provision had just been made, performing properly the duties assigned them, of deciding on the justness of claims to patents, unless the most important portion of the models, all of which had been destroyed, should be restored. He regarded the appropriation as absolutely necessary.

Mr. KNIGHT suggested that all improvements of much importance were generally known, and that the fourth section, if not stricken out, ought therefore to be limited to the last fourteen years.

Mr. SEVIER moved to lay the bill on the table. Negatived.

Mr. RUGGLES further explained the bearing and importance of this section of the bill. It was designed, he said, to restore only 3,000 out of 7,000 or 8,000 models that were destroyed.

Mr. NILES suggested $20,000 instead of $100,000, which he considered as altogether too large a sum for the object proposed. He also insisted that the money would be paid out of the public Treasury.

Mr. BAYARD read portions of the report of the Commissioner of the Patent Office, stating that the restoration of about 3,000 of the models was due both to inventors and to science. A few minutes' inspection of them would often save years of reflection to an inventor, and would suggest what would in many cases be never originally suggested. As an example of this, Fulton's improvement in steamboats, immensely important as it is known to be, was based on inventions which had been abandoned, and were utterly useless. Such models were also absolutely necessary, to enable the examiners properly to perform the duties assigned them. Inventors were exceedingly tenacious in regard to the originality of their inventions, and would not yield without the most conclusive testimony. Mr. B. said such were the opinions of the Commissioner at the head of the bureau, which Mr. B. enforced by arguments, especially regarding the Patent Office as a school of science, and a regular history of the improvements in the useful arts in this country.

Mr. NILES remarked that many models, practically useless, might be useful as affording a history of the progress of inventions. But if an expenditure of this kind should be begun, it would have no end.

Mr. N. moved to strike out $100,000, and insert $20,000.

Mr. STRANGE, as a member of the committee, said the committee understood it to be the desire of the Senate that the Patent Office should be restored, as far as possible, to its original state. They had found on hand $300,000, derived from the sale of patents, and available for the great object contemplated by the establishment of the Patent Office. The $100,000 was not necessarily all to be expended, but was the extreme limit of the expenditures, though Mr. S. was satisfied that nearly so much would be required; and $20,000 he regarded as worse than nothing.

Mr. KNIGHT now rose to withdraw his motion to strike out the 4th section, but, as the yeas and nays had been ordered, the Chair decided that it could not be done.

The motion to strike out was then negatived, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Ewing of Illinois, King of Alabama, Knight, Moore, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Robinson, Sevier, Walker, White—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Brown, Clayton, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Norvell, Parker, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Ruggles, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, Wright—29.

Mr. PRENTISS, after some explanatory remarks, moved to strike out the word "assignees," in the 7th section. Negatived.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, without a division.

RECOGNITION OF TEXAS.

Mr. WALKER moved to take up the resolution offered by him some time since, recognising the independence of Texas; on which motion he demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. WRIGHT urged the taking up of the army appropriation bill.

Mr. BENTON strenuously urged and claimed as a right that the unfinished business should first be taken up. He had a bill for the increase of the army, which would regularly come up as the unfinished business. The vote to take it up now would, if rejected, be decisive of its fate. It had been early reported, but had been kept out of its place by the land bill and the regulating currency bill, and he claimed that it should now be considered.

Mr. WALKER pleaded for his Texas resolution, and insisted that the honor of the country demanded that it should be acted upon without delay.

Mr. BENTON objected, with some warmth, to Senators jumping up in this manner and interrupting the regular business of the House, as reported from standing committees, by interposing the consideration of resolutions of their own. The army bills were of great importance, and if this resolution should be taken up before them, the prolonged debate to which it would lead must effectually defeat all hope of having them considered in time to go to the other House.

Mr. PRESTON admitted the importance of the army bills, and should not object to their being considered; but this resolution on the subject of Texas had been offered a month ago, and, if longer postponed, must in all probability be lost.

The question was then taken on considering Mr. WALKER's resolution, and decided in the negative, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Clay, Fulton, Hendricks, King of Georgia, Moore, Mouton, Parker, Preston, Walker, White—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Wright—32.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of a bill "to increase the present military establishment of the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. BENTON, chairman of the Military Committee, took up the bill by sections, briefly explaining the purpose of each, together with the amendments reported from that committee.

No opposition was made to them, and they were all agreed to; when the bill was reported to the Senate, and ordered to its third reading.

The army appropriation bill was read a third time and passed.

ARMORY BILL.

The Senate having taken up the bill to establish a foundry, an armory in the West or Southwest, arsenals in the States in which none have yet been established, and depots for arms in certain States and Territories—

Mr. BENTON, chairman of the Military Committee, who had reported the bill, briefly explained its design, and the grounds on which it had been reported.

Mr. CRITTENDEN suggested doubts as to the propriety of establishing arsenals in all the States, though he admitted that they might be requisite in some. The States, however, were very competent to erect arsenals for themselves, and would not thank the General Government for any charitable establishment of this kind. Mr. C. reprobated such an unnecessary expenditure of the public money, and was against the extension of federal power, to which a measure of this kind must necessarily lead.

Mr. BENTON contended that it was a part of the theory of our Government that the nation should be armed; and, in order to this end, it was necessary both that the manufacture of arms should be extended, and that depots should be established for keeping them in all the States. He then read returns from the ordnance department, showing in what States arsenals had been erected, and in what States there were none; on which he remarked that those States which most needed arsenals were entirely destitute of them, while States far less exposed were well supplied.

No amendment being proposed to the bill, it was reported to the Senate; and the question being on its engrossment for a third reading—

Mr. CALHOUN observed that he had looked at the provisions of the bill, and that nothing in this world could be more useless than the expenditure it proposed. The country had already on hand about 800,000 stands of arms—an amount almost equal to that provided by Great Britain for her immense military establishment. The mere interest on such an investment was itself a heavy charge upon the Treasury; besides which, there was the liability to have the whole superseded by the invention of a better species of arms. The Government had already two large armories, capable of furnishing arms much faster than they were needed; and there was a necessity rather for retrenching than extending the means of supply. These arguments had all been urged at the last session; but he supposed it was vain to repeat them. They had not been answered, and could not be. But the money was to be expended on something, and perhaps it might as well be on this as on any thing else; The Government must get clear of it in some way; it must not go back to the States; and ways and means must be devised to expend it. The bill had no other object on the face of the earth. Mr. C. appealed to the majority of the Senate, entreating them to economize the public expenditure. He reminded them of the strong denunciations which had been poured on a previous administration for its alleged extravagance, and that it was on the plea and promise of economy that the present party had come into power. Yet no sooner had they got control of the Treasury, than they went on to expend beyond all previous example. The moral effect of this state of things had been most pernicious. It had led the nation to conclude that the professions of no party could be believed. They were not believed; and the result of this incredulity in the public mind would always tend to place in the hands of an existing administration a vast amount of power.

Mr. BENTON, in reply, read from the returns of the Treasury Department the sums paid for the manufacture of arms at private establishments, amounting to nearly a quarter of a million of dollars; and argued, from the fact of the Government applying to private manufactories for so large an amount of its arms, the necessity for another public armory. These private establishments existed at six different points, extending from the District of Columbia to the North and East, while on the frontier, to the South and West, where arms were most needed, there was not a single factory. All that portion of the Union had to look to the Northeast for their supplies; and when the guns were made, it cost half their value to transport them. As to having a full supply, and all we needed, it was what he could not understand. There was a continual consumption, and there was a constant increase of population, and therefore there was necessity for constant manufacture. The European Powers were continually manufacturing arms, nor would they ever cease to manufacture them. If the United States had to-day all they needed, and could keep every gun without rust or decay, twenty-five years hence we should have only half a supply; for the population then increased to that proportion. But instead of keeping every gun, one half of them would by that time be gone. It would not do to quote the example of Great Britain, because her policy was the reverse of ours. She only wanted enough arms in the hands of her standing army to shoot down her unarmed population the moment they resisted any measure of Government. She read the riot act, and then, if the people did not run, ten or twelve thousand of them were cut down. But the theory of our Government was that the nation was to be armed. We wanted no standing army to cut down our unarmed population. The efficiency of the Western militia was to be traced to the habit of handling arms in their youth. They did not run away from an enemy, because they felt the consciousness that they could shoot as well and better than any enemy that could be brought against them. They had not been trained with cornstalks, and set to handle a gun for the first time when they went into battle; and he would say, in behalf of Missouri, that the most acceptable form in which they could bestow on that State her portion of these accursed frogs which came up as from the river of Egypt, and spread themselves every where and over every thing, from the nuptial couch to the kneading trough, (he referred to the surplus balances in the Treasury,) was to establish amongst them an ample depot of arms.

Mr. CALHOUN was very happy to hear so frank an avowal from the Senator from Missouri of the truth of what he had observed when last up, that the object of the bill was to get rid of a part of the surplus revenue in the Treasury. As to the argument derived from the fact that the Government obtained a portion of its supply from private factories, all that was easily explained. These factories were old establishments, which had been gotten up by their proprietors expressly on the faith of the Government; and they were in practice as really public establishments as the armories of the Government. The Government had been obliged to take enough from these individuals to keep their establishments from ruin, and that was the sole reason for the item quoted by the Senator from the returns. The two armories we already possessed were capable of turning out 20,000 stands of arms a year; and now it was proposed to erect a third, while the actual consumption was but between one and two thousand stands annually. There was one source of consumption which could not be avoided; but, instead of being an argument for the manufacture, it was a strong argument against the unnecessary multiplication of arms; and that was, their decay while lying in boxes. The larger the amount on hand, the greater was this source of decay. The country had already between 700,000 and 800,000, which had cost it ten millions of dollars, besides a large amount of capital invested in magazines; so that the total annual interest was little, if any thing, short of a million of dollars. As to the arming of our people, this bill did not propose to put a single gun into the hands of a single man. But for what purpose was so large an amount needed? It must be either to arm the Government against the people, or to fight some foreign enemy. He trusted our people did not want them to cut each other's throats. He repeated that the expenditure was useless; that it went to produce an accumulation of what was already accumulated, and was merely a contrivance to keep the money from the States.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. BENTON and CALHOUN, each of them insisting on the ground already taken, and endeavoring further to strengthen their respective positions.

Mr. KNIGHT then addressed the Senate as follows: I shall vote against the bill; perhaps it may be necessary to suggest some of the reasons that govern me. I know the bill contains a proposition to build an arsenal in the State from whence I come; and, so far as that goes, I have no objection to that part of the bill, for the money it will cost it would be very acceptable to have expended there. But the question is, are the arsenals and armories contained in the bill necessary? If more arms are needed, is it necessary to build more armories? We can readily contract for the manufacture, without incurring the expense of all the outlays necessary for carrying on the making of arms; the private manufacturers will make them cheaper than the United States can. We get them now, it is believed, at a less price by contract from the private armories than they cost at our armories, without taking into consideration the immense outlays of the establishments, and the interest and cost of keeping them in repair. Sir, who are we to arm? The militia of the States, your own citizens. Then, let the arms be within their reach and under their own care. The practice now is to deliver to the several States the arms when made, and the States take care of them without further cost or trouble on the part of the United States; and, whenever needed, they are at the command of the Governor and Legislature of the State, to be used at their discretion. But if we build arsenals, we must have officers to take charge and care of them; and when the arms are required by any exigencies of the State, the Governor or commander must go to your corporal or sergeant, who may have charge of your arsenal, and beg him to loan those arms for the purposes needed. Now, sir, I am opposed to that; I will not place the States in such a predicament; I will give the States the arms, and if they will not take care of them, why, then I would not give them any more; therefore, I am for letting things remain as they now are, without further legislation.

The question being at length taken on the engrossment of the bill, it was decided, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White, Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, King of Georgia, Knight, Moore, Parker, Prentiss, Preston, Swift—11.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

TRADE WITH BELGIUM.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, moved that the Senate consider a bill from the

[SENATE.]

House, respecting the duties on Belgian vessels and their cargoes. The bill having been taken up,

Mr. BUCHANAN briefly explained its object. By the act of 1824, this Government had offered to all nations to receive their products in their own vessels on the same terms as they should receive our products in our vessels. Holland had refused these terms, and imposed a discriminating duty of ten per cent. in favor of their own vessels. We might, according to the principles of that act, have done the same, as a countervailing measure, in favor of our own navigation; but as, notwithstanding the duty of ten per cent., our own navigation continued to enjoy almost the whole of the trade between Holland and the United States, nothing further was done, and the vessels of Holland were allowed to enter our ports on the same terms with our own. This was before the separation of Belgium from Holland; but after that separation, on the vessels of Belgium presenting themselves for the first time in our ports, a discriminating duty was demanded of them, although none was demanded from Dutch ships. As this seemed a hardship, the present bill had been introduced, in order to put Belgian vessels on the same footing with those of Holland. A proviso, however, was inserted in the bill, empowering the President, whenever circumstances should, in his opinion, render it expedient, to enforce the act of 1824 against both Dutch and Belgian vessels.

Mr. CLAY further explained the case, confirming the statements made by Mr. BUCHANAN, of whom, however, he inquired whether information had been obtained by him as to the present proportion between Dutch and American navigation employed in the trade with Holland, as, in 1835, it appeared that the Dutch were rather gaining upon us.

Mr. BUCHANAN replied that he had not, but would make the inquiry at the Department, and have the facts ready by to-morrow.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and ordered to its third reading.

BURNING OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The Senate, on motion of Mr. GRUNDY, then took up the bill to alter and amend the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States.

The bill having been read,

Mr. BUCHANAN said it might be owing, perhaps, in part to his Pennsylvania principles, or prejudices, if gentlemen would have it so, but he could not consent to the infliction of the punishment of death for any crime but murder in the first degree; in which case, the Divine precept ordained that "whosoever sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." The insertion of a capital punishment often operated, practically, to produce the acquittal of offenders.

Mr. GRUNDY was aware that such opinions were entertained by many; but he could not subscribe to them. We punished treason capitally, which was a departure from this rule. He thought that the burning of the Capitol or of one of the Departments was an enormity so great that nothing short of death was a suitable punishment. It was calculated to strike a terror which nothing else would. A mere penitentiary punishment would have but little effect upon that class of miscreants who would be likely to commit such a crime.

Mr. PRENTISS suggested, as an amendment, the substitution of confinement at hard labor for a term not more than twenty nor less than five years.

Mr. BUCHANAN denied that the infliction of death for treason was a departure from the principle he had quoted; on the contrary, treason involved murder on a most extensive scale.

Mr. TIPTON opposed the amendment. It was possible some juries might acquit, from reluctance to inflict capital punishment; but he thought the evil would, on the whole, be greater if it should be omitted in the law. It was merited by the crime, and would terrify where lesser punishment would have little impression.

Mr. SWIFT suggested to his colleague [Mr. PRENTISS] to modify the amendment, so as to extend the punishment to confinement for life; but Mr. P. declined. When the question being put, the amendment was rejected, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Crittenden, Moore, Niles, Prentiss, Robinson, Swift, Walker—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Linn, Nicholas, Page, Parker, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wright—21.

Mr. BUCHANAN suggested a similar objection to punishing with death an accessory before the fact.

Mr. GRUNDY thought that, in a case like that of burning one of the Departments, the man who was the most deeply involved in guilt was not the individual who for hire actually set fire to the building, but those who employed him; and if the punishment of death should be commuted at all, it ought rather to be in favor of the actual incendiary, who might be an ignorant black, or a man tempted by poverty.

Mr. PARKER had voted to retain death in the bill, as a punishment to the incendiary; but he could not agree to extend it to accessories. The criminal law in all countries made a distinction in the grade of punishment. The principle was laid down by the best writers, and was founded both in justice and policy.

Mr. GRUNDY referred to the common law, as in many cases knowing no such distinction; nor was it recognised by the laws of most of the States of this Union.

Mr. BUCHANAN deprecated all reference to the common law of England, which was literally a code of blood. As many as four hundred different offences were punishable with death in England. He hoped never to see such a system taken as a precedent by this country.

The amendment was rejected, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Clayton, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Nicholas, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wright—17.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and the question being on its engrossment,

Mr. CLAYTON objected to the insertion of any limitation of time in reference to a crime of this magnitude. As murder, and treason, and arson, were exempted from the operation of the statute of limitations, the burning of public buildings of the United States ought to take the same course. He moved to amend the bill by inserting a clause to that effect; but it was rejected, as was also a motion of Mr. RUGGLES to strike out the second section, containing the limitation clauses; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Clayton, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Nicholas, Page, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Crittenden, Moore, Niles, Parker, Prentiss, Robinson, Southard, Walker—10.

The Senate then adjourned.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

On motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

SENATE.]

Burning of Public Buildings.

[FEB. 14, 1837.]

Mr. NORVELL moved to amend the bill by annexing a provision for the construction of certain roads in Michigan.

After debate, by Messrs. TIPTON, NORVELL, YON, HENDRICKS, PRESTON, and EWING of Ohio, the amendment was lost: Yeas 9, nays 27.

Mr. CLAY, after a few remarks in favor of only grading the road, and against hastening its progress by the appointment of an extra number of agents and officers, moved to strike out the second and third sections of the bill, which provide for such appointments.

After debate, by Messrs. HENDRICKS, CLAY, and TIPTON.

Mr. TIPTON moved to amend the second section by requiring that the appointment of agents and officers by the President should be made by and with the consent of the Senate; which amendment prevailed.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, moved to amend the second section by allowing each superintendent only two assistants, at a fixed compensation of three dollars per day for their services, instead of a salary in the discretion of the President or the Department. The amendments were adopted.

The question recurring on striking out the second and third sections of the bill, it was discussed by Messrs. PRESTON, HENDRICKS, and CLAY, and carried in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Cuthbert, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Lyon, McKean, Moore, Norvell, Parker, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tomlinson, Walker, White—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Hendricks, Hubbard, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, Wright—17.

Mr. CLAY moved to amend the bill by requiring that the road in Illinois should not be stoned or gravelled, unless at a cost not exceeding the average expense of doing it in Ohio and Indiana; which amendment, after debate by Messrs. EWING, of Illinois, and CLAY, was adopted.

Mr. PRESTON moved to amend the first section of the bill by reducing the appropriation for Indiana from $100,000 to $50,000, on the ground that $80,000 remained unexpended.

After debate, by Messrs. HENDRICKS, PRESTON, TIPTON, BENTON, WALKER, and CLAY,

Mr. NORVELL moved to lay the bill on the table; which motion was negatived, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Calhoun, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Lyon, Norvell, Parker, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, Strange, Walker, White—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Clay, Clayton, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, Wright—26.

The question on Mr. PRESTON's amendment was then tried, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Lyon, Niles, Norvell, Parker, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Walker, Wall, White—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wright—17.

Mr. PRESTON moved further to amend the bill by reducing the appropriation for Ohio from $290,000 to $90,000, the balance on hand being $100,000; which motion, after debate by Messrs. EWING of Ohio, PRESTON WALKER, ROBINSON, LINN, and NORVELL, was carried in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Lyon, Moore, Niles, Norvell, Parker, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Walker, Wall, White—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, Knight, Linn, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wright—19.

Mr. PRESTON also moved to amend the bill by reducing the appropriation for Illinois, so that the whole amount to be expended would be $130,000; which motion prevailed, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Lyon, Moore, Niles, Norvell, Parker, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Walker, Wall, White—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Hendricks, Hubbard, Knight, Linn, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wright—18.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the bill by adding, as a proviso to the first section, that no part of the money appropriated by the bill should be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, but out of the fund heretofore granted to Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, for the purpose of the bill.

After debate, by Messrs. WALKER, NILES, and CLAY, the amendment was lost, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Calhoun, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Lyon, Moore, Norvell, Parker, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Strange, Walker, Wall, White—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Linn, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wright—27.

Mr. NORVELL moved to amend the bill by striking out that portion of it which required the money to be repaid into the Treasury of the United States, from the fund granted to Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, by the United States.

After a few remarks from Mr. CLAY, disapproving the provision proposed to be stricken out, as deceptive, the motion to strike out was carried in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Lyon, Moore, Mouton, Norvell, Parker, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Southard, Strange, Walker, White—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Robinson, Sevier, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wright—16.

On motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, the provision in a former act, requiring a continuous construction of the road, was by this bill repealed.

The bill, with the amendments, was reported to the Senate.

Mr. EWING moved to amend the bill so as to appropriate $150,000 for Ohio, $125,000 for Indiana, and $100,000 for Illinois.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, and by consent, the message of the President received to-day, in relation to the seizure of slaves by the authorities of Bermuda, was, with the documents, ordered to be printed.

[SENATE.]

After a few remarks on Mr. EWING's amendment, by Messrs. BAYARD and PRESTON, The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 15.

BURNING OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The bill to alter and amend the act of 1790, for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, being taken up—

Mr. PRENTISS said he was so much opposed, in principle, to the provisions of the bill, the punishment imposed by it appeared to him to be of so sanguinary a character, so much behind the spirit of the age, that he felt constrained to resist it, and record his name against it in every stage of its progress. The bill not only inflicts the punishment of death upon any person who shall maliciously burn, or procure, command, counsel, or advise any one to burn, any public building, but it contains no limitation upon the prosecution of the offence; so that a person may be arraigned and tried at any distance of time, however remote, when he may be wholly unable, by lapse of time, to avail himself of the testimony necessary for his defence. It was to be further observed that the bill was not confined to the burning of the public offices, containing the public records, but extended to the burning of any public building, such as an engine-house, a wood-house, or even a watch-house.

The punishment, under the existing laws, was confinement to hard labor, and but one instance of the commission of the offence had occurred in half a century. We were now about to change the law, and substitute the punishment of death for confinement at hard labor; and we were doing this at a time when England and many other Governments in Europe were engaged in reforming and ameliorating their criminal code. The bill put the offence on the same grade with murder and treason, the highest crimes known to law.

The object of punishment was the prevention of crime; and all experience showed that the certainty of punishment was much more effectual than the severity of punishment in the prevention of crime. The burning of a public building was undoubtedly a very high offence, but it was well known that the difficulty of conviction was always increased in proportion as the punishment was aggravated. If there was absolute certainty in human testimony, the objection to the bill might not be so strong; but the reverse was true, for the history of criminal trials showed that many innocent persons had been convicted and executed. Mr. P. was opposed to the bill on the great principles of justice and humanity; he was opposed to it as destroying all just distinctions between crimes, as inflicting a punishment vastly disproportionate to the offence, and altogether inconsistent with the general spirit of our criminal code; and he felt compelled to ask for the yeas and nays.

The bill was then passed, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Clay, Clayton, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Page, Preston, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wright—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Hendricks, Kent, McKean, Moore, Niles, Parker, Prentiss, Rives, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Walker, Wall, Webster—17.

TRADE WITH BELGIUM.

The bill respecting the discriminating duties on Dutch and Belgian vessels and their cargoes coming up on its passage—

Mr. BUCHANAN said that, when this bill was before the Senate yesterday, he had promised to ascertain from the Department the comparative state of the Dutch and American tonnage, as employed in the Holland trade during the past year. He had done so; and it appeared from the result that the amount of Dutch tonnage was increasing rapidly on the American. He did not know whether this was owing to the discriminating duty imposed by the Dutch Government in favor of their own vessels in Dutch ports, or not; but if such was the fact, then the provisions of the act of 1824 should be promptly applied by the Executive. Mr. B. then read the following statement:

In the year 1834, the amount of American tonnage in this trade was (in round numbers) 17,000 tons.

In 1835, " " " 15,000

In 1836, " " " 8,500

while the amounts of Dutch tonnage, on the contrary, had proportionably diminished.

In 1834, the Dutch tonnage was 1,651 tons.

In 1836, " " " 5,401

Mr. CLAY said that, when we saw, for three successive years, a regular diminution of American tonnage, and a regular increase of the competing foreign tonnage, there could be no doubt that both results proceeded from a common cause. The act of 1824 proceeded on the principle of entire and perfect reciprocity. That principle had been departed from by the Government of Holland, while Belgium was in union with Holland. There was much reason to believe that the present relative condition of the navigation of America and of Holland was the result of that departure. Under those circumstances, it seemed that, though the Senate could not well refuse to pass the present bill, which did nothing but put Holland and Belgium on the same footing, the Executive was bound to enforce the provisions of the act of 1824 to both Governments. He trusted this would be done.

Mr. DAVIS, who had not been present when the bill was introduced, was desirous that the bill should lie over for one day, in order that he might have an opportunity to look a little into the returns stating the existing condition of the trade, with a view of judging of the true cause of the present state of things. Possibly this act might be construed as an evidence that this Government was prepared to extend the relaxation of the provisions of the act of 1824, though he was very sure the Senator who introduced the bill had no such intention.

Mr. BUCHANAN concurred in the views expressed by the Senator from Kentucky, and explained that the proviso in this bill had been introduced with an express view to enable the President to apply the provisions of the act of 1824 to both Holland and Belgium.

Mr. CUTHBERT contended that the true standard by which to judge of the existing indulgence to Holland was not the immediate effect of it on the comparative navigation of the two countries, but its effect as an example and a precedent, which was likely to induce other nations to pursue the same course which had been adopted by the Dutch Government.

The question was then taken, and the bill was passed.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The Senate proceeded to the further consideration of the bill to continue the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

*On motion of Mr. CLAY, the appropriations were so amended as to allow Ohio $190,000 in addition to the unexpended balance, Indiana $100,000, and Illinois $100,000; making an aggregate of $390,000, besides unexpended balances.

The remaining amendments, made as in Committee of the Whole, were severally considered, and, after a renewal of the former discussions, were adopted in Senate.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the bill was further amended by adding a proviso to the end of the first section, requiring that the construction of the road should be let out, in suitable sections, after due notice, to the lowest bidders.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the third section of the bill by inserting a disclaimer of the faith of Government being pledged by this bill to do any thing further in the construction or repair of the Cumberland road.

After debate, the amendment was lost, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Calhoun, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Lyon, Moore, Norvell, Page, Parker, Preston, Rives, Strange, Walker, Wall, White—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Linn, Morris, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wright—23.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, by yeas and nays, on the call of Mr. NORVELL, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Calhoun, Clayton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Lyon, Moore, Norvell, Parker, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Strange, Walker, Wall, White—18.

PAY OF VOLUNTEERS.

On motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill to make compensation to the Kentucky and Tennessee volunteers, who were discharged without being called into service.

Mr. BENTON moved to amend the bill by allowing the above volunteers one month's pay.

Mr. WHITE moved to amend this amendment by striking out one month, and inserting three months.

After debate, by Messrs. PRESTON, CRITTENDEN, GRUNDY, WHITE, and WRIGHT, Mr. WHITE'S amendment was tried and lost.

The amendment of Mr. BENTON, allowing one month's pay, was then carried, without a division.

On motions of Messrs. MOORE and WALKER, the names of Alabama and Mississippi were annexed to those of Kentucky and Tennessee in the bill.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved further to amend the bill by confining the compensation to those volunteers whose services were accepted. Carried: Ayes 18, noes 10.

The bill, with the amendments, was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 16.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

The bill to increase the military establishment of the United States being at its third reading, and the question being on its passage—

Mr. SOUTHARD demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered by the Senate.

Mr. CALHOUN addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the bill, not, however, as he said, with the least hope of preventing its passage; there was money in the Treasury, and it must be spent; and this he knew would prove, with many gentlemen, a reason why the bill must pass. Yet, bearing a certain relation to this branch of our establishment, he felt called upon to say a few words, and they should be very few. He could not assent to the bill. The object it proposed was useless, and a good deal more than useless. The bill proposed to increase our existing military establishment, as a peace establishment, too, by the addition of 5,500 men, making the aggregate amount of the army over 12,000 men, and augmenting the expense of its maintenance by a million and a half or two millions of dollars. Was this necessary? He contended that it was not, and that there never was a time when there was so little necessity for a measure of this character. Abroad we were at peace with all the world; and as to Mexico, he believed no gentleman seriously contemplated that we were to go to war with her. Never had there been a time when so little force was necessary to put our Indian relations upon the safest footing. Our Indian frontier had, within a few years, been contracted to one half its former dimensions. It had formerly reached from Detroit all the way round to the mouth of the St. Mary's, in Georgia; whereas, at present, its utmost extent was from St. Peter's to the Red river. To guard this frontier, the Government had nine regiments of artillery, seven of infantry, and two of dragoons. He would submit to every one to say whether such a line could not be amply defended by such a force. Supposing one regiment to be stationed at St. Louis, and another at Baton Rouge, there still remained seven regiments to be extended from St. Peter's to Red river. Supposing one of them to be stationed at St. Peter's, one upon the Missouri, one in Arkansas, and one upon the Red river, there were still three left at the disposal of the Government. He contended that this force was not only sufficient, but ample. He should be told that there was a very large Indian force upon this frontier. That was very true. But the larger that force was, the more secure did it render our position; provided the Government appointed among them faithful Indian agents, who enjoyed their confidence, and who would be sustained by the Government in measures for their benefit. Of what did this vast Indian force consist? In the first place, there were the Choctaws, who had removed beyond the Mississippi with their own consent; a people always friendly to this Government, and whose boast it was that they had never shed, in a hostile manner, one drop of the white man's blood. Their friendship was moreover secured by heavy annuities, which must at once be forfeited by any hostile movement. Whenever this was the case, the Government possessed complete control, by the strong consideration of interest. Next came the friendly Creeks, who had all gone voluntarily to the west bank of the river. Then came the friendly Cherokees, who had done the same thing; and next the Chickasaws, whom we also held by heavy annuities. All this vast body of Indians were friendly toward the United States, save a little branch of the Creeks; and it would be easy for any prudent administration, by selecting proper agents, and sustaining them in wise measures, to keep the whole of these people peaceable and in friendship with this Government, and they would prove an effectual barrier against the incursions of the wild Indians in the prairies beyond. But to increase largely our military force would be the most certain means of provoking a war, especially if improper agents were sent among them—political partisans and selfish land speculators. Men of this cast would be the more bold in their measures, the more troops were ready to sustain them; every body knew that Indian force, when fairly opposed to white in the field, was as nothing. Where there were no swamps and fastnesses, but they had to contend in the open field, they were not more formidable than buffalo. Now, they were congregated in a high, dry, prairie country, and in a country of that description, opposed to horse or artillery, they could do nothing.

Mr. C. then proceeded to denounce the bill as a measure of extravagance, designed chiefly to expend the money in the Treasury for objects not only unnecessary but pernicious. He went into some general observations on the corrupting tendency of the present course of policy, and then observed that every change that had been made in the army had gone to destroy its morale. He had not the least confidence that the proper matériel would be selected in the bestowment of the many prizes which this bill proposed to create. All must remember what had been the history of the regiment of dragoons in this respect. Who had been appointed to command in that corps? In many instances cadets who had been discharged for misconduct in the Military Academy. Persons of this cast had been set over those who had gone through the whole course in that institution in a manner most highly creditable. The effect had been demoralizing, and he feared that the results of this bill would prove still more so. Mr. C. then proceeded in a course of general objection to all measures calculated to increase the powers of the General Government; dwelt on the central tendency of our system; the necessity of diminishing and generalizing the action of this Government, as our population increased. He compared the Government to a partnership. While there were but few partners, the regulations might be minute and particular; but when they were numerous, and amounted to hundreds, the system must be more general.

Our chief arm of defence was the navy. This was exterior in its character, and less dangerous on the ground of patronage; and it would be his policy to increase this arm of the national force, and to render it respectable in the eyes of foreign nations. Then, this Government needed a sound Judiciary and a well-regulated Post Office; and beyond this he would not advance one inch. He concluded by remarks of a general character on the state of the Treasury, and the determination to expend the surplus, that it might not be returned to the people.

MR. BENTON replied to the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] and congratulated himself on the easy task which he had to perform in answering all his objections to this bill; for he had nothing to do but to bring the gentleman who was Secretary at War under Mr. Monroe's administration, to answer the gentleman who was now Senator in Congress from the State of South Carolina. The quondam Secretary would answer the Senator most completely; and to enable the Senate to make the full application of what he should read, he would first remind them of the circumstances under which the former Secretary at War had made the report, which was now to be produced as an answer to the Senator's speech.

It would be remembered, (said Mr. B.,) that at the close of the late war with Great Britain, the war establishment of the army was reduced to a peace establishment, and that this peace establishment was still further reduced in 1821, when the Treasury, from a dream of inexhaustible surplus revenue in which it had been indulging for a few years, was suddenly waked up to the reality of empty coffers, unavailable funds, and unreliable resources. The aggregate of the peace establishment of 1815 was 12,656. In the year 1818 it was proposed in Congress to reduce that number; and to enable members to act with full information on the subject, the Secretary of War, then happening to be the present Senator from South Carolina now objecting to this bill, was called upon to report whether, with safety to the public service, any reduction could be made, either in the rank and file of the army, or in the general staff, or in the expense of the establishment itself. The Secretary answered upon all three points; and it so happens that he has spoken to the same three points this day. He has objected to this bill because it increases the rank and file, because it increases the general staff, and because it increases the expense of the army. It also further so happens that his report and his speech are not only on the same subject, but actually on the same measure! for the peace establishment of 1815 was authorized by a law which retained a force of 12,656 men; and this bill is to raise the present force of the army to about 12,500. The two establishments, then, are practically the same; the object of the present bill is to revive the establishment of 1815, with some diminution in the general staff, but, as establishments, they may be considered as the same. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] opposes the present increase, and opposes it in all its branches—rank and file, general staff, and expense; and he opposes it upon all the grounds which can be assumed against a standing army in time of peace—unnecessary, unwise, dangerous, contrary to republican maxims, only tending to expend public money without public advantage, alarmingly increasing the patronage of the Government, multiplying the sources of corruption, and endangering all that is dear in the eyes of the patriot, the sage, and the statesman, and preventing a distribution of the surplus. Very good, (said Mr. B.) Fine charges, these, against the 12,500 men proposed to be re-established by this bill! Let us see how they will be answered in a report in defence of the same establishment, when in fact they were 12,656; and when the population of the country was only half what it now is, and its frontier much less; for Florida was not then acquired.

Mr. B. then read:

"In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, passed the 17th of April last, (1818,) directing the Secretary of War to 'report, at an early period of the next session of Congress, whether any, and, if any, what reduction may be made in the military peace establishment of the United States with safety to the public service,' &c., I have the honor to submit the following report:

"Pursuing the subject in the order in which it has been stated, the first question which offers itself for consideration is, whether our military establishment can be reduced with safety to the public service, or can its expenditures be with propriety reduced, by reducing the army itself.

"The military establishments of 1802 and 1808 have been admitted, almost universally, to be sufficiently small. The latter, it is true, received an enlargement from the uncertain state of our foreign relations at that time; but the former was established at a period of profound quiet, (the commencement of Mr. Jefferson's administration,) and was professedly reduced, with a view to economy, to the smallest number then supposed to be consistent with the public safety. Assuming these as a standard, and comparing the present establishment with them, and taking into comparison the increase of the country, a satisfactory opinion may be formed on a subject which might otherwise admit of a great diversity of opinion. * * * Our military peace establishment is limited, by the act of 1815, passed at the termination of the late war, at 10,000 men. The corps of engineers and of ordnance, by that and a subsequent act, were retained as they then existed; and the President was directed to constitute the establishment of such portions of artillery, infantry, and riflemen, as he might judge proper. The general orders of the 17th of May, 1815, fix the artillery at 3,200; the light artillery at 660; the infantry 5,440; and the rifle 660 privates and matrosses. Document A exhibits a statement of the military establishment, including the general staff, as at present organized; and B exhibits a similar view of those of 1802 and 1808; by a reference to which it will appear that our military establishments, at the respective periods, taken in the order of their dates, present an aggregate of 3,323, 9,996, and 12,656. It is obvious that the establishment of 1808, compared with the then population and wealth of the country, the number and extent of military posts, is larger in proportion than the present; but the unsettled state of our relations with France and England at that period renders the comparison not entirely just. Passing, then, that of 1808, let us compare the establishment of 1802 with the present. To form a correct comparison, it will be necessary to compare the capacity and necessities of the country then with those of the present time. Since that period our population has nearly doubled, and our wealth more than doubled. We have added Louisiana to our possessions, and with it a great extent of frontier, both maritime and inland. With the extension of our frontier, and the increase of our commercial cities, our military posts and fortifications have been greatly multiplied.

* * If, then, the military establishment of 1802 be assumed to be as small as was then consistent with the safety of the country, our present establishment, when we take into the comparison the prodigious increase of wealth, population, extent of territory, number and distance of military posts, cannot be pronounced extravagant; but, on the contrary, after a fair and full comparison, that of the former period must, in proportion to the necessities and capacity of the country, be admitted to be quite as large as the present; and, on the assumption that the establishment of 1802 was as small as the public safety would then admit, a reduction of the expense of our present establishment cannot be made, with safety to the public service, by reducing the army. In coming to this conclusion, I have not overlooked the maxim that a large standing army is dangerous to the liberty of the country, and that our ultimate reliance for defence ought to be on the militia. * * To consider the present army as dangerous to our liberty partakes, it is conceived, more of timidity than wisdom.

* * * "The staff, as organized by the act of the last session, combines simplicity with efficiency, and is considered to be superior to that of the periods to which I have reference. In estimating the expenses of the army, and particularly that of the staff, the two most expensive branches of it (the engineer and ordnance departments) ought not fairly to be included. Their duties are connected with the permanent preparation and defence of the country, and have so little reference to the existing military establishment, that if the army were reduced to a single regiment, no reduction could safely be made in either of them. To form a correct estimate of the duties of the other branches of the staff, and consequently the number of officers required, we must take into consideration not only the number of the troops, and, consequently, the number of officers required, but, what is equally essential, the number of posts and extent of country which they occupy. Were our military establishment reduced one half, it is obvious that, if the same posts continued to be occupied which now are, the same number of officers in the quartermaster's, commissary's, paymaster's, medical, and adjutant and inspector general's departments would be required.

"To compare, then, as it is sometimes done, our staff with those of European armies assembled in large bodies, is manifestly unfair. The act of the last session, it is believed, has made all the reduction which ought to be attempted. It has rendered the staff efficient, without making it expensive. Such a staff is not only indispensable to the efficiency of the army, but is also necessary to a proper economy of its disbursements; and should an attempt be made at retrenchment, by reducing the present number, it would, in its consequences, probably prove wasteful and extravagant.

"In fact, no part of our military organization requires more attention in peace than the general staff. It is in every service invariably the last in attaining perfection; and, if neglected in peace, when there is leisure, it will be impossible, in the midst of the hurry and bustle of war, to bring it to perfection. It is in peace that it should receive a perfect organization, and that the officers should be trained to method and punctuality; so that, at the commencement of a war, instead of creating anew, nothing more should be necessary than to give to it the necessary enlargement. In this country, particularly, the staff cannot be neglected with impunity. Difficult as its operations are in actual service every where, it has here to encounter great and peculiar impediments, from the extent of the country, the badness and frequently the want of roads, and the sudden and unexpected calls which are often made on the militia. If it could be shown that the staff, in its present extent, was not necessary in peace, it would, with the view taken, be unwise to lop off any of its branches which would be necessary in actual service. With a defective staff, we must carry on our military operations under great disadvantages, and be exposed, particularly at the commencement of a war, to great losses, embarrassments, and disasters.

* * "The next question which presents itself for consideration is, can the expenses of our military establishment be reduced without injury to the public service, by reducing the pay and emoluments of the officers and soldiers? There is no class in the community whose compensation has advanced less, since the termination of the war of the Revolution, than that of the officers and soldiers of our army. While money has depreciated more rapidly than at any other period, and the price of all the necessities of life has advanced proportionably, their compensation has remained nearly stationary. The effects are severely felt by the subaltern officers. It requires the most rigid economy for them to subsist on their pay and emoluments. Documents marked F and G exhibit the pay and subsistence during the Revolution and as at present established; and document marked H exhibits the allowance of clothing, fuel, forage, transportation, quarters, waiters, stationery, and straw, at the termination of the revolutionary war, and in 1802, 1815, and 1818. By a reference to those documents it will be seen that, under most of the heads, the variations of the different periods have been very small, and that, on a comparison of the whole, the pay of an officer is not near equal now (if allowance is made for the depreciation of money) to what it was during the Revolution. I will abstain from further remarks, as it must be obvious, from these statements, that the expense of our military establishment cannot be materially reduced without injury to the public service, by reducing the pay and emoluments of the officers and soldiers."

Having read these extracts from the report of the then Secretary at War, and now Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] Mr. B. said that every word of it applied with double force in favor of the bill which that Senator was now opposing. Every reason which he gave against reducing the military establishment in 1818 applies with double force in favor of raising it now to what it was then. That report was then sanctioned by Congress. It prevented the reduction of the army. Not a man was reduced at that time, nor for three years afterwards, nor until the exhausted state of the Treasury compelled reductions of expense at all practicable points, and included the army in the objects on which retrenchment fell. The report prevented the reduction in 1818; the emptiness of the Treasury caused the reduction in 1821; and now, when the Treasury is full again, and when the wants of the service are so urgent for an increased force, and when experience has proved the "mischiefs resulting from the reduction, surely the sound arguments in the report ought to have their full weight in re-establishing the military force at what it then was. Mr. B. said that he had not read this report for the purpose of showing inconsistency in the Senator from South Carolina; that would be a small business for him to engage in, and a business which he had never followed. He had read it for the sound arguments which it contained, and in answer to the unsound arguments, as he conceived them to be, which the author of the report, in his present capacity of Senator, had used against the bill now depending, to raise the strength of the army to what it then was. He had read it for the argument; and if a show of inconsistency resulted, it was an incident, and not an object, of the reading. He repeated, he had read it for the argument; and must be permitted to insist that what was a good argument against reducing the army below 12,656 in 1818, was a far better argument in favor of raising it to about 12,000 now. The reasons were far stronger in favor of that number now than then. In the first place, the extent of our frontier line is greatly increased since that time. Florida has been since acquired, and has given a great extent of frontier; for, being a peninsula in one part, and stretching along the Gulf and Atlantic coast on two sides, it is all frontier, and susceptible only of a thin population, and requires more defence than any other of equal extent, either in our own country or any country upon the globe. With Florida came the islands Key West, the Dry Tortugas, and others, all requiring forts and garrisons. In the next place, the number of our fortifications and military posts has greatly increased since 1818, and requires an increased force to man them. In the third place, the whole Indian population of the United States are now accumulated on the weakest frontier of the Union—the Western, and Southwestern, and Northwestern frontier—and they are not only accumulated there, but sent there smarting with the lash of recent chastisement, burning with revenge for recent defeats, completely armed by the United States, and placed in communication with the wild Indians of the West, the numerous and fierce tribes towards Mexico, the Rocky Mountains, and the Northwest, who have never felt our arms, and who will be ready to join in any inroad upon our frontiers. In the fourth place, experience has shown that the present army is too small—that the then Secretary at War was right in 1818, in saying that it could not be reduced with safety to the country. The Secretary of 1818 was right in this opinion. The country has suffered vastly from it; it has suffered in lives, property, and money. The Black Hawk war, which cost three millions of money, many lives, and the breaking up of the Illinois frontier, took place because the force on the upper Mississippi was too small to command the respect of the Indians. The Florida war, which has cost seven millions of money, occasioned the loss of so many lives, and the devastation of four counties, would never have taken place if an adequate force had been in that quarter. The massacre of families, and the devastation of farms and plantations, which took place in Georgia and Alabama last summer, were the fruit of our small military establishment. Mr. B. did not undertake to say that the Indians, in all these instances, did not believe that they had some grievances to complain of, and for which they were entitled to redress; but what he did mean to say was this: that if we had possessed a military force to have been respected by them, they would have left the redress of these grievances to the Government of the United States, as they ought to have done, instead of taking vengeance into their own hands, and executing it, not upon those of whom they complained, but against innocent persons—against the women and children even, who could do them no wrong. In the fifth place, Mr. B. said the country was twice as populous and twice as wealthy now as it was in 1818, and therefore required a larger military establishment now than then. For these reasons, Mr. B. insisted that the report from which he had read was far stronger in favor of raising the military establishment to about 12,000 now, than it was against reducing it below that number at the time it was made. Add to this the pertinent remark, so often made by the then Secretary of War in the report of 1818, that 12,000 men was less—the increase of territory, wealth, and population, considered—than the peace establishment of Mr. Jefferson was in 1802. An establishment now, in proportion to that, would exceed 20,000 men.

Mr. B. having shown how cogently the report of 1818 applied in favor of raising the strength of the army to the number proposed in the bill, would also show that it was equally cogent in favor of raising the general staff. He remarked that the reduction of 1821 fell upon two branches of the establishment—upon the rank and file and on the general staff. Begging the Senate to recollect and well to consider all that was said in the report of 1818 in favor of keeping up a numerous and efficient staff, and the opinion so fully and elaborately given that the staff of that period was as small in number as the public service would permit, Mr. B. would first state, in general, and then show in detail, that the general staff, as proposed to be increased in this bill, was still considerably below that of 1818; and, consequently, that the objections to reduction, made at that time, applied with infinitely more force in favor of augmentation now. The general staff was reduced almost to nothing in 1821; it was almost abolished; and the consequence has been an immense injury to the public service. It is now proposed to raise it, but not to raise it so high as it was before the reduction; and to this augmentation the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] vehemently objects. Without reading over again that part of his report of 1818 which applied to this branch of the reduction, Mr. B. would show that the augmentation now proposed was far below that which he then so elaborately eulogized, so completely demonstrated to be necessary, and so triumphantly rescued from reduction or diminution.

Mr. B. then proceeded to show, in detail, that the general staff was greater in 1818 than it was proposed to be made by the pending bill. Beginning with the adjutant general's and inspector general's departments, he said that they consisted of thirteen officers in 1818, of three now, and that this proposed to add eight, making eleven. The quartermaster general's department consisted of nineteen officers in 1818, of five now, and the bill proposed to add twelve, making in the whole seventeen. The engineers proper, and the topographical engineers, Mr. B. said, were nominally increased, but in reality not; for the act of 1824, which allowed the President to employ an unlimited number of civil engineers, and under which a great number were constantly employed, was to be repealed by a section of this bill, so that the discontinuance of those now employed under that act would be equal, or superior, to the contemplated additions. In the ordnance department, Mr. B. said there were forty-four officers in 1818, but fourteen now, and only twenty-two were proposed to be added, making in the whole thirty-six, and being eight less than in 1818. Mr. B. had gone over this comparative state of numbers, both in the line and in the general staff, for the purpose of showing to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] that the aggregate of the army would be no greater under this bill than it was in 1818, when he so nobly and efficiently defended it, and that the general staff would still be less than it was at that time, and when he so well argued, as subsequent events had proved, that it could not be reduced without inflicting injury upon the public service. This, he thought, ought to be a sufficient answer to that Senator's present objections. If they were not, and if the Secretary at War under Mr. Monroe's administration was not able to contend successfully with the present Senator from South Carolina, he would introduce into this debate another gentleman, and claim the right of his opinions in aid of the quondam Secretary; it was a gentleman who was a Representative in Congress from the State of South Carolina during the late war, and for a year or two after it; and who, at the close of the war, was in favor of the military peace establishment of twenty thousand men recommended by Mr. Monroe, and of the fifteen thousand voted by the Senate, and who then repelled, rebuked, and scouted in terms of indignation, such doctrines as the Senator from South Carolina has this day held. This is an extract from one of the speeches on this subject which that gentleman then made:

"As a proof, said Mr. CALHOUN, that the situation of the country naturally inclines us to too much feebleness rather than to too much violence, I refer to the fact that there are on this floor men who are entirely opposed to armies, to navies, to every means of defence. Sir, if their politics prevail, the country will be disarmed, at the mercy of any foreign Power. On the other side, sir, there is no excess of military fervor, no party inclining to military despotism; for though a charge of such a disposition has been made by a gentleman in debate, it is without the shadow of foundation. What is the fact in regard to the army? Does it bear out his assertion? Is it even proportionally larger now than it was in 1801-'2, the period which the gentleman considers the standard of political perfection? It was then about 4,000 men; it was larger in proportion than an army of 10,000 would now be. The charge of a disposition to make this a military Government exists only in the imaginations of gentlemen; it cannot be supported by facts; it is contrary to proof and to evidence."

To complete this branch of his argument, (this argumentum ad hominem, as the logicians called it,) the argument to the man, and in which he (Mr. B.) never indulged unless extorted from him, he would cite another passage from the speech of the Representative from South Carolina in the House of Representatives in 1816, in which that Representative went for national defence generally, and for fortifications especially; and carried his patriotic zeal so far as to pronounce any future administration, which should neglect these defences, entitled to the "execration of the country!" Hear him:

"There was another point of preparation which (Mr. CALHOUN said) ought not to be overlooked: the defence of our coast by means other than the navy, on which we ought to rely mainly, but not entirely. The coast is our weak part, which ought to be rendered strong, if it be in our power to make it so. There are two points on our coast particularly weak—the mouth of the Mississippi and the Chesapeake bay—which ought to be cautiously attended to; not, however, neglecting others. The administration which leaves these two points in another war without fortification ought to receive the execration of the country. Look at the facility afforded by the Chesapeake bay to maritime Powers in attacking us. If we estimate with it the margin of rivers navigable for vessels of war, it adds fourteen hundred miles at least to the line of our seacoast, and that of the worst character; for when an enemy is there, it is without the fear of being driven from it; he has, besides, the power of assaulting two shores at the same time, and must be expected on both. Under such circumstances, no degree of expense would be too great for its defence. The whole margin of the bay is, besides, an extremely sickly one, and fatal to the militia of the upper country. How it is to be defended, military and naval men will best judge; but I believe that steam frigates ought, at least, to constitute a part of the means; the expense of which, however great, the people ought, and would cheerfully bear."

Mr. B. commended this paragraph from the speech of the South Carolina Representative in 1816, in favor of fortifications, even at the expense of taxes, to the favorable attention of the Senator from South Carolina, who now opposes a bill for fortifications, even in the Chesapeake bay, while the Treasury is stuffed, crammed, gorged, and distended, with money, for which we can find no constitutional object of expenditure. It was a pity the present Senator from South Carolina was not on more intimate terms at present with the quondam Secretary at War and Representative. It would certainly put him on better terms with the administration of President Jackson, which was now doing, in despite of the opposition of the present Senator, the things which the former Secretary and Representative most nobly advocated, and for the possible omission of which the execrations of the country were imprecated in advance!

Mr. B., having finished the argumentum ad hominem, would next have recourse to the argumentum ad judicium—the argument to the judgment—and hoped to convince the Senate that all the provisions in the bill were necessary and proper in themselves, and deserved to be passed into law. He said it had been already observed that the great reduction of the military establishment in 1821 fell upon two branches of the army, namely, the rank and file and the general staff. No diminution in the number of the regiments or in the number of the officers of the line had been made; but, by stripping the regiments of men, and nearly abolishing the general staff, a skeleton establishment had been produced, extorted by the exhausted state of our finances in 1821, and ready to be filled up when the finances were restored, and the public service required. Both these contingencies have now happened. The finances are restored, and the public service imperiously requires the skeleton regiments to be filled up, and the abolished staff to be recreated. The present strength of the army was wholly inadequate to the guarding and manning of the posts and forts stretched along a circumference of nine thousand miles of frontier; much less to repel incursions or to suppress the hostilities of the Indians. At every alarm, heavy drafts, at great expense, were made upon the militia and volunteers of the States; at every breaking out of hostilities, large bodies of these troops were called into the field. During the past year, not less than twenty-six thousand militia and volunteers, mostly mounted men, had been mustered into service. A regiment of Arkansas volunteers are now doing garrison duty on the frontiers of that State. If this bill is not passed, annual and perpetual calls must be made on the militia and volunteers, to supply the defect of the regular troops. The expense of a full establishment, and far more than that expense, would be incurred. A proper sense of economy alone would require the regiments to be filled up. Mr. B. said it was in vain, and looked a little like the use of the argumentum ad ignorantiam—an argument founded on the supposed ignorance of the hearers—for the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] who had once presided over the Military Department, to undertake to frighten the Senate with an array of 12,000 men. Every person slightly acquainted with the nature of an army will know that 12,000 men on paper is not more than 8,000 or 9,000 in the field; that from the rapid succession of casualties—deaths, desertions, sickness, accidents, expirations of enlistments—the actual force is always one third or one fourth less than the authorized force; and that, to obtain the services of a given number, a considerably larger number must always be authorized. Thus it is at present. The aggregate force now allowed by law is near 8,000; yet the numerical force, on paper, at the last return, was only 6,233; and the actual available force for service was no more than 4,282. Thus, it is clear that an authorized establishment of 12,000 will not give more than an actual force of 8,000 or 9,000; and less than that number cannot possibly man and garrison our extended frontier—a frontier of 9,000 miles in circuit, without counting the doublings and indentations of the coasts. Of this vast circuit, the inland frontier, from the Gulf of Mexico to Lake Superior, along the boundary of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, the Des Moines settlements, Wisconsin Territory, and the State of Michigan, would require an actual available force of 6,000 men; while the lake, maritime, and gulf coast would require 3,000 or 4,000 more; making 9,000 or 10,000 men for service, which an authorized establishment of no more than 12,000 can hardly ever give. Mr. B. repeated, we have regiments enough. Seven of infantry, four of artillery, two of dragoons, making thirteen in the whole, are enough. But these regiments, especially the artillery and infantry, are skeletons; and we want them filled up. Their companies are allowed but 42 men each, which gives for service in the field the ridiculous exhibition of 25 or 30 men for a captain to command! This bill proposes to raise the infantry and artillery companies to 100 men each, which would give for service the respectable strength of 70 or 80 men. Mr. B. dilated on the evils of the present small size of the companies. It was injurious to the discipline of the troops in time of peace, and fatal to themselves and disastrous to the country in time of war. To go no further for examples, the present Florida war presented numerous instances in which the war would probably have been terminated if the officers in command had had troops equal to their rank. Thus, Major Dade, instead of a major's command of four or five hundred men, with whom the devoted courage and discipline which he and his brave band displayed would have defeated a thousand Indians, had but a captain's command of one hundred; General Clinch, instead of a brigade, had half a battalion; Major Pierce, instead of a major's command, had a captain's; and so of other instances. Hence the disaster of Major Dade's devoted corps; hence the want of decisive results from General Clinch's brave combat on the Withlacoochie—from Major Pierce's gallant attack at Fort Drane—and from numerous other instances in which a handful of men fought bravely, performed heroic actions, and did all that courage and discipline could do, but were too few in numbers to reap the advantages of victory, even when victorious. The result of the whole has been, the death of many good soldiers, without adequate advantage to their country—the encouragement of the enemy—the protraction of the war—the call for numerous volunteers and militia—the incurring of an enormous expense—and the exposure of numerous families to massacre, with the devastation of counties and settlements entitled to the protection of this Government.

Mr. B. would conclude what he had to say on the subject of raising the rank and file of the infantry and artillery, with referring to the report of the Secretary of War ad interim, (Mr. Butler,) in which this measure is conclusively shown to be absolutely necessary:

"10. Proposed increase in rank and file of artillery and infantry.—In compliance with the suggestion of General Macomb, and with my own convictions of duty, I beg leave to invite your attention to a proposal for the increase of the rank and file of the artillery and infantry.

"The insufficiency, in several respects, of our present military establishment has already been noticed. It is greatest in the general staff and the rank and file; those arms of the service being much less numerous, in proportion, than the officers retained in the line of the army. The object of Congress in this arrangement evidently was, on the one hand, to reduce the rank and file and the general staff to the lowest allowable point; and, on the other, to retain in the line officers enough to preserve an amount of military knowledge and experience competent to the direction of a large effective force, whenever such a force might be required by special emergencies, or by the permanent interests of the country. This policy was recommended at the time of its adoption (1821) by the existence of other and more pressing claims on the Treasury, and by the comparatively few calls then made for active military operations. In both these respects our condition is now widely different. The extinction of the public debt, whilst it gives us the ability to attend to other subjects of national importance, lays us under new obligations to do so. We have a much larger number of fortifications and other posts to be garrisoned, and our Indian relations have now reached a point which demands an effective military provision.

"There are thirty-two forts on the Atlantic seaboard and the Gulf of Mexico, each of which ought to be garrisoned by a force adequate at least to the preservation of the public property, and to the retaining of some knowledge of artillery practice. This will require, as I understand, an average of about ninety-six men to each post, or about three thousand in the whole. The rank and file of the present regular army, supposing the new regiment of dragoons to be filled, amounts in the total to seven thousand and sixteen; from which number a large deduction must always be made for sickness, arrests, occasional absence, and time lost in recruiting and marching. The effective force, exclusive of officers, which may be relied on under the present arrangement, can therefore scarcely ever exceed six thousand men; a force utterly inadequate to the necessities of the public service, inasmuch as it affords, after the scanty provision for the seaboard above suggested, only about three thousand for the interior.

"In that part of this report which relates to Indian affairs, I shall have occasion to specify some of the weighty reasons which make it necessary that we should establish additional posts on our Western borders and in the Indian country, and that each should be permanently garrisoned by a respectable force. We have now in that region sixteen posts, including three temporary stations, the whole of which are now occupied by about three thousand men, including a regiment of Arkansas volunteers recently called into the service. All, probably, will agree that the present force at several of the existing posts is inadequate, and a deliberate survey of the immense field of operations, and the various interests involved, will, I think, lead to the conclusion that this branch of the service cannot safely be left, for the next five or ten years, with a force at any time less than from five to seven thousand men.

"The seaboard may be provided for in the manner above suggested, and adequate protection may be given to the interior and to the Indian country, by augmenting the number of men in each company of artillery and infantry to one hundred. This would increase the legal force, independently of commissioned officers and non-commissioned officers of artillery and infantry, to twelve thousand and thirty, from which we might at all times expect to command an available force of not more than about ten thousand effective men. Two plans for a similar increase in the rank and file of the army were submitted to Congress in the report of the Secretary of War of the 8th of March, 1836, and the accompanying communication of General Macomb of the 7th of that month, both of which communications were laid before the Senate of the United States, in compliance with a resolution of that body. I refer to these documents for the details of those plans, and for an estimate of the expense, which, according to the statement then made, would be, for the increase above proposed, about $850,000 per annum. Such an addition to the heavy expenses of our present establishment should undoubtedly be well weighed before it is incurred; but, if we may judge from the experience of the last few years, the measure is as plainly called for on the score of economy as it is by other and more impressive considerations. The expenses occasioned by the hostile aggressions of the Sac and Fox Indians in 1832, amounted to more than $3,000,000; and the several appropriations for suppressing Indian hostilities, made by Congress at the last session, and amounting to five millions of dollars, have already been drawn from the Treasury; and, though a considerable amount is yet in the hands of disbursing officers, the whole will be required to meet expenses already incurred.

"If it be one of the first objects of legislation to guard against the evils of war, then must it be admitted that the prevention of Indian hostilities, so far as human foresight is competent to that end, should be the great care of the Congress of the United States. For, whilst our exposure to such hostilities is imminent, the evils which attend them are so peculiar and unmitigated as to bring on those public agents who may neglect to guard against them the most fearful responsibility. The presence of an adequate military force at or near each of the points where the Indians are numerous is the most effectual, if not the only effectual means of security and defence. In my judgment, such a force cannot be furnished by our present establishment; and, as neither militia nor volunteers can be employed for permanent garrisons, the object can only be effected by the increase of the regular army. I trust it will be provided for without delay."

Mr. B. further referred to the report of the Secretary at War ad interim, to show the deficiency of the general staff, the injury to the public service from that deficiency, and the necessity of increasing it. He referred to the following passages from his report:

"A. General Staff.—The reports of the chiefs of the different staff departments exhibit a perspicuous view of their operations during the past year.

"I beg leave to call your attention to the communication of the adjutant general, setting forth the difficulties which have been, and are yet, experienced in various branches of the public service, for the want of additional staff officers.

"The fiscal operations of the quartermaster's and subsistence departments have been unusually heavy, in consequence of the hostilities in which the army has been employed. It is due to these two important arms of the service that I should state that, from the time when adequate means were placed at their disposal by Congress, nothing has been omitted, on their part, to provide the necessary supplies for the troops in the field.

"The report of the acting quartermaster general states the progress made, or rather the inability to make progress, in the construction of the roads and other works with which the department is charged. It also exposes, in a lucid and convincing manner, the utter insufficiency of this branch of the service, as now organized by law, to the execution of the duties committed to it.

"The complaints made in the accompanying papers, as to the want of sufficient strength in the staff departments, appear to me to be well founded.

"The present system seems to have been framed upon the principle of concentrating the business of those departments at the seat of Government, and of employing therein a very small number of officers commissioned in the staff, the deficiencies being supplied by selections from the lines. This arrangement is very well adapted to a time of profound peace, when officers can be spared from the line without injury to the service; when the positions of the troops are chiefly permanent; and when the changes which occur are made with so much deliberation as to afford ample time for preparing adequate means of transportation and supply. But when large bodies of troops, whose numbers and movements may be varied by unforeseen contingencies, are to be supplied in the field, and at a great distance from the seat of Government, the system is worse than insufficient—it is the parent of expense, confusion, and delay. During the time necessarily occupied in the transmission of despatches to and of instructions from the War Department, the state of things may be so entirely changed as to render the instructions inapplicable; and, even if it remain unaltered, the loss of time in military operations is always a great evil, and sometimes a fatal one. To prevent inconveniences of this sort, it is evidently necessary that staff officers of experience and rank should be associated with the commander, and, to supply such associates, the staff departments must be enlarged. On the other hand, to make the line of the army truly effective, officers should not be taken for staff service, or other detached duties, in large numbers, nor for long periods, from their companies. And when, to relieve the weakness of the staff on a pressing contingency, officers are selected from the line, the difficulty, instead of being remedied, is only exchanged for a new and possibly a greater one. The embarrassments occasioned by these causes, during the operations of the year, have been of constant recurrence, and of the most serious character.

"Of the works authorized by acts passed at the last session of Congress, and belonging to the ordnance department, all have been greatly delayed, and some entirely suspended, by the want of the necessary officers to conduct them. The interests of the service, as well as the just claims of contractors, whose payments are frequently delayed from inability to make the proper inspections, call loudly for an increase of this corps."

Mr. B. also referred to the reports of the different officers at the head of different branches of the staff, and of the engineers, topographical engineers, and ordnance, to show the necessity of the augmentation proposed.

From Adjutant General Jones's report he read:

"It cannot be doubted that the public service has suffered, and continues to suffer, for want of an adequate staff for service in the field, and habitual duty with the troops. This has been demonstrated in our recent military operations; and the lamentable deficiency, both in number and of the proper description of staff officers, at every point where troops, whether regular or militia, have been concentrated or been put in motion, is too palpable, and ought not to be doubted by any whose duty it may be to know the wants and understand the true condition of the army. The military operations under Generals Gaines, Scott, Jesup, Clinch, Eustis, &c., and various official reports, show the destitute state of the service, as to the inadequacy of the adjutant general's, inspector's and quartermaster's departments of the staff in the field."

From the report of Major Cross he read as follows:

"Charged as I am but temporarily with the direction of the quartermaster's department, I feel restrained from making many suggestions in relation to it which would come with more propriety from its chief, now absent on a high and important command; but there are some that I cannot omit, consistently with a faithful discharge of the trust confided to me. The necessity for an improved organization of the department is one of them. This has been represented heretofore to your predecessor, and was, by him, brought before Congress at the last session. It is now my duty to repeat the suggestion, and to urge it with earnestness.

Increase of the Army.

[SENATE.]

"There is, perhaps, no country, considering the relative force, where the duties of the quartermaster's department are so arduous as they are in our own, especially in conducting our Indian wars. It necessarily results from difference of circumstances. In highly improved and thickly settled countries, where the facilities of transportation are great, and the means of supply abundant, there cannot be much difficulty in moving and supporting armies; and even in our own country, on the Atlantic border, and on the great lines of communication in the West, where those advantages exist, the difficulty is comparatively small. But these are not the scenes of our Indian wars. They lie beyond the frontier, in the swamps and fastnesses of the wilderness, far removed from the sources of supply; and the heavy task of moving and sustaining our armies under these circumstances belongs to the quartermaster's department.

"Experience has shown that the present organization, both as to number and grades, was barely sufficient to meet the demands of the service ten years ago, when the army was measurably inactive. It is altogether inadequate now to a proper discharge of the heavy and important duties which devolve upon the department under present circumstances, when not merely the regular army, but large masses of volunteers and militia, are called into active service. During the present year, there have been four separate armies in the field, mustering from two to ten thousand men each, and operating under circumstances involving great difficulties in regard to transportation and supplies; and, considering our extensive and complicated Indian relations, a similar state of things will, in all probability, too often recur. If it be supposed that the present organization of the department, whose executive officers consist of but four majors, six captains, and fourteen lieutenants, drawn from the line, is equal to such an emergency, it is undoubtedly an error.

"Prior to the year 1818, there were division quartermaster generals, with the rank of colonel, who were executive officers, and attended the army in the field when occasions required. In my humble judgment, there has not been a period since the war of 1812, when the necessity of such officers was half so urgent as it is at the present time. There is now no executive officer whose rank is sufficient to give him precedence in his own department in a campaign; and the case has twice occurred recently, where the quartermaster general of a Territory, by virtue of his superior rank as colonel, became entitled to the chief direction of the operations of that department of the staff by whose agency the army was to be moved and supported—a duty second only in importance to the chief command. I submit whether it is right that the advantages of twenty years' experience in the details of the department should thus be measurably lost to the service for want of adequate rank to render it available."

From the report of General Gratiot, of the engineers, he read as follows:

"Office of the Chief Engineer.—The business of the office has been steadily increasing for many years, and is constantly augmented by the reference of new objects provided for at each succeeding session of Congress. An idea of this increase may be gathered from the fact that, in 1833, the whole amount of funds referred for application was $520,150, and which has regularly augmented up to the present time to $3,643,271 76. The duties of the clerks have consequently so increased that a proper record of transactions cannot be kept up, and the salary allowed, while much below that in other departments whose business, whether in magnitude or responsibility, is believed to be no greater, is not sufficient to remunerate them for their services, or to command such as either the interest or despatch of the public business requires.

"It will be seen, by the foregoing report of operations, that in many instances no provision could be made for applying certain appropriations to the objects intended, while, in others, the arrangements, though the best within the control of the department, were not such as could have been wished.

"The desire to fulfil the wishes of Congress led me to impose upon the officers of the department more duty than they can properly execute, and more, I am aware, than the interests of the separate works would authorize. However frequently and earnestly I have represented the impolicy of this course, I cannot refrain from bringing before you the propriety of adopting some measures, either to reduce the duties now devolved upon the department, or to enlarge its powers of action commensurate with the wants of the service. The reasons for such a step, drawn and substantiated by the annual history of operations, have been so often given that they need not now be repeated; and I will only add that, under the present organization of the corps of engineers, the wishes of Congress, so far as they depend upon this branch of the service, cannot be complied with, the public interest cannot be attended to, nor the defence of the country keep pace with the number of appropriations. Under these circumstances, I must again recommend that the number of clerks in the office be increased to seven, with salaries equal to those in the civil departments, and that the corps of engineers be doubled in its numbers."

Among the numerous and important objects committed to the engineer department at the last session of Congress, and which could not be attended to for want of officers, Mr. B. particularized the appropriation of $75,000 for increasing the depth of water in the mouth of the Mississippi, an object in which a great city, a number of States, and an immense commerce, were concerned, and which had to be deferred for want of officers to make a topographical survey.

From the report of Lieutenant Colonel Abert, of the topographical engineers, he read as follows:

"In conclusion, allow me again to call your attention to the organization and increase of the corps of topographical engineers.

"The subject has been so frequently brought to the notice of the Department and of Congress, and explanations of its advantages and necessity are stated in so much detail, in communications from this bureau as well as in a report from the Military Committee of the House of Representatives, that they leave nothing further to be said, or only in addition to refer to the facts detailed in this report, which prove the utter inability of the bureau to execute the duties assigned to it, under the various laws of Congress, without further aid. It may also be well to add, that the aid heretofore received from the army is now no longer to be obtained.

"The extreme inconvenience to which the army has been exposed from the system of military details for duties out of the line, not only during the Indian disturbances on our frontier, but for years before—a system, the parent of extravagance, confusion, and discontent, and which, even in its partial action, has (as events have proved) to be abandoned on every slight emergency—has induced the President to check it by a positive limitation of the number which can in any event be detailed for detached duty.

"Under the foregoing circumstances, it will be seen that there is no remedy but in a better organization of the corps.

"In relation to the organization, I will merely submit a copy of the bill which met the approbation of Congress in its last session, having passed the Senate twice, and having been three times reported to the House, and passed through a second reading there: once as a bill from its own Military Committee, and twice in bills from the Senate."

From the report of Colonel Bomford, of the ordnance department, he read as follows:

"Diligent and strenuous efforts have been made to accomplish the various objects set forth in the laws of appropriation, passed during the last session of Congress, for the service of this department. But for want of officers to aid in conducting its operations, the works at Liberty, Missouri; Memphis, Tennessee; Little Rock, Arkansas; Baton Rouge, Louisiana; Fayetteville, North Carolina; Charleston, South Carolina; the magazine at the arsenal in Washington city; and the erection of the shot furnaces along the seacoast, have all been unavoidably delayed, and some of them suspended. A like inconvenience has been felt at the principal arsenals at Watervliet, Pittsburg, Washington city, and Watertown, where extensive operations are progressing, and unavoidably impeded by the want of the necessary and usual assistance of officers. The departments for the inspection of cannon and small arms and accoutrements are subject to the same inconvenience; the former being entirely suspended, and the latter progressing with difficulty, for the want of additional force.

"There is another and very serious inconvenience, which extends to every post of the department where there is but one officer, and more especially to those commanded by the chiefs of inspections. These officers, with other commanders of posts who are unaided by assistant officers, are frequently and unavoidably absent on business connected with the posts, or the inspection of cannon or small arms; and during those absences are obliged to leave their posts sometimes for many days without an officer, and in charge of irresponsible persons, wholly unacquainted with the various points (many of them matters of military science) connected with the business of the post, and which require daily and hourly decision. Such inexperienced persons, from want of the proper authority under the laws and regulations, are, in many cases, wholly incapable of acting; and where their delegated authority from the officer is sufficient, they must either decide as the cases arise, and most probably erroneously, or postpone action to the arrival of an officer; and in this manner the public business is either encumbered with inconvenient and expensive delays, or perhaps with the still greater expense of a wrong decision, which cannot be remedied.

"It cannot be disguised that, unless the service of this department be relieved by the proper authority from these disadvantages, its immense material of war and extensive buildings and machinery, in all parts of the country, are liable to sustain the most serious losses, from fire, defective preservation, and other causes, while its system of service may be deranged by irregularity in the current business of the arsenals, and by complexity and confusion in its business transactions with the chief of the department.

"I had the honor to submit for your decision, on the 28th ultimo, a communication from the lieutenant colonel of ordnance, inspector of armories and arsenals, urging the difficulty of his proceeding with the inspections in his department, with the present inadequate allowance of transportation, and requesting to be relieved from the more distant inspections, in consequence of the heavy expenses in which they involve him. It is proper here to remark, that the same complaints have been repeatedly made by the other officers employed in the inspections of this department."

The condition of the ordnance department, Mr. B. said, could be exhibited in a few words. There were fourteen officers in the department; and they had between eighteen and nineteen millions of public property to take care of, dispersed through six-and-twenty States, two Territories, and one District.

From all these reports, confirmed by his own reflections and observations, Mr. B. felt authorized to say that the general staff of the army, the engineers proper, the topographical engineers, and the ordnance, were all in a state of impossibility. It was impossible for them to do their duties! No human exertion—no toil of the body—no strain of the muscles—no tension of the mind—could enable them to do it. The work imposed upon them was beyond human efforts to perform. The consequence was delay and neglect in many branches of the service—committal of objects to temporary or incompetent hands in others—overburdening willing officers with excessive and incongruous labor—and inflicting loss and damage upon the country itself, which was the real loser from all defective administrations of its affairs.

Mr. B. having completely vindicated the bill, as he believed, in its two main features—the increase of the rank and file and the increase of the general staff—would next give some consideration to a few detached provisions, and flattered himself that he could show them to be eminently entitled to the favorable action of the Senate. The first of these provisions was in the fourteenth section, and was in the following words:

"SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, the army ration, when not received in kind, shall be estimated at twenty-five cents per ration; and that every commissioned officer of the line or staff shall be entitled to receive one additional ration per diem for every five years that he may have served or shall serve in the army of the United States; and the paymaster general, surgeon general, and commissary general of purchases, shall each be allowed six rations per diem, and the additional ration allowed in this section."

The object of this section, Mr. B. said, was obvious and plain; it was to extend some little additional compensation to the officers of our army. The first question was, did they need any additional compensation? And on this point he quoted with satisfaction, not only the former opinions of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] but his present opinions also. In his report of 1818 he particularly descanted upon the inadequacy of the pay, and showed it to be less than it was, the depreciation of money considered, during the revolutionary war. In his speech this day, though objecting to the increased expenses of the army, on account of increased numbers, yet he does not object to an increase of pay, but explicitly advocates it, and declares himself ready to vote for it. Turning to the report of the present Secretary at War ad interim, (Mr. Attorney General Butler,) and it will be seen, at pages 116 and 117 of his report, that he urgently recommends an increase of pay. Referring to his own knowledge, he (Mr. B.) was certain that an increase was demanded by every consideration connected with the public service. A great many officers, and those of the age and acquirements to be most useful to the country, were retiring from the service, from the inadequacy of the present pay and the gloominess of the prospect ahead. No less than one hundred and seventeen commissioned officers had resigned during the year 1836. Seven others, appointed to commands in the new regiment of dragoons, had declined to accept their commissions; making 124 officers, in our small establishment, refusing, in the course of one year, to remain in it! Inadequacy of compensation is the inducing cause to these retrifings, in almost every instance. For many years the officers have petitioned for an increase of pay, and have petitioned in vain. While compensation has been increased to almost all others, that of the army remains stationary, and may be assumed to be inferior now, depreciation of money considered, to what it was upwards of half a century ago, during the time of the Revolution. No doubt, then, can remain, but that an increase of compensation ought to be given. The next inquiry is, whether the increase proposed by this section is proper and adequate. Mr. B. believed it to be proper, as far as it went, but that it did not go far enough—that it was not adequate. It proposed a small increase in two modes: first, in the price of the ration, when not drawn in kind; secondly, an additional ration per diem for every five years' service. The first of these increases is manifestly proper. The present price of the army ration is twenty cents. It was fixed at that sum in 1808, when the price of living was little more than half what it now is. The same principle which fixed it at twenty cents then would carry it above thirty now; but, as the navy ration was fixed at twenty-five cents, Mr. B. had not proposed more for the army. The increase in the price of the ration was the more necessary, because it only applied when the ration was not drawn in kind. This happened principally in travelling, or in boarding in hotels while engaged on duty, and where the present subsistence allowance was an absolute nullity if limited to it. It would take two or three rations to get a breakfast, three or four to get a dinner, two or three to get a supper, one to get a bed, &c. If the price of the ration was now fixed at 33½ cents, it would only be in proportion to what it was when fixed at twenty in 1808.

The additional ration per diem for every five years' service, Mr. B. apprehended, rested on a principle which, though new in our service, was eminently just and commendable within itself. It discarded the principle of rank and promotion, which was always irregular and uncertain, and took that of time and service, which was always regular and certain. An officer's expenses go on increasing with time, whether he obtains rank and promotion or not. He gains age at all events, and age brings its attendant wants and necessities. Often he marries, and his family increases with time, whether his rank advances or not. Even if he does not marry, the casualties of family connexions often throw upon him relations, near and dear, with whom he is bound to divide his support. His expenses, then, increase with time, whether rank and promotion come or not; and it has been thought right to meet these accumulating expenses with some additional periodically accruing compensation. This is rendered more proper, because in some regiments and corps promotion is much more slow than in others; and, in many grades, there is no promotion at all; and in our service, pensions and half pay to retiring officers are unknown. The principle of a periodical increase of compensation being shown to be just and equitable, it is presumed that no objection can be made to the application of the principle in this bill, except that the increase is almost too small to be offered—only one additional ration for each five years' service.

Mr. B. said there were a few remaining provisions, the bare statement of which would vindicate themselves. 1. A restoration of the bounties and premiums to recruits. These were abolished about three years ago, as an experiment, and because the recruit often received his bounty, and then immediately deserted. To obviate this, and at the same time to encourage recruits, the bounty is restored, but one half of it deferred until the recruit joins a corps, and is mustered into service. Mr. B. repeated, the abolition of the bounty, about three years ago, was an experiment, which experience had condemned; and it was deemed best to go on in the old way, which, both in the American and British service, had given bounties to recruits, ever since recruits were enlisted. 2. An increase of pay to the privates and non-commissioned officers. This amounted to one dollar in the month only, and was too obviously necessary to need elucidation. The pay of the private was now six dollars a month; the increase will make it seven. The increase is necessary to obtain men and to save money; for if the ranks of the army are not filled at seven dollars a month, their place will be supplied by volunteers and militia, that will cost far more. 3. A commutation of the whiskey component part of the ration for sugar and coffee. This is regulation now; the bill proposes to make it law. The only difference is, that the bill slightly increases the quantity allowed by regulation. 4. A provision for employing chaplains at some of the military posts. This, Mr. B. said, was not the restoration of chaplains to the army, which formerly existed, and which have been abolished for many years. It was not a proposition to re-establish chaplains, to be appointed by the President and Senate, and to follow regiments in the field; but the whole object of it was to aid the officers at posts in procuring the services of clergymen, both for performing divine service and for performing the useful and respectable office of teaching the children of the post. This is now done, at their own expense, at many of the frontier posts, where the officers and soldiers are sufficiently numerous to bear the burden. The object of this section is merely to aid them in this laudable work, and to leave the choice of the chaplain where it now is, and where there is the best means of knowing who is fit, and where there is the greatest interest in having fit characters.

With these explanations, Mr. B. hoped the bill would be found entitled to the favorable consideration of the Senate, to whose decision it was now submitted.

Mr. CALHOUN said he was much gratified with the opportunity of showing that there was not the slightest inconsistency between his course at this time and that to which the Senator from Missouri had so triumphantly alluded. Mr. C. then went on to recapitulate the grounds of objection he had before stated as to the reduction of the Indian frontier, &c. And how had the Senator met these objections? By reading a report made by him when Secretary of War, in opposition to a proposed reduction of the army. Mr. C. alluded to the different state of the country at the two periods of time. We had just emerged from the exasperation of a recent war, in which numbers of the Indians had been engaged, and many cruelties committed. There still remained much hostile feeling on both sides. A large force remained at Rouse's Point, and another at Sackett's Harbor. Our fortifications were dilapidated. There were 100,000 hostile Indians in the interior of the country, in the very midst of us, besides a vast body still more hostile on the frontier. The South American States had recently been liberated from the yoke of Spain, and the Holy Alliance were meditating an armed interference in that contest, and were with difficulty dissuaded from the attempt. Under these circumstances, he had been of opinion that the proposed reduction in our military establishment should not take place. The Senator from Missouri, however, had forgotten to tell the Senate one thing: that he himself had been opposed to the report, and had voted against it.

[Mr. BENTON. I was not here.]

Mr. C. said, perhaps he was mistaken in the date, but the Senator from Missouri had certainly aided in the reduction, and voted for it in 1821; and yet he accuses me of inconsistency in now opposing its increase. Mr. C. said that, when the reduction did take place, he had been almost the only man who was in favor of fixing the number of the army at 10,000. Mr. Dashiell, a member of the other House, had proposed 6,500, to which Mr. C. had replied that he would assent to that number but for the large British force still remaining in Canada. The same principles which actuated him then governed him now, and he was happy in being able to show that there was no inconsistency in his course. The man who was upright in his intentions, and who desired only to do his duty, need not fear falling into inconsistency. The report which the gentleman had quoted Mr. C. prided himself in. He had been urged by parties on both sides, but he had stood firm and kept his ground, objecting to the reduction on the principle that the establishment of the army should be the most stable thing in the Government. As to the charge of having been in favor of fortifying the Gulf and the Chesapeake, and now being opposed to fortifications, Mr. C. had urged those measures when he was in the House of Representatives; and afterwards, when Secretary of War, he had used his utmost exertions to have the objects effected. The Senator charged him with opposing the defence of Baltimore, but the charge was not fairly stated. The fortification of Baltimore formed but one item in a bill which went to lavish millions, and his opposition had been directed against the bill in general, on account of its extravagance. He never had been in favor of fortifying all the exposed points in the Chesapeake bay, because they were so numerous. His plan had been to fortify thoroughly below, and to combine the defence by forts with that from floating batteries and the navy.

Besides, the expenditures of the Government in 1818 had been very different from what they were now. The whole expenditure then, exclusive of the public debt, had not exceeded ten millions. It was now twenty-five or twenty-six millions, and yet Mr. C. was accused of inconsistency in opposing, under circumstances so different, an uncalled-for extension of our military establishment. The Senator had referred to our experience in the Black Hawk war, as demonstrating an increase of the army to be indispensable. Our experience in that war demonstrated a very different thing. It proved that we should appoint among the Indians faithful agents, who would not stand by and suffer the Indians to be trampled in the dust. And, as to the Florida war, he had recently conversed with a gentleman from the spot, who assured him that nothing occasioned that contest but the very grossest neglect on the part of the Government. General Thompson, our Indian agent, and formerly a member of the other House, when a certain order of the Department in respect to the purchase of negroes had been received by him, had warmly remonstrated, and had even refused to execute the order, warning the Department that it would inevitably provoke a war. The order, however, had been enforced by the authority of the President himself, as Mr. C. understood. In like manner, General Clinch had again and again apprized the Government that there would be hostilities on that frontier, unless additional forces should be despatched to strengthen his position. And, as to the miserable Creek war, he believed that the Senators from Georgia themselves would both admit that frauds and oppression, beyond all human endurance, had been the real cause of that contest. It was more than human nature would endure. The reptile itself would turn when it was trampled on.

[Mr. CURRAN here interposed with some warmth. He was understood to deny the charge, as applied to Georgia, and to refer it to the treatment of Indians in Alabama.]

Mr. C. insisted on the truth of the charge. The facts were open and palpable, and notorious as our own existence. Men had made fortunes by treating those Indians in such a manner as fixed a stain on human nature. Mr. C. again said that what was wanted to protect us from the Indians was not more troops, but more faithful agents. The remnants of those native tribes were now a disheartened and broken down people. They had once esteemed themselves the greatest nations on the earth, but they had now become convinced of our strength and their own weakness. The half-bloods among them were partially civilized. They were sensible of the value of property, and very desirous to acquire it. The heavy annuities accruing to their tribes, by treaties with the Government, afforded ample security for their remaining peaceable, unless oppressed beyond endurance. Send them fit agents, and you will hear no more of Indian wars.

Mr. C. briefly recapitulated the grounds of argument he had advanced, and observed, in conclusion, that, while the navy was our great arm of defence, all that we needed in the army was to keep up our military science, and to preserve a well-organized staff. On the latter subject, he had not particularly examined this bill. It was very possible that there might be some necessity in increasing the staff of the army; and if, on further investigation, he should be convinced of this, and a separate bill should be introduced for that purpose, he would very cheerfully yield it his support; but for the present bill he could not vote.

Mr. BENTON rose to correct an assertion of the Senator from South Carolina. When that gentleman had said that Mr. B. had opposed the reduction in 1818, he had merely thrown the words across to apprise him of his mistake; and, had they been received in a friendly manner, he should have done the same when the Senator made his second assertion as to Mr. B's having voted against the reduction bill in 1821. It was not the fact. He had not been in Congress in either of those years.

Mr. CALHOUN made some explanation, which was not distinctly heard.

Mr. CRITTENDEN spoke in opposition to the bill. It called upon the country, in a time of profound peace, to increase our military establishment one third, fixing the minimum of the army at 12,500 men. Mr. C. disclaimed any apprehension of danger from a source like this. He knew that the American people were perfectly competent to their own protection, even if it were possible that the army should be so wanting in patriotism as to be inclined to turn its arms against the country. But, while he entertained no fears of this kind, he had no idea of getting up a large military establishment to cast a shade over the militia. The public liberty might not be endangered by it; but still, in adopting a measure of this kind, Congress would be entering on a road which led on to dangerous consequences. The same political principles which opposed a standing army were equally opposed to all unnecessary increase of our military establishment. Where was the least indication of the danger of a war? Was it on the West, the Northwest, or the Southwest frontier? From whom was it to be apprehended? From our Indian neighbors? There were two regiments of mounted troops ready in a moment to check any sudden movement.

[Mr. LINN here interposed, and asked leave to correct the Senator from Kentucky, who was mistaken as to a point of fact. It was very true that two regiments of cavalry had been raised, but much the greater part of them had been drawn off to the southern extremity of the line and into Florida. Whenever an Indian war should happen, that mounted force would be required at the particular spot where the eruption was made, and it would therefore be necessary to station some other forces along the line of the frontier.]

Mr. C. resumed. He did not pretend to be as well acquainted with the particular stations where these troops were posted as the Senator from Missouri, but he knew that they had been raised for the very purpose he had stated; and if any part of them had been called off into Florida, he presumed the arrangement would be but temporary. Mr. C. professed to have some acquaintance with the people of the West. He knew the qualities of their hearts, and was fully convinced of their courage and patriotism; but he knew also that an army of 10,000 men would not be sufficient to protect the whole of our Western frontier from a sudden eruption by an Indian force, which might break out, and burn a neighborhood, and massacre the inhabitants. But it never could amount to much more than that. What were the grounds of this sudden alarm? What had created so great a dread of those 70,000 Indians, composed of the fragments, the broken fragments, of a poor, disheartened, dispirited, down-trodden people? It was in vain to affect a terror of this now fallen race, trampled in the dust, and broken in spirit, as an argument for the increase of the standing army. He believed there had not been a single federal soldier in the entire States of Kentucky and Tennessee, when the hardy settlers of that part of the Union first established themselves in the wilderness. It might have been that a part of the Illinois regiment was stationed, for a short time, at Louisville, but the period was very short. These people, unprotected by any force of the Government, had made good their ground against the Indian tribes, when they were in a very different condition from that to which we had reduced them. Their numbers were great, their courage high, their spirit unbroken. But since then they had felt our power. They had become conscious of their own weakness, had been borne down by injustice and oppression, and were now a poor degraded race, living on the charity of this Government. And yet it was from these people that so great danger was apprehended that it became indispensable to augment our peace establishment.

As to the war in Florida, it must now very soon terminate. It could not be with a view to that contest that this increase was asked for, and the apprehension of danger in the West he believed to be a mere pretext. He was utterly opposed to the bill. He should vote against all increase, either of the army or of the fortifications. They were but a useless burden on the nation. They formed a part of a mischievous system of policy—a system founded on principles altogether repugnant to the genius of this Government. The different military bills were all linked together, and followed in a train; adopt one, and it led the way to another, until, altogether, they incurred a mass of expenditure injurious and dangerous to the country. It was urged, however, that the people have a right to protection. Yes; but was not every standing army in Europe advocated and defended on the same principle? The most despotic Governments, while they exhausted the wealth of the people in raising and maintaining vast masses of troops, professed to their people that it was all done for their protection. It was all idle to talk of protecting a nation of fifteen millions. They wanted no protection; they ask for none.

Mr. TIPTON said that, being a member of the Military Committee, and having at a former session voted for an increase of the army, he felt called upon to say a few words on this bill. The Senator from South Carolina, at the time which had been alluded to by the Senator from Missouri, had been strenuously opposed to the reduction of the army; and Mr. T. believed then, and believed still, that his opposition to it was right. The army, however, had been reduced, and had so continued until it was utterly insufficient to meet the increasing necessities of the country. Mr. T. entirely approved of the provisions of the bill, both as it respected the rank and file of the army, and the proposed augmentation of the staff. He had himself at the last session brought this subject before the notice of the Senate. He had then presented a statement of the rank and file of the army, and its distribution in the several fortifications, both in the interior and along the seaboard. The details went to prove that the force was totally inadequate to the purpose for which it was required; so much so, indeed, that some of our military works had been abandoned and suffered to run into decay, because we had not troops to occupy them. Some of our forts were still in that condition. Even those which defended our largest cities were at this very day almost without garrisons. The works were complete and extensive. They were supplied with guns and all the munitions of war, but there were not men to work the guns or to repel the slightest attack of an invading foe. The country, therefore, had no alternative but either to augment the rank and file of the army, or suffer all these expensive and necessary works to fall into dilapidation and decay. We had, to be sure, professedly, nine regiments of artillery, seven of infantry, and two of cavalry. But what were they? Mere skeletons. All persons who were at all familiar with military affairs well knew that it was seldom possible to bring into actual service at any time much more than two thirds of the military force authorized by law. Such were the diminutions produced by sickness, discharges, desertions, the increased price of labor, and the limited amount of pay, that not more than this proportion could ever be safely calculated on.

Should this bill pass, we should then have on paper an army of 12,500 men; but we should never be able to realize more than 7,000 or 8,000 effective troops to garrison the fortifications on our extended frontier; and it did seem to him that if gentlemen who so strenuously opposed this bill would but reflect on the extent of that frontier, they must be satisfied that such a force was not too great.

As to the increase of the staff, there could be but one opinion about it. It was absolutely necessary, especially in the quartermaster's department. The number of officers in that department of the army was disproportionately small, and entirely inadequate to the wants of the service.

Something had been said about the causes of our Indian wars. Mr. T. would here repeat an admission he had made on a former occasion, that the war in Florida had been occasioned in the first instance by the improper conduct of the agents of the Government; but, although this was undoubtedly the case, yet, had the Government possessed an efficient force upon the spot, we should in all probability have escaped the war. All who are acquainted with the Indian character well knew that there was no way to keep peace with Indians but by keeping up a strong force in their neighborhood, within their view. Nothing but this would ever keep them quiet. It was the present policy of the Government to remove the remnant of the Indian tribes across the Mississippi. The object had been in part accomplished, and these bodies of Indians had been spread along our frontier, from the Red river to St. Peter's. In each of our posts there was a company of soldiers, while a corps of dragoons had been raised for the purpose of scouring the country, and preserving peace, as well between our Indians and their wilder neighbors beyond, as between them and our own people. But that force was inadequate to perform this duty along so extended a line, and it required to be increased. On the whole, Mr. T. could not see the great enormity of the proposed augmentation in the army. There was to be no increase of regiments, no increase in the number of officers of the line. It was confined exclusively to the staff, and to the rank and file of the army.

Mr. LINN observed that it was now the settled policy of this Government to remove those remnants of Indian tribes who yet retained some territory within the States from the positions they occupied, and to give them in exchange a territory west of the Mississippi; thereby at once protecting the Indians from the encroachments and depredations of a surrounding white population, and enabling the State Governments to exercise uninterrupted jurisdiction over the entire extent of their own territory.

SENATE.]

Increase of the Army.

It was a noble policy, characterized alike by wisdom and humanity. It had originated in the cabinet of which the Senator from South Carolina had been at that time a distinguished member, and it would stand in the history of this country a glorious and enduring monument of the enlightened views and enlarged benevolence of its authors. The process had commenced, and the plan was in the course of execution by the present administration, notwithstanding many obstacles. The Indians had been removed from many of the States, and collected in their respective tribes on our Western frontier. Now, Mr. L. would ask the Senator from South Carolina, and all those other Senators who represented States that had formerly been burdened with an Indian population, whether they were not under the most solemn obligations of justice to the States of Missouri, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Territory of Wisconsin, in whose immediate vicinity this large body of Indians had been assembled, to protect her people from the Indians, and to protect the several Indian tribes from each other? Now, what course of policy was it necessary to pursue, in order effectually to accomplish this end? Having removed these people from their native haunts, and brought them together under new circumstances, the Government was obviously under obligations to extend to them, so far as should be in its power, the blessings of government, religion, and civilization; and, for this purpose, the great and only efficient means must be to break up the war spirit among themselves. Unless that spirit could be put down, these warlike tribes would in a little time destroy each other, or cause aggression upon us. For this purpose, it was indispensable that we should have at our disposal, and ready for action, a respectable military force. Successive Secretaries of War, and among them the late Secretary Cass, than whom no man was better acquainted with the Indian habits and character, had estimated the force requisite for this object at 7,000 men. General Jesup, in a communication made by him to the Government, had made the same estimate, and all the Indian agents who had been consulted concurred in the same opinion. The present acting Secretary of War fully agreed in it. They all agreed in the opinion that a permanent military force must be established on that frontier. When not engaged in military duty, they might be employed in constructing military roads and fortifications. Forts must be established at short distances from each other, and garrisoned by a standing body of troops, whilst cavalry should be employed to move from point to point. To hope for any thing like permanent peace among a large body of Indians, under any other circumstances, was idle. The very nature of the Indian was war; it was the element in which he moved; and he must see a force actually present, and sufficient to control him, or this warlike propensity could never be repressed. It was utterly vain to represent to these people the power of the United States Government. Nothing of the kind made any impression on the Indian mind, unless accompanied by a visible demonstration of military force.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] had observed that the militia of the Union could defend themselves. It was unquestionably true; but Mr. L. contended that this Government had no right to place the people of the country in such a condition that they must take up arms to defend themselves. It was unjust. No one better knew than that gentleman at what cost the dark and bloody soil of Kentucky had been conquered and maintained against a savage foe. Its soil had been fattened with the best blood of this land—blood which might all have been spared if the Government had been in circumstances to afford to those hardy settlers the protection of a regular military force, but which was denied them, in consequence of revolutionary struggles. Mr. L. did not want to see such scenes enacted in Missouri. No doubt, the people of Missouri could subdue any Indian force which should invade their soil; but it was not their place to do it. They ought not to be compelled to work out their own safety. The Black Hawk war had cost this Government millions of money, but it had cost the State of Illinois more. She would not get over the effects of that war for years to come. The settlers fled before the tomahawk, and the country was, for a time, abandoned to a savage foe; houses were left tenantless, rank weeds sprung up in the cultivated fields, and cattle ran at large. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. Tipton] had charged that war to the fault of the Indian agent. This was the first time Mr. L. had ever heard this charge adduced. He had been personally acquainted with that agent, and knew him (the late Mr. Felix St. Vrain) to have been a capable and active man, and never had he known one of greater humanity. He had fallen in an attempt to prevent the horrors of war between the whites and the tribe of Indians confided to his care.

[Mr. TIPTON here rose to explain, and was understood to disclaim imputing the least blame to the individual in question; his remarks had applied to another person.]

Mr. L. resumed, and observed that the Black Hawk war strongly illustrated the truth of what he said. Black Hawk's tribe had sold to the United States their lands east of the Mississippi, and crossed over to the west side of that river; but soon observing that there was not a military force sufficient to hold the country, they recrossed the Mississippi, and, before the face of General Gaines, resumed the possession of their old territory; and so unable was that officer to resist them, that he had to sacrifice several thousand bushels of salt and corn to buy off the Indian force, and soothe their feelings. The truth was, that Black Hawk most grossly insulted the whole of our force, and did actually threaten to whip what he denominated the mercenary soldiers of the United States. He yielded, however, at length, to the wise and temperate admonitions of General Gaines, and crossed the Mississippi again; but, with the infidelity which belongs to the Indian character, returned a second time the next spring, and imprisoned Choteau, the United States agent, and committed various other outrages. It was impossible to conceive a more indomitable pride, or a more warlike spirit, than possessed the breast of that chief and that of his followers. He found himself at the head of 500 or 600 cavalry, as well drilled as any troops in the world, and war he was determined to have. He had thought that he could conquer any force which should be brought against him. When the United States force under General Atkinson, aided by the militia of Illinois and the miners under General Dodge, at length appeared, he took refuge in the swamps between the four lakes; and it required all the force that could be raised in the State of Illinois and Territory of Wisconsin in addition to the regular army, to drive him from his position; nor could they ever have effected it, had they not resorted to starvation. This had been the true but brief history of the Black Hawk war; and did it furnish to this Government no warning? Were there no swamps, no dark and tangled forests, in that country now assigned to the Indians? Had the Indian character or habits changed? Not at all. They were the same ferocious and blood-thirsty people they had ever been. No doubt, the people of Missouri, after a bloody struggle, from time to time renewed, might subdue them. But he repeated the assertion, that the Government had no right to compel them into any such contest. It was the act of the Government which had congregated these Indian tribes on the frontiers of that State, and it was unjust to leave the inhabitants exposed to have their houses burnt, their farms laid waste, and their wives and children tomahawked before their eyes.

Increase of the Army.

[SENATE.]

Mr. CALHOUN referred to an apparent inconsistency in the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, in which Mr. C. was understood to say the Secretary had fixed the expense of 5,500 men at about $3,000,000; and of 7,000 men at only $3,800,000. Mr. C. inquired how both these estimates could be correct.

The Senator from Missouri, [Mr. LINN,] Mr. C. said, claimed protection for the people of that State. It was Mr. C.'s object to give them protection; and if Mr. L. would join him in procuring the appointment of honest, skilful, and faithful Indian agents, such protection might be secured, or at least rendered unnecessary. And in an open country (he said) a very small white force, with artillery and cavalry, could overthrow any Indian force that might be brought against them.

It had been mentioned as a difficulty, that the regiments of the army would not be kept full enough. Mr. C. thought it a much better remedy for this difficulty to increase the pay of the troops, rather than to increase the nominal number. The measures of this Government, he said, had disturbed and embarrassed the currency of the country, raised the prices of the means of living, and the wages of such as might be employed in the army; and now, in order to obviate all this, it was proposed to increase the army with 5,500 men. Mr. C. insisted that this was no adequate remedy. The cause of the evil lay deeper—in the past measures of the Government, and the consequent increase of banks, which would still increase and swell the currency, till an explosion would be inevitable, without a timely remedy.

Mr. C. deemed the troops already in the service ample to defend that frontier. The Indians, he said, were a poor, broken down, dissipated people, and all that was wanted was faithful and skilful Indian agents. He thought they ought to be left to themselves in relation to wars between them and the Indians further west. If not allowed to go to war when they thought proper, they would all die of drunkenness. He would let them go to war, and drive the wild Indians still further west. In every view of the bill, Mr. C. regarded it as objectionable, and hoped it would not pass.

Mr. SOUTHWARD said, in 1821 a law was passed to reduce and fix the military establishment, which was then the same as at the termination of the war in 1815. After 1821, experience taught us that the reduced force was more than sufficient. Now, here was a proposition to enlarge that force of 1821, without reasons, without any change in the circumstances of the nation, that could be regarded as a cause for enlarging that force. On the contrary, the extent of the frontier exposed had been reduced, and the dangers were otherwise less than at that time.

The only point which it could at all be urged to require an increase of force was in the Southwest, where the Indians had been removed. But, when that removal was authorized, it was argued that the danger would be diminished by that measure. Had there been any war there, or was there a prospect of any war? Then why, for that cause, should the military force be almost doubled? Because the population had become more numerous, and, consequently, more able to defend themselves, were they therefore to have a standing army to defend them? This, Mr. S. said, was in opposition to every principle supposed to be republican. From the foundation of the Government, it had been zealously maintained that we ought not to have a large standing army, in imitation of the old and corrupt Governments of Europe. The argument which was now advanced was precisely that which had sustained standing armies in Europe, and trampled down the liberties of the people.

Mr. SEVIER said, when the first bill providing for the removal of the Indians from the east to the west of the Mississippi river was discussed in Congress, it was his fortune to occupy a seat in another quarter of this building. On that occasion he listened, as was his duty, to all that was said for and against that measure. That discussion, conducted on both sides with great ability, was far, very far, from overcoming his repugnance to the passage of that bill. In truth, he was heartily opposed to it, not because he believed it would not be a great benefit to the old States, but because it would, in a corresponding ratio, injure the new. To quiet his fears as to its consequences to his section of the country, and to reconcile him to this favorite policy of the administration, he was repeatedly assured that, when the Indians should be removed, his constituents who live in their vicinity should have garrisons and troops and military roads to guard and protect them against all possible danger. From that day to this, on every suitable occasion, he had endeavored to hold this Government to its bond. He had endeavored to exact its fulfillment to the last letter. Build your garrisons, give us troops for our defence, open your military roads with the interior, and yield to the frontiers that security and protection which it is your duty to bestow, and which they have a right to require at your hands. If your standing army is now too small for those purposes, (and of that I entertain no doubt,) increase it—make it large enough for the wants of the whole country; and if an increase of three or four thousand soldiers is insufficient, go to ten or twenty thousand, (if the wants of the country require so large an increase,) and I, for one, am ready to vote for such a measure. And I am not to be driven from this position, or to falter in the discharge of my sacred duty to my constituents, by the stale cry that a standing army is dangerous to the liberties of the people. Sir, I am not one of those who believe that a standing army of twelve thousand men (to which number this bill proposes to increase our army) can ever endanger the liberties of the people. No, sir; if they were aliens and mercenaries, (and not, as they are, native-born citizens, who are linked to us by ties of kindred and country,) I should have no fears of an army of them consisting of twelve thousand men. There is no need for such fears. There is no class of our citizens more patriotic, none who revere our institutions with more idolatry, or who would be more ready to preserve them in their purity, than those who constitute the army of the United States. But if they should ever become mad enough to attempt it, who among us is credulous enough to believe they would ever succeed. I will not dwell any longer upon a proposition which I consider so wholly untenable.

We are told that, if a standing army is not dangerous to the liberties of the people, an increase of it is unnecessary. It is said that our Indian boundaries have of late years become very much contracted; that those boundaries now extend only from the St. Peter's to Red river; that to the territory between those two points the main body of the Indians have been removed and congregated together, and on that account are less formidable than before; and that, thus settled, they are broken down, disheartened, and dispirited, and in that condition are wholly harmless. To carry out the picture to perfection, we are told that the country they occupy is high, open, abounding with prairie, so that, in case of war, they can be easily reached and promptly punished for any aggressions; that the citizens of those frontier States are competent to follow their private pursuits, and protect themselves, as did the first settlers of Tennessee and Kentucky, without the aid of the troops of the United States. These are the arguments which the opponents of this bill have pressed upon us. I shall be pardoned, I hope, in giving them a rapid review, for I am indisposed to trespass long upon the patience of the Senate.

SENATE.]

Increase of the Army.

The Indians heretofore were remote from each other; they were divided among themselves, and the different tribes at war with each other. They were in the immediate vicinity of your most populous States, and generally surrounded by a very dense white population, always at your service. They were wholly undisciplined, and armed only with war clubs and bows and arrows. In this condition, your arms, your superior numbers of whites and Indian allies, and your discipline, have always enabled you to conquer them in detail, when fighting against you alone, and unsustained by the exertions of other savages. But in no instance have you ever triumphed over them, notwithstanding your great advantages, without the loss of much treasure and hundreds of valuable lives. What is their situation now? They are located thousands of miles from this Capitol, and hundreds of miles distant from the nearest points from which relief to the frontier settlements could be brought in the event of war. They have been taken from the immediate vicinity of Georgia, Alabama, Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, and the Carolinas, and located together upon the borders of the weakest and most remote States in the Union. They have the mighty Mississippi between you and them—a formidable barrier of itself; and that being passed, you then have a country between them and you (some two or three hundred miles in extent, before you reach their settlements) but thinly settled, and, on that account, without roads or subsistence for your troops. Being thus remote from a superior force, and almost inaccessible, are they less formidable now than they ever were before? The country they inhabit abounds in wild horses and buffalo. They may be said to be inexhaustible. They will never want cavalry or subsistence; and, if you defeat them upon our frontiers, they have but to retreat, and retreat, through the common desert in their rear, where you can never follow them—to the Rocky Mountains, to California, to the Pacific itself. From these inaccessible retreats, they can repeat their incursions whenever your troops are disbanded or drawn from the frontiers.

These Indians, thus placed upon our frontiers, are better armed than even our population. In compliance with the terms of our treaties with them, we have given each warrior his gun, his powder and lead, steel, iron, and blacksmiths. To some we have given, in addition, swords, tomahawks, and scalping-knives. These Indians, thus armed, have learned your discipline. They have been trained in your army as privates and as officers. They have seen much service with you in the field. At this time they are all united and friendly with each other. Without calling to their assistance, what they can at any time obtain, the aid of the Pawnees and Camanches, and the other tribes that inhabit that country, they can raise an army, well disciplined and well armed, that would be not only truly formidable, but an over-match to your present army and the disposable forces of the frontier States of Louisiana, Arkansas, and Missouri. At this time we have peace in that quarter of the country, and I most sincerely pray that a different state of things may never exist there. But what is our security? Does it exist in the fact that they are broken down and dispirited? Do they appear to be more so now than when Black Hawk and his followers rung the war-whoop upon the frontiers of Illinois? than when he burnt their dwellings, plundered their property, massacred the inhabitants, and produced a panic throughout that whole State? Do they appear to be more broken down now than did the Creeks to the citizens of Alabama and Georgia? more so than Ocoila, with his five or six hundred naked, unarmed followers did to the people of Florida? No, sir; they are still the same cunning, indomitable people; they despise your policy, and openly defy your power. And your transportation of many of them to the frontiers of my State, in chains and in handcuffs, has not, in my judgment, soothed their tempers or annihilated their spirit of revenge.

It was the leading policy of that distinguished Indian warrior who fell in arms against you at the battle of the Thames to unite all the Indian tribes in a general war against you. He was then unable to accomplish his object. Should a similar spirit appear upon our frontiers now, when the various tribes are united in friendship, and live together, with the manifold advantages their position gives them, where we have neither population nor military force to oppose them successfully, where they are armed and disciplined, and irritated to the highest pitch, there is no one who can estimate the consequences he might produce, or calculate the loss of life, of property, of trouble and expense to the people of the United States. Shall we throw aside the lessons of experience, and leave things as they now are? Or shall we not guard effectually against them, as becomes us, by building forts, opening roads, and increasing the army large enough to protect our own citizens? I, for one, answer in the affirmative. Remember, Mr. President, that you placed those Indians upon our frontier, not only without our consent, but against our strongest remonstrances. My constituents have ever maintained that you had no right thus to expose them to the caprices of an Indian population; but you have done so. You cannot retrace your steps, but it is in your power to afford them some compensation, by giving them your protection. That they have asked; that they now ask. I receive communications nearly every mail, calling my attention to the situation of our frontier. I hope the Senate will not consider it a sufficient answer to the application of my constituents to tell them that Kentucky and Tennessee were settled without the aid of troops of the United States; and that, therefore, like them, they must defend themselves and their property. When those States were settled, the United States were unable to afford them the necessary protection; and if protection could have been afforded, protection they would have had; and, in that event, those early settlers would have had no use for block-houses; they would have had fewer murders to weep for, and less property to lament the loss of.

In regard to my constituents, I can assure the Senate that they are brave, hardy, and patriotic, and idolize the institutions of their country. A regiment of them are now in your service; and, whenever their services are wanted, they will be the first to afford you their assistance, and the last to withhold it from you. They cannot conveniently follow their private pursuits and at the same time guard the frontier, even if they were able to do so; and, if they were able to guard it, would you pay them for their services? No, sir. If their settlements are invaded, and their property destroyed in war, will you pay them for it? No, sir. If they are overpowered and murdered, will the State be satisfied by being told that this Government is powerful, and will redress the injuries inflicted upon her citizens? No, sir; it will not satisfy the State. She values the lives of her citizens beyond all price. I am aware that the increase to our army will cost us some money. What of that? Can it be so well expended upon any thing else? And, besides, is money to be balanced against the life and quiet and property of my constituents? I would not give the life of the humblest among them for all the paltry trash in your Treasury. I shall vote for the bill, and shall conclude by asking the yeas and nays upon its passage.

Mr. TIPTON again addressed the Senate, and went into a number of details of the late Indian wars in the West, all going to show the necessity of having both an armed force and suitable agents, in order to control the Indian tribes.

[SENATE.]

The question was now about to be put, and Mr. SEVIER had demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; when

Mr. LINN rose to reply to the charge which he understood as having been made on various occasions against the people of Missouri, of having plundered and oppressed the Indians on their border. Mr. L. said he had personally resided for twenty-six years in the State of Missouri, and knew that this charge was wholly unfounded in truth. Nothing could be further from the fact. There was not a man in either Missouri or Wisconsin who did not possess too much sense to attempt to plunder Indians. They all knew that at that game they were very sure to come off losers: for the Indians could beat all the white men on the face of the earth at stealing. No; the people of Missouri had never robbed or trampled on these natives of the forest. All the injuries in the case had been perpetrated by Indians upon the peaceable white settlers and their families. The Indians had been represented as a poor, spiritless, down-trodden race, ignorant of their own rights, and continually imposed upon by the whites. Nothing could be more opposite to the truth. A deal of trash of this kind had been uttered in the course of this debate, by those who ought to know better. No people on the face of the earth were keener sighted, or more fully awake to their rights and interests, than the North American Indians, one and all. No one could have acquaintance and personal intercourse with them, and not know they were shrewd in an unusual degree. The Black Hawk war was to be traced entirely to the fraud practised by that chief and his followers in the execution of the treaty. He had openly insulted General Gaines, and threatened his soldiers; and Gaines, to comply with the general peaceful policy of the Government, had been obliged to buy him off. But he returned again the next year; and this would ever be the course of Indians, notwithstanding any engagements they might enter into, unless they saw a military force prepared to enforce a compliance with their promises. Mr. L. claimed for this Government protection for his constituents. The people of Missouri had a right to demand it. It was in vain for gentlemen to talk of there being no danger to be apprehended from a body of 150,000 Indians, collected on their immediate frontier, who were in reach and might be in communication with 150,000 more, inhabiting the vast prairies of the West.

"On these extensive plains a new state of things was likely to grow up. It is to be feared that a great part will form a lawless interval between the abodes of civilized man, like the wastes of the ocean and the deserts of Arabia; and, like them, be subject to the depredations of the marauder. Here may spring up new and mongrel races, like new formations in geology, the amalgamation of the 'debris' and abrasions of former races, civilized and savage; the remains of broken and almost extinguished tribes; the descendants of wandering hunters and trappers; of fugitives from the Spanish and American frontiers; of adventurers and desperadoes of every class and country, yearly ejected from the bosom of society into the wilderness. We are contributing incessantly to swell this singular and heterogeneous cloud of wild population that is to hang about our frontier, by the transfer of whole tribes of savages from the east of the Mississippi to the great wastes of the far West. Many of these bear with them the smart of real or fancied injuries; many consider themselves expatriated beings, wrongfully exiled from their hereditary homes and the sepulchres of their fathers, and cherish a deep and abiding animosity against the race that has dispossessed them. Some may gradually become pastoral hordes, like those rude and migratory people (half shepherd, half warrior) who, with their flocks and herds, roam the plains of Upper Asia; but others, it is to be apprehended, will become predatory bands, mounted on the fleet steeds of the prairies, with the open plains for their marauding grounds, and the mountains for their retreats and lurking places. Here they may resemble those great hordes of the North, 'Gog and Magog, with their bands,' that haunted the gloomy imaginations of the Prophets. 'A great company and mighty host, all riding upon horses, and warring upon those nations which were at rest, and dwelt peaceably, and had gotten cattle and goods.'"

Mr. L. said he had just received a letter from an intelligent individual, who was in circumstances to judge, who stated that there were strong reasons to believe that a communication had been opened with the Indians of the great prairie region, and that efforts were on foot to effect a union with them against the United States. It was all trash to talk about their being a broken-down and powerless race. Never had they been more fierce, never more bent on war; and the only hold which the Government had upon them was through their annuities. The great tribes, to whom large annual payments in money had been guaranteed, would not go to open war with this Government, lest their annuities should be forfeited; but there were some smaller tribes not so restrained; these were not unlikely to commence a hostile movement; and, the moment they should do so, there were multitudes of the young warriors from the larger tribes ready and eager to join them. It was in this way that Black Hawk had become formidable. And this state of things would inevitably and necessarily continue until those tribes should become civilized. It was a noble design, and, properly pursued, would succeed; but never until the warlike habits of the Indians were broken, and they were converted into agriculturists. So long as they should be left unawed by a military force, and at liberty to butcher each other, the benevolent design intended in their removal could never be accomplished.

Mr. L. said he had himself travelled through their settlements; he had observed their condition; and, in the neighborhood of Fort Leavenworth, he had found fields cultivated, houses built, school-houses erected, workshops opened, the loom going, young Indian boys, from sixteen to eighteen years old, learning the mechanic arts, and some of them as good workmen as could be found any where. Here the Indians were perfectly peaceable; and, beholding a controlling force in their presence, and before their eyes, had abandoned their warlike habits, and were beginning to cultivate the arts of peace. Let but this system be carried out, and the same results would follow throughout the Indian country. Was it not worth an experiment? Did we not owe it to these people thus to secure to them a fair start in the course of civilization? This once secured, their progress would afterwards be certain. Only keep down the tomahawk for a few years, and interest and experience would convince these people of the advantages of peace and civilization. But leave them to their own savage nature, refuse to the white settlers any military defence, and these Indians, whenever their resentment should be awakened, could at any time make an irruption into our settlements, burn, scalp, slay, and butcher, without mercy, and then retreat to their swamps and deserts before any force could be collected to resist them. It required no spirit of prophecy to foretell, with great certainty, the recurrence of scenes of this character on our frontiers, if the Government should neglect to erect forts, and, after they were erected, should be unable or unwilling to garrison them. And, when the blood of helpless women and children had thus been shed, would not those Senators feel bitter remorse, who, by opposing a measure so necessary and so salutary as that now before the Senate, had, to a certain extent, made themselves sharers in that blood?

Mr. L. had repeatedly heard it said that Missouri would find ample compensation, in the vast expenditure of public money on her borders, for the evils that might grow out of the congregation of such fiery and discordant tribes of Indians on her borders. She wanted wealth from no such sources. The God of nature had been most bountiful to her; and all her population earnestly desired was to be left in peace to cultivate the blessings so lavishly showered on them. Washed on the east by the "Father of Waters," some of those tributaries insulate with the silver lakes of the north; divided into nearly equal parts by the mighty Missouri river, whose sources lie hid in the recesses and caves of the Rocky Mountains, where silence loves to keep her long millenium of unbroken repose; a rich virgin soil; mountains pregnant with mineral wealth; extensive plains and noble forests, much reason has she for rejoicing, but let her rejoice with modesty.

Mr. CALHOUN made some remarks in rejoinder. He was understood as saying that his remarks had been intended to refer only to the Southern Indians, and not to those on our Northwestern border. The Senator from Missouri had represented the Indians in his neighborhood as far advanced in civilization, yet was demanding troops to protect his constituents against their ravages.

Mr. LINN explained. What he had said about advanced civilization referred not to the body of Indians on the frontiers generally, but to those only who were in the vicinity of Fort Leavenworth; and his argument had been, that, if similar forts should be distributed at short distances along our frontier, the same effects might be hoped for on a wider scale.

Mr. PRESTON went into a course of general remarks upon the bill, approving its provisions so far as related to the increase of the rank and file of the army. He dwelt on the deficiency of troops in Florida, the defenceless state of our fortifications on the seaboard, the broken state of the regiments, and the consequent inefficiency of our military force. He thought we might expect an occasional brush with some of the Indian tribes, though nothing like a general or permanent Indian war was at all likely to happen. In Texas, too, should the struggle be prosecuted by Mexico, it would be very desperate in its character, and might be expected unavoidably to extend itself more or less across the line into our own territory; in addition to which, it was not improbable that attempts would be made on both sides to enlist an Indian force. All these were reasons with him for believing that the numerical force of our army ought to be augmented.

As to that part of the bill which related to an increase of the staff, though he had been opposed to it at the last session, it had been only because he wished the department to point out the mode in which it should be arranged. This had now been done; and as the service here was suffering, by taking officers from their duties in the department to perform active duty in the field, he was satisfied that the staff also needed to be augmented.

Mr. CLAY inquired of Mr. P. whether he believed that an increase of the army on paper would secure an actual increase of its numbers in the field? If the army, when nominally containing but 6,000 men, could not be recruited, how was it likely to be filled up when nominally 12,000?

Mr. PRESTON replied, that all history had shown that there was generally a fixed relative proportion between the number of an army on the rolls and in actual service. It was probable that the same proportion would still continue; and though the army, as augmented, might not be full, it would be much larger than if the proposed enlargement by law did not take place.

Mr. BENTON went into some explanation as to officers who had been taken from the bureau and ordered into active service; and insisted that this very fact supplied a strong argument why their number should be increased.

After some further explanations and replies on this part of the general subject, the debate closed.

The bill was amended, on motion of Mr. MOORE, by striking out the 19th section, (requiring dismissed cadets to pay a sum to the Government;) and the bill was then passed, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Parker, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Talmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White, Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Ewing of Ohio, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Moore, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson—13.

On motion of Mr. WHITE,

The Senate went into the consideration of executive business; after which,
It adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 17.

GENERAL SCOTT.

The resolution offered by Mr. PRESTON, calling on the President for a copy of the proceedings of the late court of inquiry at Frederick, in relation to the Florida war, being under consideration—

Mr. PRESTON said there was a strong impression on the public mind that the result of the late court of inquiry at Frederick was not only exculpatory, but exceedingly honorable to General Scott. Mr. P. exulted in the honor which had accrued to the country by that general, and it was with deep regret that he saw the President did not share in these favorable sentiments. Looking at the late letter of the President on the subject, Mr. P. believed that if any case had ever been presented in which it was necessary for Congress and the country to know what had been done, this case was eminently such.

Since June last, the reputation of General Scott had undergone a severe canvass. He was then superseded in his command of the army of Florida, by means of the letter of a subordinate officer under his command to the editor of a newspaper in Washington city. The manner of his conducting the war was made the subject of investigation, and he was arraigned before a court. The subordinate officer who had accused him was successively advanced from the situation he then occupied till he was in the chief command in the very war from which he had been the instrument of removing General Scott by these extraordinary means, and was at the head of better and more numerous troops.

General Scott's character (Mr. P. said) was a historical one; and, whatever it was, it had been fairly won. In justice to him, in justice to us and to our national character, he ought to be vindicated from any accusations which he had not merited.

The result of the court of inquiry (Mr. P. said) had been made known to the country; and it therefore struck him as highly desirable that the proceedings of the court should be spread not only on the journal of the court, but publicly on the journals of Congress. The letter of accusation had been published in the Globe, and, as far as General Jesup's sentiments would go, public opinion was pre-occupied seven months ago. The opinions of the President also, in opposition to the views of the court martial, had been made known to the world. Under these circumstances, Mr. P. thought it very desirable that Congress should have something on the other side of the question, so that they might be able properly to make up their opinions, first, between Generals Jesup and Scott, and then between the court martial and the President of the United States. The President had thought proper to publish his dissent from the result of the court martial, and thus the seal of secrecy was to a certain extent broken on the proceedings of the court. The whole truth ought to be known on the subject; and if it should then appear that a great injury had been done, Mr. P. would have the vengeance of the people fall where it ought to fall.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said he concurred in the views of the Senator in relation to General Scott, and he felt much sympathy for him in the wrongs which he had suffered. But he understood that the official proceedings of the court martial had been resumed, and that it was not therefore in the President's power to send them.

Mr. WRIGHT moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, that they might obtain the papers, if they could be obtained; but he was confident they were not in possession of the President.

Mr. PRESTON considered such a reference unnecessary, as a direct call from the Senate ought to answer every purpose. He suggested that there might be copies of the proceedings here, though the original had been returned. He regretted if it were not so, as in that case there would not be time for any action of Congress at this session.

Mr. BENTON declared it a usurpation for either branch of Congress to call for papers of this kind till the result had been entirely made up by the authorities constituted for that purpose. It would also forestall the public judgment; and, if such a resolution should pass, it would seem as if the Senate were not wide awake; or, at best, it would indicate that they were in doubt whether the proper authorities had completed their action on the subject.

Mr. PRESTON repelled this charge. General Jesup and the President, he said, had already forestalled the public judgment; and the just order of inquiry now demanded that the main facts of the case should be publicly known.

Mr. CUTHBERT observed that nothing could possibly be more unfortunate for the army than a readiness on the part of Congress to mingle up questions of military discipline, and the standing and conduct of military men, with the strifes of party politics. Nothing could be more utterly at war with all those high and chivalrous feelings which ought ever to distinguish the soldier. Mr. C. should greatly regret that Congress should now hastily rush into such a practice. The investigation of this subject they could commence whenever they please; but, when commenced, it could not be terminated with the same facility. What the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] chiefly objected to was, that the President should publish a part of the finding of the court. It was not in the opinion of the President that the error lay. His friend would not assert that the President erred there. The President did not err. The uniform practice on the part of courts of inquiry was first to furnish an abstract of the evidence submitted to them; then their reasoning upon that evidence; and finally their sentence in the case. But here the court had pronounced a bare acquittal. Such a form of proceeding was not for the advantage of General Scott himself, in whose favor the sentence had been given. General Scott, if he understood his own interest, should desire an abstract of the case, presenting the facts as they were proved, so that he might fully establish his innocence, or might authorize his country to pronounce a different verdict from the court, according as the case might be.

There was another point in this case which ought not to be overlooked; and that was the extreme irregularity of the court in referring to the conduct of General Jesup. Although the conduct of that officer was never submitted to them for examination and judgment, they had pronounced a most bitter and unmeasured censure upon him. This alone formed a sufficient ground for the President returning to them their report. It was most unfortunate for the army that a spirit of faction seemed to have taken possession of even its officers, from the highest to the lowest. They seemed unconscious of that delicacy of honor, that reserving pride, which formed one of the highest distinctions of the true soldier. An officer possessed by the right spirit would never choose to lift that veil which covers, with a sacred and proper secrecy, whatever belonged to the conduct of a superior. But we were called daily to witness a spirit the reverse of this. It was a spirit which every man who loved his country, and felt for the character of the army, ought promptly to discourage.

Mr. BENTON said he had looked slightly into this case, and he understood the court of inquiry to have been directed to report the facts. Sometimes courts of this character delivered simply their opinion, without giving the facts; sometimes they reported the facts alone, without expressing any opinion; but here they were required to do both—not merely to express an opinion on the conduct of General Scott, but to return the facts on which that opinion was founded. The paper put forth by the President objected to the finding of the court, because the facts were not reported, and because he wished to examine them for himself. The disapproval is not of the opinion expressed by the court, but of their omission to give the facts of the case. He thought it would be an act of usurpation, should the Senate, in this stage of the business, attempt to interfere and forestall public opinion, before the President had expressed his judgment either one way or the other. The President had, as yet, expressed no opinion of the officer, but only of the course pursued by the court.

Mr. PRESTON said that he agreed entirely with the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. CRITTENDEN] in the regret expressed by him at the factious spirit which seemed to prevail in the army. The spectacle was truly a melancholy one. Our military defenders seemed to be possessed, throughout, with a spirit of rivalry and of mutual hostility. It might present a curious question, should the causes be investigated which had led to this state of things. The whole of this affair in relation to General Scott had originated in such a spirit. It had been occasioned by a direct attack of a subordinate officer against his superior in command, who was at the time acting with him in the field. It assailed his military character, and disapproved and opposed his plan of the campaign. The communication in which it was contained had been forwarded, not to the Department of War, but to the editor of the Globe newspaper, to be by him presented privately to the President of the United States. The President, with his characteristic frankness, instead of holding this as a secret communication, immediately made it public, and placed it on the files of the Department. What could more strikingly exhibit the spirit which has been so well described by the Senator from Georgia? There seemed, throughout the army, to be a want of subordination on the part of its officers; and Mr. P. thought it the duty of Congress to assert the obligations of military authority. In this case, the causes of the failure of the campaign in Florida had been under investigation by a court of inquiry, and, as a part of the testimony in the case, the letter of General Jesup had been referred to. The court declared that, in their judgment, the allegations contained in that letter against General Scott are without foundation; and they express, with some freedom, their opinion of the accuser. This, Mr. P. believed, was common in courts martial. But, all this apart, admitting that that portion of the report was supererogatory, was the President to cut out of this report so much as made against General Scott, and yet were the Senate to be told that the proceeding was still private and inchoate? It was not private. The President had published it to the world. Was he to select just so much as he pleased, and keep back the residue? Was whatever made against an officer to be published, while that which was in his favor was withheld from publication? The President complained of the court for not having reported facts; but Mr. P. insisted that the court had reported facts of the utmost importance. He here quoted the report, to show that the court had declared that there had been no improper delay on the part of General Scott. This, surely, was one important fact. Then, that the earliest measures had been taken to provide arms, &c., for the troops. Here was another important fact. That, on his arrival, he had found the men almost utterly destitute of all which they ought to possess. This was another fact. Then, that arms had been distributed to the volunteers. This was another. That the plan of General Scott had been well devised; and so on. Here were facts detailed as fully as in a special verdict. The court had referred to the testimony as fully establishing them, and had thereupon acquitted General Scott. Their report was a direct assertion of facts, and of all the leading and prominent facts in the case. The President, having published this report, and accompanied it with his dissent, he was utterly precluded from saying that the matter was still private, incomplete, and before the court for investigation. If, indeed, he had not given publicity to this document, his dissent would have been in the nature of an interlocutory decree, and it might have still been said that the affair was before the court; but, having chosen the other course, this plea could no longer be offered.

Mr. P. said he had entered with reluctance upon this subject. He had waited to see whether some one more competent to do it justice would not take it up, until a motion was made to go into executive business; he then could no longer refrain, as well from a personal feeling of friendship to General Scott as from a regard to the public good. Mr. P. was determined that officer should neither be crushed by a direct blow, nor undermined by indirection. He lamented the position in which General Scott was placed, and he lamented every moment's delay which stood between him and a full acquittal.

Mr. RIVES observed that the question was not now on the final adoption of the resolution which had been offered, but simply on the reference. The only anxiety he felt in reference to the matter was, that the course taken should be the most proper one, and should best insure to General Scott a full measure of justice. As to the opinion of the President on the merits of the decision, or the merits of the proceedings themselves, he should not enter into any discussion, because he deemed it premature. The Senate had not the necessary lights on which to proceed. The only question they had now to decide was, what was the proper course to be taken with the resolution? He did not wish the Senate to adopt any act which should prove nugatory. If it was true that the proceedings had been remitted to the court to be remodelled, and were not in the possession of the Executive, then the adoption of the resolution would be nugatory, and could lead to no result. He thought that that fact presented a proper subject for the preliminary inquiry of a committee. Mr. R. said that he agreed in opinion with the chairman of the Military Committee [Mr. BENTON] in thinking that it would be a violation of rule, and a usurpation of power, should the Senate ask for the proceedings of the court of inquiry before the final judgment of the President thereupon had been given. He thought, too, that the language of the resolution was a little too strong; but of that he did not pretend to be so good a judge, as it was rather a question for military gentlemen. He asked whether any case existed in which the opinion of a court martial had ever been called for till its final consummation by the President. He was, indeed, aware that there was a peculiarity in this case, from the fact that the opinion of the President had been expressed before the proceeding was finally closed. How far that might take the case out of the general rule, he was not prepared to say, unlearned as he was in military affairs. He hoped he had not been betrayed into too ardent an expression of the feelings he cherished towards General Scott, whose character he considered as forming a prominent part in the history of the republic, as well as of the moral riches of that Commonwealth it was his honor to represent. He could entertain no doubt, whatever might be the personal opinion of the President, that public sentiment would do General Scott ample justice. In the mean while, Mr. R. had no wish to mix up a military question with the fleeting contests of party, and his main solicitude was to prevent this. But a little delay would be incurred, should the Senate delay its action on this subject, as the proceedings had been remitted to the court, not for the purpose of having additional evidence taken, but only that the evidence now in possession of the court should be collated, and the conclusion deduced from the facts of the case. Full and complete testimony must have been already taken, and the digesting of it could occupy but a few days. The whole would then be returned to the President, and Mr. R. felt assured that no unreasonable delay would afterwards be suffered to take place. The reputation of General Scott was of too durable a material to be affected by this short delay. While Mr. R. yielded to none in patriotic and personal solicitude to vindicate that officer from every unjust charge against him, he was anxious that course should be pursued which should most readily evolve the unbiased opinion of the whole nation upon his character and conduct. It seemed to him most proper, especially as the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] who had moved the resolution, was himself a member of the Military Committee, that the resolution should be referred to that committee. He considered this as the course which would best consult the permanent fame of General Scott, and, in that belief, should vote for the commitment.

Mr. CUTHBERT observed that it was by no means an uncommon thing that mere personal considerations should operate to retard debate, but, in his own case, he had no desire that this should happen. The Senate were fully capable of understanding what had been already said, and there could be no need to repeat it. He was willing that the resolution should take either of the courses which had been proposed. He had no objection to its being referred, and he was willing that it should be laid upon the table. He had risen now to offer but a single observation. The Senator from South Carolina had taken up the paper containing the finding of the court, and, reading one sentence after another, had asked, is not this a fact? and is not this a fact? Mr. C. replied, no. It was the expression of an opinion deduced from a mass of facts. It stated the opinion of the court, and nothing more. Was this good ground for such a report as the President demanded? His friend was of opinion that, in respect to General Jesup, the court had done nothing but what they were warranted to do. Mr. C. thought in this he erred. Was it the practice of courts to deliver strong opinions of censure on the character of witnesses who testified before them? He believed not. General Jesup had appeared before the court only as a witness. The court had a right to say, if so, they thought his allegations were not sustained, but they had no right to pronounce a severe censure upon his conduct.

Mr. STRANGE made some remarks. He was understood to say that he apprehended much danger of the Senate's getting into a political dispute on a military question. The chief complaint of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] was, that the President had published. But what had he published? That which could injure any one? Had he refused to sanction the sentence of the court, and given no reasons for the refusal? If he had done this, there might have been ground for complaint. But the President had not so much as declared that he did dissent from the sentence. All he had said was, that he could not confirm, for want of a more distinct statement of the facts. Until these were laid before him, he could not form a judgment whether the decision of the court had been right or wrong. The court themselves admitted that there had been a delay. Mr. S. did not say by whom it had been occasioned. The President, by sending back the proceedings, had occasioned no delay that was improper. As a judicial officer, he could not hasten to judgment. It was true that the President complained that the court had gone out of their way to censure General Jesup, but it certainly did not lie in the mouth of the defenders of General Scott to complain that the President protected General Jesup. Believing that any interference by the Senate would only operate to injure General Scott, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The question being immediately put, it was negatived: Ayes 17, noes 23.

Mr. PRESTON asked, when the President received General Jesup's letter, accusing General Scott, did he send that back, and call for the testimony? No. Although the letter necessarily opened the way for the promotion of him that wrote it, and was therefore liable to every possible suspicion which personal interest could create, the President called for no testimony in that case. General Scott was instantly superseded, and transferred to Frederick, while the informer against him was raised to his place; but now, when the court found that the character of General Jesup was involved, and his allegations unsustained, General Scott was hung up in prolonged suspense, while the President called for testimony. General Scott had been acquitted, but, instead of being restored to his station at the head of an advancing army, he must wait for testimony. Mr. P. said he was glad to see the President of the United States cautious of the reputation of officers in the United States army; but it was a most extraordinary spectacle to see the commander-in-chief of an army thus seized upon, at the suggestion of a private letter; and then, when the court of inquiry ventured to suggest any thing against his second in command, they are immediately censured, and their sentence sent back to them. Had a letter been sent to the editor of the Globe, secretly assailing the character and conduct of General Jesup, and the court had expressed its disapprobation of General Scott for such a course, would it have incurred the same measure of presidential displeasure? Mr. P. could well comprehend the feeling which had elicited this expression of indignant feeling from the officers who composed that court of inquiry. Honorable men felt jealous of the characters of high military commanders, and felt themselves called upon by duty to express their opinion of one who could secretly assail them. Yet, the moment they do so, the Senate are reminded of the sacredness of individual character. Where was the sacredness of military character when General Scott had been hurled from his command on the letter of an informer, and for three months subjected to all the vexation and delays of a military prosecution, when no human being, acquainted with the facts of the case, believed that the slightest blame could justly attach to him? He had been accused of having too much military learning, and of too much strategy in the planning of his campaign; but what had the course of the campaign since then demonstrated? History had vindicated the correctness of his views; every failure which had since occurred contributed its proof to the same point. The course of those who had superseded him led to the same conclusion. The existing state of things was precisely that which General Scott had predicted; and those now in command were walking in the very steps which Scott had said they would be compelled to pursue. Every movement in Florida had but confirmed his military knowledge, and fulfilled that which his military foresight had predicted. There remained against his conduct not the shadow of a shade.

Mr. CUTHBERT said he should not reply to the Senator from South Carolina. He was merely desirous that that course should be pursued which would, in the end, be most beneficial to the cause of his friend. The Senator had spoken of General Scott as General Scott of Chippeway; and was not General Jesup Jesup of Chippeway? He had spoken of him as General Scott of Bridgewater; but did he forget that General Jesup was also General Jesup of Bridgewater? A braver or more thoroughly honest man breathed not the breath of life.

Mr. PRESTON said he had not compared the men. He had compared the conduct of the President to the two.

The question was now put on referring the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs, and decided in the affirmative: Ayes 28, noes not counted.

R. W. MEADE.

On motion of Mr. KENT, the Senate proceeded to the further consideration of the bill for the relief of the executrix of Richard W. Meade.

Mr. CLAYTON addressed the Senate at length, in opposition to the bill.

A long discussion followed, in which Messrs. HUBBARD, BLACK, CLAY, DAVIS, and WALKER, participated.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to amend the bill by striking out the second section, and inserting a provision that the board constituted by the bill should examine the claim, and report the result to the Senate, with the reasons therefor, at the next session of Congress.

Mr. BLACK moved to amend this amendment, so that the award of the commissioners, if any, should be paid to the claimant by the Secretary of the Treasury; and if nothing should be found due to the claimant, the board should then report, &c.

This amendment was adopted: Yeas 25, nays 15.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted, and the bill was passed by the following vote, the yeas and nays having been ordered on the call of Mr. HUBBARD:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Grundy, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Rives, Sevier, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clayton, Dana, Davis, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Moore, Page, Parker, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Strange, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wright—17.

REMISSION OF DUTIES.

Mr. WRIGHT said he arose to ask a favor of the Senate. It was late, and he knew well the body was already wearied with the labors of the day; but hoped a compliance with his request would not protract the session materially, or prove a heavy tax upon the patience of the members present. He moved that Senate bill No. 88, entitled "A bill to remit the duties upon certain goods destroyed by fire at the late conflagration in the city of New York," be now taken up, and that the orders of the day, general and special, previous to that bill, be postponed for that purpose. Mr. W. said he would make a single remark, as applicable to his motion. The bill contained a single principle: that of remitting or refunding the duties upon goods burned in the original packages, as imported. To the details of the bill he believed no Senator would find any objection, and he was now desirous to make a few amendments, purely of detail, and let the bill pass informally, if it should be the preference of the Senate, to its engrossment; and, upon the third reading, the principle of the bill might be considered and discussed. He did not propose to bring on that discussion now, and, should the Senate gratify him by taking up the bill, he would promise not to occupy its time this evening by debate.

The question was put, and the bill taken up for consideration.

Mr. WRIGHT then moved several amendments, all of which were adopted, and all of which he said were offered in pursuance of suggestions made to him by the most respectable committee now in attendance in behalf of the suffering merchants, or by the persons whom it was proposed to constitute commissioners for adjudication upon these claims. These persons were the district attorney of the United States for the southern district of New York, the collector of the port of New York, and the naval officer of the said port.

The bill, as originally drawn and reported by the committee, required that all the claims should be examined, and the testimony and judgment of the commissioners returned to the Secretary of the Treasury, and acted upon by him, before any claim could be paid. The object of the first several amendments he had offered was to permit the commissioners to return to the Secretary the testimony taken before them, and their decisions upon any one or more of the claims at any time; that the Secretary may act upon them, and permit the certificates to issue, while other claims shall be in the course of investigation.

In addition to these amendments, he had offered two additional sections to the bill. The first of those sections was to extend to such goods as had been partially (but not entirely) destroyed in the original packages the provisions of the bill, and a relief to the owners of such goods proportioned to the damage and destruction caused by the same conflagration. If the principle of the bill was sound, he could see no reason why that principle should not be extended to these partial sufferers, in proportion to their losses, as well as to those whose property had been totally destroyed; and the section contained an express prohibition against its extension to goods damaged or destroyed after the packages had been broken and the goods taken therefrom.

The other section, Mr. W. said, was an authority to the commissioners to employ a clerk, who should be paid out of the public Treasury. It had been suggested to him to provide in the bill for payment to the commissioners for their services. These persons were all officers of the Government, and two of them, the collector and naval officer, salary officers; and although the district attorney stood upon a somewhat different footing, he had concluded, after mature reflection, that it was not best to incorporate into this bill any provision for the compensation of any of these officers. It was impossible to say what amount of labor it would impose upon them, or how much of their time would be required in the performance of the duty imposed. Knowing those officers personally as he did, he had the fullest confidence that they would all cheerfully discharge the duties imposed upon them by the bill, and that without any previous provision for compensation beyond that pertaining to their existing offices. When the services shall have been performed, and the labor can be perfectly known, Congress can act with certainty in the matter. That these commissioners, however, would require a competent clerk, would be apparent to every one. The claims were numerous, and the proofs might be voluminous. The returns to the Secretary of the Treasury, required by the bill, would require entire copies of many, if not all, the papers before the commissioners, and the issuing of the certificates provided for would require great clerical labor. Hence he had proposed the provision for a clerk.

These amendments having been adopted, Mr. CALHOUN inquired of Mr. WRIGHT if he could state about the amount of the claims which would be presented under the bill?

Mr. WRIGHT replied that he thanked the Senator from South Carolina for making the inquiry. It had not been, and was not now, his object to discuss the bill, but the inquiry made it his duty to state that a list of the claims, containing the names of the claimants and the amount of each claim, had been furnished to the committee, had been by the committee presented to the Senate with their report of the bill, and was now upon the printed files of every Senator. From the statement, it appeared that there were one hundred and thirty-six individuals and firms claiming a return of duties upon goods destroyed in original packages, and that the amount of their claims, in the whole, was $418,747 39. The number and amount of these claims had been thus obtained. Immediately after the fire, a large committee of merchants had been appointed, to inquire and ascertain, as far as that could be done, the amount of losses, and the names of the sufferers. At that time a list of the sufferers, supposed to be nearly perfect, was made. In December, now last past, that committee had made a call, by a publication in the newspapers of the city, upon all persons who had claims for remission of duties upon goods burned, to come in and authenticate their claims, with a view to their presentation to Congress. These one hundred and thirty-six individuals and firms had appeared, and verified their claims by the affidavits of the respective claimants, which affidavits were now before the Senate with the bill under consideration. These were claims exclusively for goods destroyed in original packages as imported—the only class of claims provided for in the bill. In addition to this list, (Mr. W. said,) he was informed there was another claim, amounting to about $70,000, which was not now presented to Congress, because the subject of the goods destroyed was in litigation between the city of New York and the owners. These were goods destroyed by blowing up with powder the buildings in which they were stored, to arrest the progress of the fire. The buildings were blown up by the order of the authorities of the city, and the owners of the goods thus destroyed were claiming from the city entire compensation for their losses. They therefore could not now come before Congress to ask a remission of duties. The city was resisting these claims against it; and, until a decision of the litigation, it could not be known which of the parties would be entitled to the remission. Still, he was informed that a claim, to the extent he had named, existed in consequence of the destruction of these goods; and it could not be important to the United States how the litigation should terminate, as neither the amount nor character of the claim upon this Government would be thereby altered. This (Mr. W. said) would make the amount of these claims about $500,000—between $490,000 and $500,000.

There was another uncertainty as to the amount, which he would here mention. Certain individuals and firms, who filed with the committee of merchants claims for remission of duties last year, had not yet appeared, in pursuance of the call made in December last, to authenticate their claims. He had already stated that 136 individuals and firms had appeared and testified to claims amounting to $418,000, as the duties upon goods destroyed in unbroken packages as imported. In addition to these, 97 individuals and firms had appeared and testified in the same manner to claims amounting to $156,394.57, as the duties paid and payable upon goods destroyed after the packages had been broken and the goods distributed in the shops. No provision was made or proposed for this class of claims. Mr. W. said it was matter of deep regret to him that these claimants could not be relieved; but the Committee on Finance had not believed it safe or wise to extend the principle of the bill to any other than goods destroyed in unbroken packages. In addition to these, there were found upon the list of claimants, prepared immediately after the fire, the names of 32 individuals and firms who had not appeared to authenticate their claims in any manner. From the former list it was ascertained that the amount of claims preferred by these 32 houses was $67,976.42; but as it was impossible to say what portion of the sum was for duties on unbroken and what on broken packages, it was not in his power to say how much these claims would add to the amount to be drawn from the public Treasury, if the bill under consideration should become a law.

Mr. CLAY here suggested adding a proviso to some proper section of the bill, that no more than a given amount of money should be drawn from the Treasury under it, and proposed to fix that amount at $500,000.

Mr. WRIGHT said if the honorable Senator would make the sum $600,000, as he hoped he would, he would accept the amendment as proposed.

After some little conversation,

Mr. CLAY adopted Mr. WRIGHT's suggestion, and moved the proviso, limiting the amount to $600,000.

Mr. CLAYTON objected to any limitation; and, upon taking the vote, the amendment was negative; when the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

[The bill was read the third time on the next day, passed, and sent to the House for concurrence.]

The Senate then adjourned.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18.

Mr. BENTON presented the credentials of Hon. LEWIS F. LINN, re-elected a Senator of the United States from the State of Missouri, for six years from and after the 4th of March next.

PAPERS OF MR. MADISON.

On motion of Mr. ROBBINS, the joint resolution authorizing the purchase of the manuscripts of the late President Madison was taken up and considered.

Mr. ROBBINS rose and spoke as follows:

Mr. President: I consider this work of Mr. Madison, now proposed to be given to the world under the patronage of this Government, as the most valuable one to mankind that has appeared since the days when Bacon gave to the world his Novum Organon. That produced that revolution in analytics, which has produced the immense superiority of the moderns over the ancients in the knowledge of nature, and in the improvement of the condition of human life—the fruit of that knowledge. With Bacon it was a mere theory; a theory, however, which he fondly cherished, and confidently believed would be prolific, as it has been, of the most magnificent results; but in the hands of Newton, and of his other disciples and followers, it became a practical guide to those astonishing discoveries which, in their consequences, have, among other things, converted those elements of nature before supposed to be, only to be controlled by the same Almighty hand which formed them, into the ministers and agents of man, obedient to his will, and subservient to his use. It has enabled man to draw the veil from the face of nature; to inspect her mechanism; and to avail himself of her principles for the augmentation of his own power. It has given him power after power; and is still going on to give him power upon power, as his researches go on in exploring her boundless fields, and in making discovery upon discovery; and to this growing increase of human power, no human being can now assign the possible limits. True, it has not enabled man, as it was fabled of him by the poets of old, to steal the fire from the heavens; but it has enabled him to do more and better—it has enabled him to become an humble pupil in the school of the Divine Artist; and, by studying his models, to copy his agencies, though at the immeasurable distance which separates a finite from the Infinite Being.

As this Organon of Bacon has been the beacon-light to mankind to guide him to the true philosophy, and to the improvement of his physical condition, so will this work of Madison, as I trust and predict, be his beacon-light to guide him to the true science of free government, and to the improvement of his political condition. The science of free government, the most difficult of all the sciences, by far the most difficult, while it is the most important to mankind; of all the slowest in growth, the latest in maturity. Not the science which has penetrated the causes and explained to mankind the phenomena of the heavens is so difficult; that has been found of easier and more rapid attainment. Indeed, the difficulties to be overcome in evolving this science are so great, that we are to wonder less at its tardy advances, than at its final success. In the first place, it requires the deepest and most perfect insight into the nature of man: of man not only in his general nature, but as modified by society; which every where has superinduced and clothed him with a second nature, denominated habit; and that as diversified as the countries he inhabits. Then it requires that faculty of comprehensive combination, which is the rarest of all the gifts of God to man, and which, whenever and wherever it appears, seems destined to produce an era in human affairs; a faculty of combining into a whole, where the elements to be combined are so various as to be almost infinite; a whole perfect in relation to all its parts, and its parts perfect in relation to the whole. Besides, the perfect model of the free government is not like the perfect model of any other science. Of every other science, the perfect model any where is the perfect model every where, and every where alike perfect. The perfect watch at Washington, for instance, is the perfect watch at Canton, and so all over the globe; but not so the perfect model of the free government: that, though the principles are the same every where, the form varies as the circumstances vary, of the people by whom it is established; to which circumstances it must always be adjusted and made to conform.

Here, with us, the difficulties to be overcome in this achievement, from the nature of the elements to be combined, were stupendously great. In looking back to those difficulties, that they were overcome at all appears to me now little less than a prodigy; and it still fills me with astonishment. For here a combination was required that would produce a structure, perfectly anomalous in the history of human Governments; and such a structure was produced, and as perfect as it was novel. Here were a people, spread and spreading over a vast territory—that stretching and to stretch almost from the rising to the setting sun—this scattered and countless multitude were to be ruled in freedom as one people, and by the popular will—that will be uncontrollable in itself, and controlling every thing. Such an achievement, the most enlightened friends of freedom and human rights, in all countries and in all ages, had deemed to be morally and physically impossible. Besides, here were thirteen States, and all the other States to be formed out of that vast territory, without being destroyed as States, to be so combined as to form, in the general aspect, but one simple Government; with all the unity and energy of one simple Government; powerful alike to assert and maintain all their rights as a nation, against all other nations; and the rights of every individual, all over this boundless domain, against every aggressor; that is, a Government equally fitted and efficient for all the purposes of peace and war. Such an achievement, often before, and under much more favorable circumstances, because upon a much more limited scale, had been attempted, but never before accomplished; as is but too well attested by the histories and the destinies of all the confederacies that before had ever existed on the earth.

Those confederacies had all proved signal failures as effective Governments, both in war and peace; and entirely for the want of that form of structure and principle of combination that would reconcile absolute sovereignty in the nation with sovereignty in the States, as parts of one nation—as consistent and harmonious parts of one supreme sovereignty. This principle, unexplored and unknown before, was developed and displayed, most happily so, in the structure of our confederate and national republic.

This work now proposed to be published will unfold to us all the steps of that diversified analysis and discovery which lead to this happy and splendid result.

Those who think (if any think) that the result itself—namely, the constitution—of itself and by itself, will be enough for the instruction of mankind on this subject, are much mistaken. For there is a vast difference between the knowledge which is acquired analytically, and that which is acquired synthetically; the latter is but isolated knowledge; the former is knowledge that is the consequence of other knowledge. Synthesis gives to us a general truth, but acquired in a mode that is barren of other fruit; analysis not only gives to us the same general truth, but puts us on the track of invention and discovery, and is always fertile of other and often of better fruit; synthesis carries us to a fountain head, but never beyond; but analysis carries us beyond, and to the fountain of that fountain; it places us upon an eminence that overtops and overlooks the general truth in the wide survey it commands and gives to us; and as to that general truth, it enables us not only to comprehend it more perfectly, but to apply it more successfully. This is at once a branch and the great instrument of that primal philosophy of which Bacon speaks, and whose cultivation he so highly recommends—the philosophy of philosophy; the common mother of all the sciences, and by which alone their boundaries can be extended. He compares it to the Berecynthia, whom the poets of old fabled to be the mother of all the gods:

"Omnes cœlicolas, omnes supera alta Teneutes."

Of such is the nature, and such will be the fruits to mankind, of the work now proposed to be given to the world.

Further to awaken our sensibility on this subject, I need not remind the Senate how much we owe to a name that is to render the name of this country respectable in every other on this globe; the clarum et venerabile nomen. Nations have lived upon the earth who have become extinct, and been lost to the memory of mankind; but never when the clarum et venerabile nomen had illustrated their annals. The clarum et venerabile nomen is the true elixir of national immortality. What has this country, what can she ever have, that would be an equivalent to her in exchange for the name of her Washington? that star of stars in the diadems that sparkle on the brow of nations? Not the diadem that sparkles on the brow of Greece, not the diadem that sparkles on the brow of Rome, has one of equal brilliancy. No; it stands peerless on the earth, and alone in glory. Though it can never be a contest whose name is to do the most honor to our country, and, more than all others, to carry her name, associated with his, and emblazoned by his, down through all the endless generations of mankind to follow, for all the endless ages of time to come, yet among the names to cluster around his, and to form the constellation (may it multiply to a galaxy) of American worthies, not one will ever shine with a purer, with a brighter, or more inextinguishable lustre than that of Madison.

If, then, this appropriation was merely to express a nation's gratitude to a nation's benefactor, it would be the least it would become her to make. But, besides that, we are to consider that it is to purchase for this country, and for mankind, a treasure of instruction, whose value no money can measure, no figures can express.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he had listened with pleasure and delight to the venerable gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. ROBBINS,] and he coincided in opinion with him, that we were indebted to Mr. Madison, at least as much as to any other man, for the form of government under which we live. Indeed, he might be said to have done more for our institutions than any man now living, or that had gone before him.

A great and efficient aid he was, undoubtedly, in forming the Government. But there was another great act, which would immortalize him in the eye of posterity—the profound and glorious views which he took of our Government in his celebrated Virginia report. In his opinion, that was by far the ablest document that issued from the pen of Mr. Madison—one from which Mr. C. had derived more information, and a profounder insight into our Government, than all the other documents he had perused.

Now, if he understood the object in view, it was in direct opposition to the great and fundamental principles of Mr. Madison himself, an adherence to which, he (Mr. C.) solemnly believed, would give durability to the Government under which we were now living.

He wished at some other time (as he was not prepared at this time) to be heard on the subject, when he would endeavor to satisfy the Senate that, in giving our assent to the appropriation asked for, we should not honor the name of Madison. Mr. C. would postpone what he had to say until the third reading of the resolution; and, in the mean time, Senators would have an opportunity of coming to a full understanding of the subject.

The resolution was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CHOCTAW RESERVATIONS.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to adjust certain claims to reservations of land under the 14th article of the treaty of 1830, with the Choctaw Indians.

Mr. BLACK moved to amend the bill by striking out three of its sections, and substituting others in their place.

Mr. B. explained the circumstances of the case, which were in substance these. The Choctaw lands were obtained by the United States in virtue of a treaty held at Dancing Rabbit creek. It was not without great difficulty that that treaty was effected; the leading chiefs and the greater part of the nation being strenuously opposed to ceding their lands and removing west of the Mississippi. They actually refused to treat, and left the ground, and the treaty was at last made with a comparatively small number of chiefs; nor could it have been effected at all, but for the insertion of an article which provided that such Choctaws as were desirous to remain, and should notify that desire within a given time to the United States agent, should have lands reserved for them, in the following proportion: every head of a family, one section; for every child over ten years of age, half a section; and for every child under ten years, a quarter of a section. The agent was a man of intemperate and careless habits; and when the Choctaws applied to him, giving notice of their intention to remain on their lands, he in some cases refused to receive the application, and in other cases to record it. Proclamation having been made for the sale of the lands, a number of these Indians, who supposed that they were safe in the possession of their lands, had the land sold from under them. Application was immediately made to the President of the United States, who, on being aware of the hardship of the case, issued an order reserving from sale enough land to make up to these Indians the loss they had sustained, and appointed an agent to locate these floating titles, subject to the subsequent decision of Congress. These locations were familiarly known by the title of contingent locations, and were laid down on the very best lands in the State of Mississippi. As soon as it came to be known that this provision was made for the satisfying of the claims of Choctaw Indians whose lands had been improperly sold, those claims became an object of eager speculation. Large speculating companies and sub-companies were formed, to take advantage of this state of things. Agents were sent by them across the Mississippi, to that portion of the nation which had removed under the treaty, and a large number of claims were collected from among them. All these claims were located on the banks of the Mississippi, or on rich bottoms and islands in the neighborhood of the bayous, and embraced some thousands of sections of the finest land in Mississippi. A bill had been introduced at the last session, by the Committee on Private Land Claims, the effect of which would be to confirm all these locations, and thus to sanction one of the most stupendous frauds which had been attempted since the days of the famous Yazoo scheme. The object of Mr. BLACK's amendment was so to alter the bill of the last year (which has not become a law) as to prevent the confirmation of these claims, and to provide for their examination, by a board of commissioners, before whom the Choctaws were to prove their claims in person, and which declared all previous sales of their floating rights null and void.

Mr. B. said he was willing to modify his amendment, if it was thought best, so as to allow to the Indians who should make good their rights before the commissioners the amount in money for which their lands were sold.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, advocated the amendment, though he considered it as not sufficiently guarded.

Mr. BAYARD replied at length, vindicating the bill as reported last year by the Committee on Private Land Claims, (to which he belongs.) He contended that the bill did no more than fulfil the treaty stipulation to which the faith of the United States had been pledged. The Indians who wished to remain were entitled to the amount of land which that treaty gave them. By the gross and oppressive misconduct of our own agent, they had been deprived of these rights, and turned out of house and home, when reposing on the good faith of this Government. It was indispensable that somebody should have taken up their cause, and made an effort to get them justice; and it was rather too much to expect that persons who had gone to great trouble and expense for that purpose should be so very disinterested as not to require some share in the land which, but for them, would have been lost entirely. He denied, however, that the bill of the last session went unconditionally to confirm the contingent locations. It appointed a board of commissioners, before whom the rights of the Indians must be substantiated by competent proof, such as would be received at common law, before a court of justice. He disclaimed all desire to encourage speculation, or foster speculators on Indian rights; and he therefore introduced several amendments into the bill, with a view to obviate the evils which Mr. BLACK had stated; one of which provided that the land to be given to the Indian in exchange for that of which he had been deprived should not greatly exceed it in value. Another of them declared all compacts made by the Indians for the disposal of these claims to be null and void, and reserved a decision upon them until the next session of Congress.

Mr. WALKER, in pursuance of instructions from the Legislature of Mississippi, strenuously opposed the bill as reported by the committee. He also opposed the amendments proposed by Mr. BAYARD, greatly preferring that of his colleague, [Mr. BLACK,] on which he demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. PRESTON, after a course of general observations on the practical difficulty and even impossibility of making any arrangement in favor of these Indians which would not immediately be seized upon by the superior sagacity of the whites, and converted to their own advantage, suggested that the best plan of getting rid of the whole difficulty would be to allow the Choctaws, who had been unjustly deprived of their lands, to enter the same quantity in any lands of the United States subject to private entry; not that he had the least idea that they would hold these lands, for he had no doubt that, before a year was passed, they would all be converted into money, which money would all be expended in a drunken frolic. But this would satisfy the claims of justice on the Government, and those Choctaws would then be left to follow the destiny of the residue of their tribe, who had gone west of the Mississippi river.

Mr. WHITE thought the most prudent course would be to appoint a board of commissioners to make diligent inquiry into the facts of the case; the number of heads of families; the number of their children over and under ten years of age; the notification of their intention to remain; the lands they had occupied, and the prices at which those lands had sold; and to make a full and accurate return to Congress; and let Congress decide on the whole case, as thus presented.

[The above presents a concise view of the substance of a debate of a protracted and desultory character, which occupied the Senate till a late hour.]

The bill was then laid over till Monday.

THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, presented the following report:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States of the 6th instant, with the accompanying documents, on the subject of the present state of our relations with Mexico, report:

That they have given to this subject that serious and deliberate consideration which its importance demands, and which any circumstances calculated to interrupt our friendly relations with the Mexican republic would necessarily insure. From the documents submitted to the committee, it appears that, ever since the revolution of 1822, which separated Mexico from Spain, and even for some years before, the United States have had repeated causes of just complaint against the Mexican authorities. From time to time, as these insults and injuries have occurred, demands for satisfaction and redress have been made by our successive public ministers at the city of Mexico; but almost all these demands have hitherto proved unavailing.

The United States and Mexico.

It might have been expected that, after the date of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded between the two republics on the fifth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-one, these causes of complaint would have ceased to exist. That treaty so clearly defines the rights and the duties of the respective parties, that it seems almost impossible to misunderstand or to mistake them. The committee, notwithstanding, regret to be compelled to state that all the causes of complaint against Mexico, which have been specially noticed in the correspondence referred to them, have occurred since the conclusion of this treaty.

We forbear from entering into any minute detail of our grievances. The enumeration of each individual case, with its attendant circumstances, even if the committee were in possession of sufficient materials to make such a compilation, is rendered unnecessary, from the view which they have taken of the subject. These cases are all referred to in the document No. 81, entitled "Claims on Mexico," in the letter of instructions from Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Ellis of the 20th of July, 1836, and in the subsequent correspondence between Mr. Ellis and Mr. Monasterio, the acting Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs.

If the Government of the United States were disposed to exact strict and prompt redress from Mexico, your committee might, with justice, recommend an immediate resort to war or reprisals. On this subject, however, they give their hearty assent to the following sentiments, contained in the message of the President. He says: "The length of time since some of the injuries have been committed, the repeated and unavailing applications for redress, the wanton character of some of the outrages upon the property and persons of our citizens, and upon the officers and flag of the United States, independent of recent insults to this Government and people by the late extraordinary Mexican minister, would justify, in the eyes of all nations, immediate war. That remedy, however, should not be used by just and generous nations, confiding in their strength, for injuries committed, if it can be honorably avoided; and it has occurred to me that, considering the present embarrassed condition of that country, we should act with both wisdom and moderation, by giving to Mexico one more opportunity to atone for the past, before we take redress into our own hands."

In affording this opportunity to the Mexican Government, the committee would suggest the propriety of pursuing the form required by the 34th article of the treaty with Mexico, in all cases to which it may be applicable. This article provides that "if (what, indeed, cannot be expected) any of the articles contained in the present treaty shall be violated or infringed in any manner whatever, it is stipulated that neither of the contracting parties will order or authorize any acts of reprisal, nor declare war against the other, on complaint of injuries or damages, until the said party considering itself offended shall first have presented to the other a statement of such injuries or damages, verified by competent proofs, and demanded justice and satisfaction, and the same shall have been either refused or unreasonably delayed."

After such a demand, should prompt justice be refused by the Mexican Government, we may appeal to all nations, not only for the equity and moderation with which we shall have acted towards a sister republic, but for the necessity which will then compel us to seek redress for our wrongs, either by actual war or by reprisals. The subject will then be presented before Congress at the commencement of the next session, in a clear and distinct form, and the committee cannot doubt but that such measures will be immediately adopted as may be necessary to vindicate the honor of the country, and insure ample reparation to our injured fellow-citizens. They leave the mode and manner of making this demand to the President of the United States.

Before concluding their report, the committee deem it necessary to submit a few remarks upon the conduct of Mr. Gorostiza, the late envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Mexican republic to the United States. In regard to that functionary, they concur fully in opinion with Mr. Forsyth, that he was under the influence of prejudices which distorted and discolored every object which he saw whilst in this country. On the 15th of October, 1836, he terminated his mission by demanding his passports. And for what reason? Because the President refused to recall the orders which he had issued to the general commanding the forces of the United States in the vicinity of Texas, directing him to pass the frontier, should it be found a necessary measure of self-defence; but prohibiting him from pursuing this course unless the Indians were actually engaged in hostilities against the citizens of the United States, or he had undoubted evidence that such hostilities were intended, and were actually preparing within the Mexican territory.

A civil war was then raging in Texas. The Texian troops occupied positions between the forces of Mexico and the warlike and restless tribes of Indians along the frontiers of the United States. It was manifest that Mexico could not possibly restrain by force these tribes within her limits from hostile incursions upon the inhabitants of the United States, as she had engaged to do by the 33d article of the treaty. No matter how strong may have been her inclination, the ability was entirely wanting. Under such circumstances, what became the duty of the President of the United States? If he entertained reasonable apprehensions that these savages meditated an attack from the Mexican territory against the defenceless citizens along our frontier, was he obliged to order our troops to stand upon the line, and wait until the Indians, who know no rule of warfare but indiscriminate carnage and plunder, should actually invade our territory? To state the proposition is to answer the question. Under such circumstances, our forces had a right, both by the law of nations and the great and universal law of self-defence, to take a position in advance of our frontier, in the country inhabited by these savages, for the purpose of preventing and restraining their incursions.

The Sabine is so distant from Washington that it became absolutely necessary to intrust this discretionary power to the commanding general. If the President had not issued such orders in advance, all the evils might have been inflicted before the remedy could have been applied; and in that event he would have been justly responsible for the murders and devastation which might have been committed by the Mexican Indians on citizens of the United States.

When these discretionary orders were issued to General Gaines, they were immediately communicated to Mr. Gorostiza, in the most frank and friendly spirit. The fullest explanations of the whole proceeding were made to him, and he was over and over again assured that this occupation of the Mexican territory, should it become necessary, would be of a limited, temporary, and purely defensive character, and should continue no longer than the danger existed; that the President solemnly disclaimed any intention of occupying the territory beyond the Sabine, with the view of taking possession of it as belonging to the United States; and that this military movement should produce no effect whatever upon the boundary question.

The committee believe that Mr. Gorostiza ought to have been satisfied with these explanations. But they failed to produce any effect upon his mind. Without instructions from his Government, he retired from his mission upon his own responsibility. This was not all. Before he left the United States he published a pamphlet, containing a portion of his correspondence with our Government and with his own, from which latter it appears that, whilst engaged upon the business of his special mission here, he was making charges of bad faith against the United States to the Mexican Secretary of Foreign Relations. The committee will not enlarge upon the glaring impropriety of such conduct. The publication of such a pamphlet by a foreign minister, in the country to which he has been accredited, before taking his departure, can be considered in no other light than as an appeal to the people against the acts of their own Government. It was a gross violation of that diplomatic courtesy which ought ever to be observed between independent nations, and deserves the severest condemnation. This act was still more extraordinary when we consider that it almost immediately followed the note of Mr. Dickens to him, of the 20th October, 1836, assuring him that the President would instruct Mr. Ellis to make such explanations to the Mexican Government, of the conduct of that of the United States, as he believed would be satisfactory.

The committee regret to learn, from the note of Mr. Ellis to Mr. Forsyth of the 9th of December last, that the Mexican Government has publicly approved of the conduct of its minister whilst in the United States. They trust that a returning sense of justice may induce it to reconsider this determination. They are willing to believe that it never could have been made, had that Government previously received the promised explanation of the President, contained in the letter of Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Ellis of the 10th December, 1836, which, unfortunately, did not reach Mexico until after the latter had taken his departure. This letter, with the President's message at the commencement of the present session of Congress, cannot fail to convince the Mexican Government how much they have been misled by the representations of their minister.

After a full consideration of all the circumstances, the committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate concur in opinion with the President of the United States, that another demand ought to be made for the redress of our grievances from the Mexican Government, the mode and manner of which, under the 34th article of the treaty, so far as it may be applicable, are properly confided to his discretion. They cannot doubt, from the justice of our claims, that this demand will result in speedy redress; but should they be disappointed in this reasonable expectation, a state of things will then have occurred which will make it the imperative duty of Congress promptly to consider what further measures may be required by the honor of the nation and the rights of our injured fellow-citizens.

Ordered, That 2,000 extra copies of the above report be printed.

And then the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 20.

COPY-RIGHT LAWS.

Among the memorials presented to day was one by Mr. CLAY, from a very large number of persons, who stated themselves to be American authors and friends of literature, calling the attention of Congress to the subject of copy-right laws, and expressing an anxious wish that those laws might be so modified as to extend their benefits to foreign authors. Mr. C. further remarked that the evidences in favor of the measure of granting copy-rights to foreign authors were so strong as not to leave a doubt on any mind of its favorable reception by the country. Under these circumstances, he said he should call up the bill granting such rights as soon as convenient. The memorial was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS OF MR. MADISON.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration (on its third reading) of the following joint resolution:

"Resolved, &c., That the Joint Committee on the Library be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to contract for and purchase, at the sum of thirty thousand dollars, the manuscripts of the late Mr. Madison, referred to in a letter from Mrs. Madison to the President of the United States, dated the fifteenth of November, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, and communicated in his message of the sixth of December, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, conceding to Mrs. Madison the right to use copies of the said manuscript in foreign countries as she may think fit."

Mr. CALHOUN said this resolution from the Committee on the Library proposed to appropriate $30,000 to accomplish the object proposed. The facts, he said, were these: Mr. Madison, under the impression that these papers would be favorably received by the public and by publishers, had levied several legacies upon them, one of some thousands of dollars to the Colonization Society, and some smaller ones to other public charities, in addition to some private bequests. But, so far from his anticipations having been realized, it seemed that Mrs. Madison was unprepared to run the risk of publishing them at all, and on this account had applied to the President in relation to them. He had recommended to Congress to purchase them; and the Committee on the Library had consequently made this report.

Every one (Mr. C. said) was ready to render to the memory of Mr. Madison all possible respect. But the questions involved in this case were of a constitutional character, and it was therefore impossible for Mr. C. to vote for the proposition. The question was, have Congress the right to make this appropriation? The constitution gives Congress the power to lay and collect taxes, to pay the debts of the Government, and to provide for the common defence and general welfare. It was under this provision of the constitution that Mr. C. understood this appropriation was to be made.

In reference to this clause of the constitution there had long been a diversity of opinion. From the very commencement of the Government, the two great parties in the country were divided upon it. One of these parties conceived that, by these words in the constitution, Congress had the right, in promoting the general welfare, to appropriate money to any and every object which they believed would be conducive to the promotion of the general welfare. The other party, at the head of which was Mr. Madison himself, believed this power was limited by the constitution, and that Congress have no right to make an appropriation, unless authorized to do so by a specific provision of the constitution. These two schools had existed from an early stage of the Government to the present time. Mr. Madison, in his celebrated report of 1799, had given his views on the subject, in the most clear and conclusive language, which required not one word from Mr. C. He would ask the Secretary to read the passage on the 23d, 24th, 25th, 26th, and 27th pages of the report.

[The Secretary then read the passage indicated by Mr. CALHOUN.]

Here, Mr. C. said, Mr. Madison, by a very able argument, had proved, beyond all controversy, that Congress has the power only to make specific grants, and that no more than specific powers are vested in them by that clause of the constitution. The opposite doctrine involved unlimited power in the possession of Congress. Mr. C. would not repeat the argument. Mr. Madison had also predicted what Mr. C. feared he should see fulfilled, that the opposite argument would lead to consolidation, or was consolidation itself, and that the consequent effect would be a monarchy. What was prediction in 1799, was already, Mr. C. said, in part realized. We had not yet arrived at the stage of monarchy, but the executive department was in a fair way of absorbing the whole powers of the system.

Mr. C. held it to be due to the memory of Mr. Madison, and to the powerful argument just read in his report, that questions of this kind should be considered with all possible caution. He had given his views of this portion of the constitution in the prime of his life and vigor of his manhood; and such views elevated Mr. Jefferson to the chief magistracy in the political revolution of 1800, and afterward elevated Mr. Madison himself. The fame of this illustrious man, and the debt which we owed him for all he did for our institutions, demanded that we should do nothing on the present occasion to show a want of respect for him or his sentiments.

The question now before the Senate, Mr. C. said, was whether Congress had the power to purchase the copy-right to Mr. Madison's papers, which, in the present state of political feelings, were regarded of little or no value in the money market. Mr. C. regarded it as truly deplorable, that these invaluable papers, which threw a light upon the constitution which had never been shed upon it before, should be deemed of no value by the public, absorbed with party politics and the low love of gain, so that such a work could not be published. But where, Mr. C. asked, was the special power in the constitution for Congress to publish such a work? This was a solemn question, the answer to which should be shown not by precedent, but by the constitution. The practice of Congress, Mr. C. said, had been most loose on this and all other points. But the real question was, whether there was such a power in the constitution. The chairman of the committee had not rested his argument on this, but on the broad general principle that these papers would throw a new and brilliant light upon our institutions, and constitute a new era in their history, and in the progress of the human mind; thus promoting the general welfare by the diffusion of intelligence, for which Congress had no authority in the constitution. Mr. C. felt that his position in opposition to this resolution was a painful one; but the opinions of Mr. Madison, which were the text book of Mr. C., and of those with whom he acted, demanded that he should not abandon it. He had spoken as briefly as possible, and wished chiefly for the opportunity of recording his vote against the proposition.

Mr. PRESTON said he concurred fully with his colleague in all the principles laid down in the celebrated report of Mr. Madison, as an argument upon the constitution; and he considered his refutation of the opposite doctrines, under the constitution, to have been unanswered, and were wholly unanswerable. But, acquiescing fully in the views both of his colleague and of Mr. Madison, Mr. P. said he could still conscientiously vote for this resolution. On the grounds to which his colleague had alluded, this resolution ought not to pass. But Mr. P. believed they had no application whatever to the case in hand. In the examination of these papers, the committee came to this general result: that these papers were part and parcel of the constitution and of the monuments of our Government, being not only connected but in a manner identified with them, as much so as were the journals of the convention. These journals (he said) had been published by authority of an act of Congress in 1819, under the administration of Mr.

Monroe, a man eminently devoted to the principles which his colleague had commended; a strict republican as to his political character; and this Mr. P. believed was done without the dissent of any party or any individual, and without the slightest objection.

Seeing that this was a proceeding of a republican Congress and a republican President, it was a subject of consideration with the committee, on what principle this whole country had yielded to the propriety of such a publication; and they concluded that it was a necessary portion, not only of our constitutional history, but of our constitutional existence. Now, (asked Mr. P.,) are these papers of the same character? They comprised the speeches of those who took an active part in the formation of the Government, and exhibited their views of that Government, taken down with the greatest possible accuracy and fulness; and the most remarkable speeches, after having been written out by Mr. Madison, were revised and corrected by the hand of Hamilton; so that the whole was a complete history of these transactions.

It was objected to these reports that they were not in fact official. But what right have Congress to publish the official proceedings of that body more than the unofficial? The publication of both proceeds on the same ground, that they are part and parcel of our frame of government, being an exposition of the views of those who formed the constitution, and, therefore, best showing its true meaning.

In the same way (Mr. P. said) Congress found it convenient to publish the journals of the old Congress under the confederation, and no one hesitated, on any side. And yet these papers had no more than a historical connexion with our present form of Government, and were by no means so free from objections, founded on the principles of Mr. Madison's report, as were the papers of Mr. Madison now in question.

There were still other precedents which might be relied on, and among them was the purchase by Congress of the papers of General Washington, at $25,000, without any serious objection. And there was another still more remarkable example in regard to our revolutionary history. Mr. P. also adduced some other precedents of less importance. He said the Library Committee would, in his view, have been entirely justified in purchasing, on their own authority, the papers of Mr. Madison, to deposit in the Library, if there had been no ulterior view to their publication.

Mrs. Madison had stated that the offers made her for the papers in question were not satisfactory. It was to be supposed they were not very great. But the committee did not feel themselves authorized to inquire what Mrs. Madison intended to do with the money which she might derive from the work. The proposition on her part was to sell thus much of her property to the Congress of the United States; and whether there were legacies on that fund or not was not for Congress to inquire. They might just as well ask whether the printer whom they employed would give away his money for this or that object, or whether he would spend it in gambling, drunkenness, or debauchery. For these things Congress were not responsible.

Mr. P. said he deemed the history of the Government as of very great value, and he felt extremely desirous that the greatest possible light should be thrown upon it; so strong was this feeling, as to cause in him some self-distrust as to his estimate of the very great value of the work now in question. But he was by no means disposed to construe the constitution merely by the words it contained, but he thought it exceedingly desirable to know the views and intentions of its framers, which must be regarded as the only true spirit of the instrument. Mr. P. made various other remarks, still further illustrating and enforcing his views.

Papers of Mr. Madison.

[SENATE.]

Mr. WEBSTER said he supposed that there was no member of the Senate who regarded the sum proposed to be given for these manuscripts as too large, if the appropriation was within the just field of their constitutional powers. Now, what was the object of this appropriation? The Senate sat under a constitution which had now endured more than fifty years, and had been formed under very peculiar circumstances, under a great exigency, and in a manner that no constitution had ever been formed in any other country—on principles of united and yet divided legislation, altogether unexampled in the history of free States. Mr. W. agreed fully in the sentiment that the constant rule of interpretation to be applied to this instrument was, that its restrictions were contained in itself, and that it was to be made, as far as possible, its own interpreter. He also agreed that the practice under the Government, for a long course of years, and the opinions of those who both formed the instrument, and afterwards aided in carrying it into effect by laws passed under its authority, were to be the next ground of interpretation; and it seemed to him that the measure now proposed was of great importance, both in connexion with the constitution itself, and with the history of its interpretation. He should not now speak of the political opinions of Mr. Madison. He looked only to the general facts of the case. It was well known that the convention of great men who formed our constitution sat with closed doors; that no report of their proceedings was published at that time; and that their debates were listened to by none but themselves and the officers in attendance. We had, indeed, the official journal kept by their order. It was an important document, but it informed us only of their official acts. We got from it nothing whatever of the debates in that illustrious body. Besides this, there were only a few published sketches, more or less valuable. But the connexion of Mr. Madison with the constitution and the Government, and his profound knowledge of all that related to both, would necessarily give to any reports which he should have taken a superior claim to accuracy. It was his purpose, when he entered the body, to report its whole proceedings. He chose a position which best enabled him to do so; nor had he been absent a single day during the whole period of its sittings. It was further understood that his report of the leading speeches had been submitted to the members for correction. The fact was well known to them all that he was thus collecting materials for a detailed report of their proceedings. Without, therefore, having seen a page of these manuscripts, it was reasonable to conclude that they must contain matter not only highly interesting, but very useful; and it was his impression that, among this class of cases, the Senate could not better consult the wishes and interests of the American people than to let them see a document of this character, from the pen of such a man as Madison. That gentleman had been more connected with the constitution than almost any other individual. He had been present in that little assemblage that met at Annapolis in '86, with whom the idea of a convention originated. He was afterwards a member of the convention of Virginia, which ratified the constitution. He had then been a member of the first Congress, and had taken an important lead in the great duties of its legislation, under that constitution, in the formation of which he had acted so conspicuous a part. He had afterwards filled the important station of Secretary of State, and had subsequently been for eight years President of the United States. Thus, his whole life had been intimately connected, first with the formation, and then with the administration of the constitution.

Mr. W. said that he saw no constitutional objection to the purchase of these manuscripts. Why did Congress purchase every year works on history, geography, botany, metaphysics, and morals? How was it that they had purchased a collection of works of the most miscellaneous character from Mr. Jefferson? The manuscripts in question stood in a different relation. They related immediately and intimately to the nation's own affairs, and especially to the construction of that great instrument under which the Houses of Congress were now sitting. If the doctrine advanced by the Senator from South Carolina was to prevail, Congress ought forthwith to clear its library of every thing but the State Papers. Mr. W's views on the constitution were well known; whether an inspection of these papers would confirm and strengthen the views he entertained respecting that instrument, he could not say; but certainly, if they were now within his reach, he should be very eager to read them; and their examination would be one of the very first things that he should engage in. A report of such debates, from such a pen, could not but be of the highest importance, and its perusal was well calculated to gratify a rational curiosity. It might throw much light on the early interpretation of the constitution, and on the nature and structure of our Government. But, while it produced this effect, it could do more than all other things to show to the people of the United States through what conciliation, through what a temper of compromise, through what a just yielding of the judgment of one individual to that of another, through what a spirit of manly and brotherly love, that assembly of illustrious men had been enabled finally to agree upon the form of a constitution for their country, and had succeeded in conferring so great a good upon the American people.

Mr. NILES said he regretted that the committee had presented this subject for the action of the Senate in the precise form they had, as he feared that he should not be able to give the resolution his support, which he should have been happy to have done had the resolution been in a different shape. He concurred in all that had been said as to the merits of the work, and the high character of its illustrious author. He would yield to no man in the estimation in which he held the character, services, and political opinions, of Mr. Madison. But the universally acknowledged merit of the work should induce us to be more cautious not to act on unsound principles, and unnecessarily set a bad example. He was sorry that the committee had not gone further, and let us know what is their ultimate purpose in the purchase of these manuscripts. Are they to be purchased for publication, or to be deposited in the library for the use of Congress? If the latter was the object, he saw no constitutional difficulty in the way; but there were other serious objections to that course. Thirty thousand dollars was an enormous sum to pay for the manuscripts, in case they were to be used only as an addition to the library of Congress; besides, if this is the only object, the purchase of the manuscripts will be the means of withholding the work from the press, instead of aiding in diffusing the sentiments of the author among the people of the United States, which he supposed was the principal object. It was unnecessary to dwell on this aspect of the question, because he was satisfied that such was not the object in view. There could be no doubt that the real purpose is the publication of the work; and what is to be the nature and extent of the publication? Are we to publish a few hundred copies only, for the use of Congress and the public offices, or is Congress to publish a large edition for general distribution? There might be less objection, on the ground of principle, to the former course, but it would certainly be a very expensive way of supplying Congress with the work. He thought the proper course would be for Congress to purchase a certain number of copies of the work after it should be published; or, if it was deemed necessary to encourage the publication, and to add to the present value of the copy-right, he should have no objection, and feel no difficulty in the adoption of a resolution authorizing the subscription to five hundred or one thousand copies of the work, at a fair price, to be paid for when it might be published.

There can be no constitutional difficulty in purchasing the manuscript for the library, nor in purchasing a certain number of copies of the published work, nor in authorizing a subscription for a number of copies of the work when it may be published; but to purchase the manuscript, not for the library, but for the purpose of publication, is a very different thing. He doubted the power of Congress to do this, and he could see no necessity whatever for it. Why is it necessary for Congress to interfere? The work will be published without our aid. This manuscript is valuable, for we have just been informed that five thousand dollars have been offered for it. The aid of Congress, therefore, is not necessary to secure the publication of the work, and to enable the people of the United States to have the benefit of the sentiments of the illustrious author. What reason, then, can be assigned why Congress should purchase the copy-right, and become the publisher of the work? Why has this application been made to us? He apprehended that there could be no other reason than that assigned by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] that the aid of Congress was necessary to pay the legacies charged upon this manuscript. Under the form of purchasing the manuscript, we are to pay the legacies in the testament of Mr. Madison, charged upon a fund which is insufficient to satisfy them. Is not this the whole of the case? The high merit of the work is of no consequence in this view of the question, because the country will have the benefit of it without our interference. It is not on this ground that the purchase could be justified, and he could see no other object but to secure the execution of the will and the payment of the legacies.

But, said Mr. N., is there not a great principle involved in this question; one much more important than that as to the propriety of the appropriation? Is Congress to become the publisher of books for general distribution, and with the view to enlighten the people? Where are we to find our authority for such a proceeding? We are told that these manuscripts, containing the only authentic account of the proceedings of the convention, ought justly to be considered as a part of the constitution itself; that they belong to, and are part of, the muniments of the Government. This is a strong claim to be set up for the private manuscripts of an individual, however distinguished or connected with the institutions of the country. But, admitting it to be true, has Congress the power to publish the constitution itself for general distribution, and for the purpose of affording political intelligence to the people? We may publish our journal or public records, for the use of Congress or the officers of the Government. But can Congress take upon itself to decide what political information is proper to be distributed among the people, and then become the publisher and distributor of the works containing the same, at the expense of the national Treasury? This would not only be a very extraordinary but a very dangerous power. It would not only be a new source of expendi ure, but the assumption of a power which might be wielded with tremendous effect, in operating upon public opinion. If this work is to be published at the public expense and by the authority of Congress, on the ground that it is calculated to explain and illustrate the theory and principles of the Government, the same claim may be set up for works of a very different description. Who is to decide what is the true theory and exposition of the constitution? This has been a subject of controversy from the formation of the constitution. The different opinions which have existed in relation to this matter have formed the basis and foundation of parties. One work will contain the true exposition of the constitution, according to the views of one party, and a very different work according to the opinions of another party. When one party is in the ascendancy, they may publish and distribute among the people such works as may be calculated to explain and illustrate what they regard as the true theory of the Government; and another party, when in power, may authorize the publication of political works of an opposite character, to explain and unfold the true theory of the constitution as they understand it. This is a power which would unavoidably lead to abuses of the most dangerous tendency; as nothing could be more mischievous than for Congress, by its direct action, and by the expenditure of the public funds, to attempt to influence public sentiment on political questions. The works of Mr. Madison would no doubt exert a highly beneficial influence on public opinion; but if a precedent is established, Congress may exercise the power, by publishing and distributing political works of a very different character. He believed that Congress had no authority to publish any work for general circulation, or for any other purpose than the use of the Government; and he could conceive of no assumption of power more dangerous, or of which the people ought to be more jealous. He regretted that the committee had presented this subject in the manner they had, and was sorry they had not gone further, and informed the Senate what was their ultimate purpose in purchasing these manuscripts. But as they had not done this, he felt it his duty to look beyond the resolution, and to decide for himself what was intended by the purchase. He believed that the object was to publish the work under the authority and at the expense of the United States; and believing that such a proceeding would be wholly unauthorized, and a very dangerous exercise of power, he felt constrained to vote against the resolution.

Mr. CRITTENDEN advocated the resolution. After pronouncing a merited eulogy on the character of Mr. Madison, he observed that we might with great reason anticipate the character of this work from that of its author; and such was the estimation in which he individually held a report compiled under such circumstances, by such a man, that he believed its value could scarce be overrated. There was no gentleman, he believed, who had expressed any hesitation as to the price proposed to be given; but the Senator from South Carolina was very apprehensive that, in purchasing this work, Congress would be exercising an unconstitutional power, and one which had a dangerous tendency toward the consolidation of the Government. Now, one great reason why Mr. C. was desirous of obtaining this and all other productions of Mr. Madison was the conviction that we could nowhere find more light as to the just interpretation of the powers in the constitution. As to the authority to make this purchase, if there was any value in precedents, there were enough of these to place it beyond question. The Senator demanded a specific power. A sufficient reply to that question would be to ask another. Under what specific power in the constitution had Congress erected this costly and magnificent palace for its legislation? Surely a building less expensive would have met and satisfied the necessities of the case. Who would say that these noble ranges of pillars, and the splendid dome they sustained, were indispensable to the deliberations of the Senate? Nay, where was the specific power for the erection of the Capitol at all? He would further demand of the Senator under what specific power he voted for the purchase of books for the library? The truth was, that all these acts pertained to that subordinate class of powers which regulated what might be called the domestic economy of the Government, and which were necessary to the exercise of the primary and higher powers specifically enumerated in the constitution. And surely, if Congress could purchase any work constitutionally, was there any which it might more legitimately buy than the manuscript now in question? Could any work be more desirable to an American statesman? any more useful to an American legislator? Such a report formed an integral and most important part of the national history. It was a part of the archives of the Government itself. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. NILES] was willing to purchase 500 or 1,000 copies of the work, when printed. That would be quite legitimate; but the honorable Senator was startled at the idea of purchasing a manuscript for publication. On what subtle ground of constitutional construction the gentleman came to such a conclusion Mr. C. was unable to comprehend. If the manuscript were purchased, would it not afterwards be printed? If it was printed, then all difficulty would be out of the way; but to purchase as a preparatory step to printing would be a daring violation of the constitution.

Mr. C. was really unable to appreciate the force of this argument. Congress designed to purchase this work for its own use; and did it constitute an objection that thereby the community would be enabled to get it also, and to possess it in a more authentic form? Congress had a right to erect a chamber for its own deliberations. Did the act become unconstitutional if the dimensions of that chamber should be so enlarged as to admit the erection of a gallery for spectators? No more did it become unconstitutional for Congress to purchase a work for themselves because the public could get incidentally the advantage of it. Mr. C. was desirous that Congress, by such an act, should commend this work to the American people, should put its imprimatur upon it, and send it forth with all the additional weight which such an act could give. That which was not strictly necessary might nevertheless be highly useful and becoming, in the exercise of powers confessedly constitutional. Was it necessary to place in this hall that venerable countenance of Washington, which seemed, as it were, to preside in silent dignity over their legislation? Was there any specific power which authorized them to adorn the Capitol with historic paintings and emblematical statuary? He believed that in purchasing this work the Senate would fulfil a duty near and dear to the hearts of the American people. If the remains of Mr. Madison were known to exist in the remotest corner of the world, Mr. C. would vote for an expedition that would cost far more than these manuscripts, to bring back dust so sacred to this country for a grave. Would not Congress have power to do that? Where was the specific power for the exploring expedition now fitting out?—an expedition that would cover the nation with imperishable renown. Should the gentleman's interpretation prevail, the nation would be shorn of the brightest beams which now encircle its name; and though Mr. C. differed from that gentleman as to constitutional views, he could not but believe that he was influenced at heart by all those feelings which would induce Mr. C. to support this measure. For himself, he had never given a vote with a more entire conviction of its perfect propriety.

Mr. CALHOUN rejoined, and further insisted upon the ground he had before taken. There was no diversity of opinion as to the value of these manuscripts, nor with regard to the great character of Mr. Madison, nor as to its being a very desirable object that this work should be published; but whether it should be published by the agency of Congress was a different question. The work, however, would be published at all events. Mrs. Madison had been offered $5,000 for it. That was sufficient to secure the publication. If Congress wished any copies for the library, they could furnish themselves with as many as might be necessary. Why must they purchase the copy-right? Would this application ever have come here if Mrs. Madison had been offered by the booksellers enough money to cover the legacies in her husband's will?

[Mr. CRITTENDEN interposed, and said he presumed it would. The reverence in which that distinguished woman held her husband's memory would naturally induce her to desire to dispose of this manuscript rather to the Government of this country than to booksellers. As to purchasing the copy-right, so precious did he hold the manuscript itself, that, did he possess it, he would not take the $30,000 for it.]

Mr. CALHOUN resumed, and insisted that, let gentlemen twist and turn the question as they pleased, it amounted to neither more nor less than this: an appropriation by Congress to pay the legacies in Mr. Madison's will. Mr. C. profoundly regretted that those legacies had ever been charged upon the avails of this manuscript. Mr. Madison had died childless, and had left his wife in easy circumstances. How much better would it have been had he left this work, free of all cost, as a legacy to the American people? And he no less regretted that Mrs. Madison had ever made the present application to Congress; and his regret was yet heightened, because a compliance with her request involved a plain and palpable violation of that rule in the interpretation of the constitution which Mr. Madison himself had laid down. The rule was full of the profoundest political wisdom and foresight, and evinced in the mind of that great man a just foreboding as to the fate of this Government. It would honor the memory of Madison far more to regard this rule than to purchase this manuscript. And if the manuscript itself was esteemed so valuable, there was no doubt that the printer, after the edition was worked off, would very gladly give the original to Congress. He then went on in a course of argument to show that the appropriation involved a violation of the principles laid down by Mr. Madison with respect to limited powers, and would, if carried out, leave it in the power of the Government to perform any act whatever which it might deem conducive to the general welfare. In reply to the inquiry of Mr. CRITTENDEN as to the erection and decoration of the Capitol, he observed that the case was very plain. They were a legislative body, and must have a house in which to assemble; and whether the building were small or large, more or less expensive, did not vary the constitutional question. As to its profuse decoration, there had been many politicians of the old school who doubted its expediency, and thought that much plainer buildings would have been more consistent with our republican simplicity. As to the exploring expedition, Mr. C. greatly doubted the right of Congress to sanction any such measure. But thus we proceeded, step by step; one departure was made to sanction another, until at length they came down to the great question which had originally separated the two parties in this Government. Mr. C. admitted that when a young man, and at his entrance upon political life, he had inclined to that interpretation of the constitution which favored a latitude of powers, but experienced observation and reflection had wrought a great change in his views; and, above all, the transcendent argument of Mr. Madison himself, in his celebrated resolutions of 1798, had done more than all other things to convince him of his error. The opposite course tended to a Government of unlimited powers, and in such a Government the executive department must inevitably swallow up all the rest. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] had warred nobly against executive encroachments, but that warfare would be all in vain unless the money power of the Government should be closely watched. He had been struck with the sagacity and foresight of Mr. Jefferson, in a remark of that great statesman, that legislative usurpation would always precede executive, but that executive would always succeed it. Yet there would be a thousand cases which so strongly appealed to the hearts and sympathies of legislators, that these salutary restraints and warnings were all in danger of being swept away; and he who should oppose appeals of that nature would come to feel little in his own eyes, and to accuse himself of a want of the noblest feelings of the heart. He concluded by once more asserting that the naked question before the Senate was, whether they would vote an appropriation to pay the legacies in Mr. Madison's will. As he could not in conscience vote in the affirmative, he desired that the question should be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. RIVES said he little expected, after the numerous appropriations for objects very questionable in their nature, and involving far more dubious constitutional questions, which pass here from session to session and from day to day without objection or observation, that we should have been occupied in a grave constitutional discussion on such a resolution as this. He most thoroughly concurred with the Senator from South Carolina in every fundamental principle he has now laid down. He subscribed most heartily to the doctrine that Senator has quoted from the celebrated report of Mr. Madison in 1798. But what is that doctrine? What was the occasion of its being advanced, and what is its just application? The Senate will all recollect that at an early stage of the history of this Government an attempt was made to pervert a clause in the first article of the constitution, which empowers Congress to "lay and collect duties, &c., to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." The first construction attempted to be put upon these words was, that Congress has power to do whatever it may deem necessary and proper for the common defence and general welfare; a construction which goes at once to prostrate all notion of specific powers, and which renders the subsequent grant of those powers in the constitution itself perfectly nugatory. But this interpretation was so gross, and so entirely at war with the whole spirit and genius of our Government, that it enjoyed but a brief reign. It was followed, however, by a construction much more plausible, and which was strenuously advocated by the justly celebrated Alexander Hamilton. He contended that although Congress did not possess a general and unlimited power to do any thing they pleased, provided they thought it for the general welfare, yet that they might do any thing whatever which could be accomplished through the appropriation of money. It was in answer to that doctrine that Mr. Madison, in the able report from which extracts have been read, undertook to show that the money power of Congress was itself subject to all the limitations of the constitution; that it was intrusted with Congress only as a means of carrying into effect the specific powers enumerated in that instrument; and this has ever since been held to be the true, orthodox, republican doctrine. To that doctrine I give my full and unreserved assent.

But, while I do this, I say that it has no application here; and I admit that, if this appropriation cannot be sustained by showing that it has a proper relation to the delegated power of Congress, it cannot be justified. None can justly defend it on the ground that the money power is wider in extent than the other powers. No. We must be held, in every case, to the specific trusts of the constitution; but then it is not necessary that there shall in every case be a verbal grant of the power. I think the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] fairly answered the Senator from South Carolina. He inquired, if we are to look for a specific power granted in words for each particular application of money, where was the authority for the erection of these gorgeous and magnificent columns, and for decorating the walls of this chamber with that image of the Father of his Country? The argument was, in my opinion, appropriate and conclusive. But it might be carried still further. I think the Senator from South Carolina, whilst he goes for a strict construction of the constitution, is in this case over-strict. If his notion of limited powers be correct, where is our authority, not for constructing so magnificent a building as this, but for erecting any building at all, even in the plainest style of Doric simplicity? Where is our grant of power to erect a mansion for the Executive, or public buildings to contain the national archives? There is evidently none. We must resort in all these cases to another clause, which declares that Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." Our power to appropriate money for the erection of this Capitol, or of the President's house, does not lie in the fact that such an appropriation is absolutely necessary, for it is not absolutely necessary. The President might reside, as many of the Chief Magistrates of the States do reside, in a private mansion, provided at his own expense; and Congress might hire some apartment, without expending money in the erection of a house for its own exclusive occupancy; and, according to the doctrine of the Senator from South Carolina, as there is no specific grant here, there can be no constitutional authority for such an application of the public money. But, though not indispensably necessary, it may, nevertheless, be fit and proper, and may be covered by the limited discretionary power to make laws to carry into effect those powers which are specifically enumerated. A construction so strict as that pleaded for by the Senator from South Carolina on the present occasion, would strip the Congress of its salutary powers, would disarm it, and render it utterly useless for all practical purposes. There must be a just discretion.

But let me call the attention of that Senator to the report of Mr. Madison. I have not looked over it for two or three years, but my mind was so early and so deeply imbued with its principles, I looked to it with so much pride and confidence, as containing the political creed of my State, that I do not think I can err in saying that the test of any appropriation, as laid down by that great man, is, not that it shall be absolutely indispensable, but that it must bear "a direct and appropriate relation" to some of the powers specifically granted. By that test I am willing to abide; and I will vote for this appropriation, not on the broad principle that it promotes the general welfare, but on the ground that, on a fair common-sense and practical interpretation of the constitution, it has a direct and appropriate relation to powers specifically granted. Now, to apply this principle: I ask, is there any Government which has not power to preserve, and, if it pleases, to publish the acts and records of its own official history? The other Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] put this matter, as I think, upon the true ground—on ground solid and impregnable. These debates of the convention are in the nature of public archives. They are the records and muniments of our national history, and it is only in that view that I am in favor of purchasing them; and I contend that this appropriation stands on far narrower grounds than those we are continually passing for the increase of our miscellaneous library, or than that by which we erected this Capitol or the mansion of the Chief Magistrate. It is directed to the preservation of the monuments of our creation and organized existence as a nation and a Government, and to their publication in order to that preservation. Let me call the attention of the honorable Senator to what has been repeatedly done, and has never been objected to. When it was deemed proper to republish the journals of the old confederation, was that measure opposed on constitutional grounds? But why were those journals published? They were not the acts of an existing Congress, but of a pre-existing and different body. But still they were most precious and important, as constituting an integral part of our national history and existence. The same remarks will apply to the secret journals of the convention, and to the diplomatic correspondence of the confederation. Where was our specific constitutional authority for that publication? Yet we authorized all these things, by the necessary appropriation of money for the purpose. And I now ask, on what ground the publication of the journal of the proceedings of the convention can be practically distinguished from the debates of that same convention. May we publish the mere naked detail of the acts of the convention, and shall we be debarred from purchasing and publishing a full and authentic report of its debates, taken by a member so distinguished, who devoted himself with soul and body to the object, and who, in order to accomplish it, imposed upon himself self-denial, the regimen of an anchorite, while he was engaged in the labor?

The journal is important, I admit, but the debates are more important. The journal is a mere skeleton, a record of yeas and nays, and of resolutions agreed upon or rejected; a maze without a plan. It is this report of debates which gives us a clew to the labyrinth—which clothes the skeleton with flesh, and life, and substance. It is this which sheds light upon the acts themselves, and informs us of the grounds and principles on which they were adopted. Then there is another point in which this report has more nearly the character of the journal itself. It is well known that the official journal of the convention was a very imperfect record, and that there were in it chasms which had to be filled up by a resort to this very work, parts of which are actually incorporated into it, and have been printed with it. Let me prove this by reading to the Senate a short passage from the introduction to that journal, written by Mr. Adams, the Secretary of State, under whose superintendence the Journal of the Convention was prepared for publication.

In whatever aspect, then, we regard these manuscripts, whether as general monuments of our official and governmental history, or as a detailed account of the deliberations of that illustrious body which formed our constitution, they are of far higher importance than the mere naked journal itself, as showing in a most interesting manner the successive phases which the constitution assumed, and as affording us important light towards its practical construction at the present time.

The honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. NILES] appears to me to have misconceived the nature and scope of this resolution. With that astuteness which he well knows how to exhibit when there is occasion for it, he has brought forward a constitutional objection on this occasion which is not quite in harmony with that vigorous common sense which distinguishes him in so peculiar and eminent a degree. He argues that, though it might be very constitutional to purchase this work, if it were printed, it would be a violation of the constitution to purchase the manuscript with a view to publication. But my honorable friend is running ahead of the resolution in point of fact. It says nothing about publication; that is altogether a distinct and subsequent question, in regard to which there may be a diversity of opinion. If he thinks that this purchase will be made constitutional by depositing the manuscript in one of the vaults of the Capitol, or by placing it in some of the recesses of the library, where it shall be viewed only by those who enjoy a particular privilege to examine it, why, it can so be done; but the resolution itself does not contain a single word beyond the naked purchase of the manuscript. I have indeed no doubt that a majority of the body would be in favor of the publication. But there is nothing of that in the resolution. There may be important reasons why Congress should wish to possess the original veritable record of these proceedings, in the autograph of one so intimately acquainted with them, and so closely connected with all that relates to the constitution as was Mr. Madison.

It is often important not only that we have the words but the punctuation even of some of those resolutions; for the Senator from Connecticut knows very well that grave constitutional questions have turned upon the punctuation of some of the articles of that instrument. A change in a word may change the whole character of a work, and hence it is important that the original manuscript should be deposited in our archives. That is the object of the resolution. It was drawn up with care, and with express reference to this point. The object is that we may have these manuscripts to appeal to as a genuine and authentic record, and an authority verified by the highest sanctions.

In addition to the appropriations which I have already mentioned, there was, a year or two ago, an appropriation made without objection, so far as I am informed, of $25,000, for the purchase of the Washington manuscripts, papers without any particular official utility, since the most important of them were already in the hands of an eminent literary gentleman, and in a course of publication. If that application of the public money could be justified, surely this cannot be objected to.

The Senator from South Carolina thought it fit to express his profound regret that Mr. Madison had not made a different disposition of these manuscripts; that he had not bequeathed them to the nation. That is delicate ground, and one on which I shall not presume to tread. It does not, in my apprehension, belong to this forum. It is one of those questions which every man must settle for himself in the tribunal of his own bosom. The Senator, I am very sure, does not and cannot doubt that Mr. Madison was actuated by motives alone of the purest patriotism and benevolence. He could not doubt that these debates would eventually be given to the people of the United States. There is that in his will which contains the proof that when he was recording the deeds and sayings of that assembly of demi-gods (I had almost called them,) he looked to the benefit of his country and of mankind.

As to the bequests charged by Mr. Madison on the proceeds of these manuscripts, they were of a character to consecrate them to the interests of patriotism and benevolence. There were among them legacies to important literary institutions: one to the University of Virginia, of which he was the rector; another to the College of New Jersey, of which he was an alumnus; and another to a college in Pennsylvania; as well as some for the education of individuals nearly connected with him by the ties of blood and affection. These provisions of a warm and practical benevolence are an honor to his heart, and more indelible to his memory, in my humble judgment, than would have been an ostentatious gift of his debates to the people of the United States, as though they were objects of his charity. The nation, as the matter stands, are, in fact, his legataries. He has bequeathed to them the constitution, of which he was the chief founder and framer, and the enduring fruits of all his public toils and patriotic labors. Modest as was his great mind, and devoted to the last to the good of his country, he could not feel as if he were under obligation to give to his countrymen further proofs of his desire for their welfare.

I regret that there should on this occasion have been any comment here upon the private actions of the dead. Surely the testamentary arrangements of a man are, if any thing can be, matters which pertain exclusively, and in a sacred manner, to his own bosom. The personal bequests of such a man as Mr. Madison are not subjects for the jurisdiction or revision of the Senate. The Senator from South Carolina has also said that this proposition would never have been here, had the offer made to Mrs. Madison by the booksellers been sufficient to cover the legacies charged upon these manuscripts by her husband. Sir, I have been honored by some personal relations with Mrs. Madison; and I happen to know, that while that lady was prosecuting her arrangements for the publication of these papers, the suggestion was made to her, from sources entitled to her highest respect, that the most proper disposition that could be made of them, the destination most becoming her, as well as the character of her venerated husband, would be to place them under the control of Congress. And could any thing be more proper? These precious manuscripts, more precious far than the books of the Sybils, are the authentic depository, and the only one in existence, of the deliberations of those glorious minds which gave birth to our constitution. Surely there is an obvious and peculiar propriety in offering them to the Congress of the United States.

And, then, as to their utility to the country. Should the publication be made as a private concern by the book trade, there would be a less perfect guarantee that they were presented in a full, correct, and authentic form. But place the manuscript itself in the archives of the Government, and all will have been done which could be done to insure the preservation of the original, and the accuracy and fidelity the copies.

Let me in conclusion say, and I regret that the remark is called for by the allusions of the Senator from South Carolina, that the amiable and distinguished lady who is the proprietor of this manuscript is here as no petitioner for charity. She has done what it became her to do as the relic of that great man whose papers were bequeathed to her to enshrine and embody among the treasures of our country an authentic record of those solemn debates which issued in the formation of our happy and glorious form of government.

Mr. CALHOUN explained. He had cast no censure on the legacies of Mr. Madison. On the contrary, he considered them as all very proper, and he must be allowed to say that he was not a little surprised at the nature and tone of the remarks of the Senator from Virginia. That which had called forth the expression of his regret had been simply this: that the legacies charged on the avails of these manuscripts should have had the effect of bringing this application before Congress. What he had said was, that if an arrangement could have been made with the booksellers that would have covered those legacies, this application never would have been made; and there was nothing in the language of the will to show the contrary. Mr. C., after a brief recapitulation of the ground he had taken, concluded by observing that not one of the cases quoted by the Senator from Virginia availed in the least against the constitutional objection he had advanced; nor had he said any thing which any friend of Mrs. Madison had the least right to take exception to.

Mr. CLAY said that it had been his intention to offer some remarks on this resolution; but so much time had already been occupied, and that remaining to the Senate was so precious, that he should content himself with merely saying that he should vote for the resolution with the greatest readiness and pleasure; that it involved no violation whatever of the constitutional authority of Congress, while it fulfilled at the same time a sacred duty to the country, to the Congress itself, and to the memory of a man the most distinguished, with a single exception, of the patriots of the Revolution.

The question on the passage of the resolution was then decided by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Kent, Linn, Lyon, McKean, Mouton, Norvell, Parker, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Spence, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Webster, White, Wright—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Davis, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Knight, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Prentiss, Ruggles, Swift, Tipton—14.

So the resolution was passed, and sent to the House of Representatives for concurrence.

Mr. WRIGHT, pursuant to notice given on Saturday, moved to take up the bill for the reduction of the tariff.

Mr. BAYARD pressed for the resumption of the Choctaw land bill, as the unfinished business.

The question being taken on Mr. WRIGHT's motion, it was negatived: Ayes 13, noes not counted.

CHOCTAW LAND BILL.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill for confirming certain contingent locations of land in the State of Mississippi, &c.—

The question being on Mr. BLACK's amendment, to strike out certain sections of the bill, and substitute others therefor.

After some remarks from Mr. WHITE, which he concluded by reading an amendment he intended to move as a substitute for the whole bill,

Mr. BLACK consented to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. WHITE thereupon moved his substitute for the whole bill, which proposes a board of commissioners to examine the claim of each Choctaw Indian, and make a particular report of all the facts to Congress at its next session.

Mr. BAYARD moved an amendment to it, which, after a desultory conversation, was withdrawn.

Mr. WHITE's substitute was thereupon agreed to, the blanks filled with $3,000 as salary for each commissioner, $2,000 for the district attorney, $1,500 for a clerk, and the bill limited to the 1st of March, 1838.

It was then reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

After taking up and disposing of several other bills,

The Senate went into executive business, and afterwards adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 21.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the credentials of the Hon. FRANKLIN PIERCE, elected United States Senator from New Hampshire, for six years from the 3d of March next.

REDUCTION OF THE TARIFF.

After transacting the usual morning business,

Mr. WRIGHT moved to take up the bill reducing duties on certain imported articles.

Mr. CLAY said, before voting on this motion, he wished to inquire of the Senator whether it was intended that the bill should pass in its present shape, or that protected articles should be stricken from it. He believed the Senate generally would agree to a reduction of the duties on all except protected articles.

Mr. WRIGHT said it was impossible to answer this question. He merely wished the Senate to take up the bill, and act upon it as they should think proper. He had no instructions from the committee, and he was not prepared himself to move to strike out any part of the bill.

Mr. CALHOUN said he believed there would be no dispute about the reduction on a large proportion of the articles; the others would be indicated by the discussion on the bill.

Mr. WALKER said he should vote against the motion to take up the bill, because he hoped the Senate would take up to-day the subject of recognising the independence of Texas.

Mr. CALHOUN preferred to try first the question on Mr. WALKER's motion; and, if that should fail, the question on Texas might then be tried.

Mr. WRIGHT said if the subject was doubtful in the minds of a majority of the Senate, he was not disposed to worry the body. He would regard the refusal to take up the bill now as amounting to a refusal to act upon it at the present session. He would, therefore, ask for the yeas and nays on the question; which were ordered.

Mr. CLAY said he should certainly vote for taking up the bill now, after what Mr. W. had said, because a bill passed the Senate at the last session for reducing the duties on all the articles enumerated in this bill, with three or four exceptions. He wished, moreover, to know what was the intention of Mr. W. and other Senators on this subject, and to ascertain whether they really intended to preserve the general policy of the compromise.

Mr. WEBSTER said he considered it as very important that the bill should be taken up. He deemed it the indispensable duty of Congress to reduce the tariff so far as it could be done without interfering with protected articles.

Mr. CALHOUN, also, urged the importance of taking up the bill now, and hastening its progress.

Mr. BUCHANAN said the Legislature of Pennsylvania had instructed him and his colleague on this subject; and although the instructions had not yet arrived, he knew this morning that they had passed, and that they instructed them to vote against any reduction of the tariff as it was established in March, 1833, on the principle that to touch this subject at all might endanger their interests. Mr. B. confessed, though he held the opinions of the Legislature in high respect, that, had it not been for these instructions, he should have voted to take off the duties entirely, so far as it would not interfere with protection, and would not violate the compromise act; and he would have done it on the principle of throwing useless lumber overboard, for the purpose of saving the valuable part of the cargo. But he now felt bound to act according to his instructions, and would certainly bow to them with the utmost deference and respect.

Mr. CLAY said he hardly thought the Legislature of Pennsylvania had gone so far as the Senator supposed. The compromise act had expressly provided that, if there should be any deficiency in the revenue, it should be made up by increasing the duty on articles below 20 per cent.; and, on the other hand, if there should be an excess of revenue, it should be remedied by a reduction on articles below 20 per cent.; so that, with the exception of three or four articles, this bill was in entire accordance with the compromise act. And, so far from injuring the manufacturing interest, Mr. C. believed it would be beneficial to it. They therefore ought not to hesitate to take up the bill, and pass those parts of it which would not interfere with protection.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he was very much indebted to the gentleman for his commentary on Mr. B's instructions; but, under his favor, he would construe them for himself. [Mr. B. here read the instructions, which were clear, explicit, and imperative.]

The question on taking up the bill was now tried, and carried in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Norvell, Page, Parker, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Southard, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Walker, Wall, Webster, Wright—38.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Kent, McKean, Robbins, Sevier, Spence, Tipton—7.

Mr. WRIGHT laid before the Senate a letter from Ellicott & Co., on the subject of the manufacture of chemicals, the small amount of duty that would be reduced, and the great injury inflicted on our own establishments, by making free of duty the articles of aquafortis, muriatic acid, bichromate of potash, chromate of potash, prussiate of potash, tartaric acid, Prussian blue, calomel, sulphate of magnesia, sulphate of quinine, Rochelle salts, and tartar emetic.

Mr. WEBSTER, after a few brief remarks on the impropriety of taking off the duty on these articles without further information, moved to strike them out of the bill.

[The bill proposes to admit them free of duty.]

Mr. SEVIER wished to except the articles of calomel, quinine, and salts, as being the only ones in which his constituents had an interest; they took large quantities of them.

After a short debate, in which Messrs. KNIGHT, KENT, DAVIS, LINN, CLAY, BUCHANAN, SEVIER, and CALHOUN, took part, the question was put on striking out the residue of these articles, with the exception of calomel, salts, and quinine, and agreed to.

The question being put separately on striking out these, (i. e. retaining the present duty upon them,) it was decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Buchanan, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Kent, Knight, McKean, Norvell, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Parker, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Spence, Strange, Tipton, Walker, Wright—24.

So they were retained in the bill as free of duty.

Mr. DAVIS moved to strike out the article of worsted yarn, so as thereby to retain the present protecting duty on that article. He stated that the present duty fixed by law was twenty per cent., and he had letters in his possession to prove that there were large manufacturing establishments, in which great amounts of capital had been embarked in the making of worsted yarn. An important discovery in the manner of combing wool had enabled this branch of manufactures to flourish under the protecting duty of twenty per cent. Large investments had, in consequence, been made, in the expectation that that protection would not be withdrawn. The article produced was used principally for the warp in carpeting. The individuals concerned represented that, if the present duty should remain undisturbed till the year 1842, they should after that be enabled to maintain their ground under the general reduction then proposed. Mr. D. said that this was an interest of some importance to the country, and one which he considered as entitled to protection. If the duty under which it had grown up should now at once be taken off, he feared that it would suffer great injury, if not entire destruction. He did not know that even under the protection it had enjoyed it would have been able to realize any profit, or even to maintain its ground at all, had it not been for a great improvement which had recently been discovered in the process of wool combing.

Mr. D. sent to the Secretary's table one of the letters which he had received on this subject, and which was accordingly read to the Senate.

SENATE.]

Reduction of the Tariff.

Mr. CUTHBERT wished to ask one question, and it was this: was it the design of gentlemen to pursue the protective system as it now stood, or to place new articles under protection? A short time ago, this article of worsted yarn was not among the protected articles at all; but it having been asserted that the article could be made in this country, this duty of twenty per cent. had been imposed as a protection. He desired to know what was the construction which Senators attached to the compromise act. Was the construction this: that whenever an article, which had been among those protected, could be made here, it was to be protected as of course? Was this the manner in which the tariff was to be reduced? In this case, the production of a single letter from an individual interested in this manufacture seemed to be thought sufficient to produce the impression that its protection ought to be continued. If this course was to be sanctioned, the protective system would not only continue in all the strength it now possessed, but would even be extended. It was only to bring forward a single letter, to show that an article could be made in this country, and it was to be protected of course. As to this particular article of worsted yarn, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] was no doubt much better acquainted with it than Mr. C. There was one point on which he wished to be informed: were all articles manufactured from worsted yarn at present imported free of duty?

Mr. DAVIS replied that a part were, but not all.

Mr. CUTHBERT then observed that, if Congress protected worsted yarn, it would of course protect articles made from worsted yarn.

Mr. PRESTON inquired of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, what was the present duty on worsted yarn?

Mr. WRIGHT replied that the duty now fixed by law was 20 per cent. ad valorem. The amount imported came to $261,626, on which the duty paid was $52,325. Mr. W. added that it had been the understanding of the Committee on Finance that worsted stuff goods of all sorts were free of duty, and they saw no sufficient reason why worsted yarn should pay a duty, while goods manufactured from it paid none; and hence (the general object being to reduce the revenue) the committee had inserted worsted yarn among the articles which it was proposed to make free.

Mr. PRESTON was opposed to reducing the duties on any article included within the provisions of the compromise. If circumstances rendered a reduction of the revenue indispensable, it should be made on articles not comprehended in that arrangement. He was opposed to any departure from this principle in the present bill. Let the enumerated articles be protected as in the compromise act. In that he should fully acquiesce; but when the duty was less than 20 per cent. he could not agree to it; and if a new enumeration of protected articles was to be made, he should be utterly opposed to it. He should vote against striking out this article from the bill. Let the committee do what they would, the reduction would be scarce sufficient to bring down the revenue to the wants of the Government. But as this article paid a duty of 50,000 dollars, making it free will produce a considerable reduction.

Mr. WRIGHT said that the general object sought by the Committee on Finance, in reporting this bill, was to reduce the revenue as far as possible in conformity with the principles of the compromise. The fourth section of the compromise bill enumerated certain articles which were to be free of duty; in addition to those included in the tariff law; among which were bleached and unbleached linen, worsted stuff goods, and manufactures of silk and worsted. Mr. W. had been under the impression that this clause made free all goods in which worsted composed the greater part. He was told that the present article of worsted yarn was chiefly employed in the manufacture of carpets; that the construction at the custom-house had been that it was not included among the free articles. Mr. W. was unacquainted with the details of the subject, and had no personal knowledge of the matter. It appeared to him, however, that, notwithstanding there might exist a pretty strong claim on the part of a single manufacture, the article ought not to be stricken out, but should be free from duty, like the goods made from it.

Mr. DAVIS said he had but little to add. He was aware that worsted stuff goods were free of duty, but there had a class of them been introduced which were composed in part of worsted and in part of wool, which were not free, but paid a duty. The chief object for which this worsted yarn was manufactured was the warp in the manufacture of carpets. The carpet manufacture had long been established in this country, and it prevailed extensively in several of the States. Congress, for its protection, had imposed a heavy square-yard duty. Worsted yarn paid a duty of 20 per cent., and he did not know why it was not as fair an object of protection as if it paid 40. He could not see that it was a good reason for overthrowing a particular branch of manufactures, that the duty upon it was but small. He admitted that this manufacture had been lately prosecuted with new vigor; but neither could he perceive that this was a reason why it should be no longer protected. He was not for introducing a new set of protected articles; but if the Senate should think that, in consistency with the principles of the compromise, they could retain the existing duty on this manufacture of worsted yarn, he should be happy.

Mr. GRUNDY observed that this matter had been treated by some gentlemen as comparatively unimportant; but to him, in the attitude in which he stood, it was a matter of great import. He had voted for the compromise act, and had personally contributed to its passage, as much perhaps as any other member of the Senate; and he considered that its provisions formed the great bulwarks both of the manufacturing and the agricultural interests. He wished, if it were possible, that they might remain undisturbed; and if gentlemen were resolved to break through the arrangements then made, by taking off the duties then agreed upon, they ought to remember that it is a rule which will work both ways.

If one side was to be absolved from the agreement, the other side would claim to be absolved also; and thus the whole subject of the protecting system would again be thrown open. It was the understanding of those who advocated the compromise bill that articles paying a duty of 20 per cent. were to remain undisturbed, while in regard to those paying less than 20 per cent. the action of Congress was to be left free, and the duties might be raised or diminished, according as the revenue of the country should prove defective or redundant.

Mr. DAVIS here stated that the article of worsted yarn was not one of those under 20 per cent. It paid 20 per cent., and so was included in the compromise.

Mr. GRUNDY then said that he should be against taking off the duty. As long as there was a manufacture in the United States which required protection, he was against reducing the duties fixed for the compromise, until the experiment had been fully made of reducing the revenue in some other mode. But if, after every practicable experiment, it should be found that the revenue could not be reduced without touching these articles also, he should then, to avoid a greater evil, reluctantly yield his assent. He hoped, as each article in this bill came up successively for discussion, the chairman of the Committee on Finance would apprise the Senate whether it did or did not pay a duty of 20 per cent. or more, as Mr. G's vote would in all cases be governed by that consideration. If the article paid less than 20 per cent., he would vote to make it free; but if not, he would vote to retain the duty.

The question being now taken on striking out the article (worsted yarn) from the list of those which were to be made free of duty, it was carried: Ayes 23.

So the article was stricken out.]

Mr. DAVIS moved to strike out from the list of free articles that of olive oil. Mr. D. stated that this article, at present, paid a duty of twenty cents per gallon. There had been a discussion of considerable length, and a similar motion, at a former session. The duty had been reduced, but, after consideration, the House of Representatives had restored it again, lest the reduction might interfere with the whaling interest. Mr. D. said he hoped it might turn out, on a full examination, that the present duty would bear reduction, but, as at present informed, he was not authorized to say that such was the case; and, to avoid all danger of injury to the important interests involved in the whale fishery, he had judged it proper to move to strike this article out of the bill. The duty upon it amounted to more than 20 per cent.

Mr. NILES observed that the principle which had been advanced in the course of this debate, that all duties below twenty per cent. might be stricken out, as not being embraced in the compromise, was of all others the most unjust, and even preposterous. Were all interests to be disregarded, and wantonly destroyed, because they were not included in the compromise act? There existed many interests in the country whose protecting duty was below twenty per cent., which were vastly more entitled to the favorable notice of the Government than some others, which enjoyed a far higher protection. He believed that Congress ought to hesitate to reduce the duties, from a mere apprehension of a surplus in the Treasury, in cases where a small duty operated as a complete protection. The complaint which had roused the South to indignation was not directed against these small duties, but against that great mountain of enormous imposts which was laid by Congress in 1824 and 1828. But olive oil enjoyed a protection of more than twenty per cent., and therefore some gentlemen argued that it ought not to be included in this bill. But would the removal of the duty from this article affect any other interest which had a just claim for protection? The Senator from Massachusetts had argued that the retaining of this duty would be very beneficial to another article. This was certainly going a great way. Whale oil was entirely a different interest; and it was extending the protective principle further than it had ever before been proposed, to lay a tax on one article in order to protect another. If olive oil was produced in this country, he should then be in favor of protecting it by a duty. But he could not consent to tax olive oil, with a view to protect the whale fishery.

Mr. DAVIS said he hardly knew whether the Senator from Connecticut aimed his remarks at him, in what he said respecting a duty being retained because it was over twenty per cent. Mr. D. had said no such thing. He had not argued that this article should be stricken out because the duty upon it exceeded twenty per cent., but he had stated such to be the fact, for the information of the Senate, and that they might be informed of the true ground on which they were proceeding. He concurred with the Senator from Connecticut in the belief that there were many articles, the duty on which was below twenty per cent., which deserved very careful consideration. He was aware, too, that the last argument which had been urged by that gentleman was often well founded, but it was not always true; and in this case it did so happen that both whale and olive oil were extensively used in the same way—in lamps, for example, and in many operations of manufactures. At the time the compromise act was passed, the case of this article had been thoroughly examined, and the House of Representatives had in consequence reversed its action, and raised the duty after having reduced it. Mr. D. was as anxious as any other gentleman to remove this duty, if it could be done with safety and propriety; but he was not now in possession of such information as would warrant him to believe that it could.

Mr. WRIGHT said that the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut seemed to call upon him for a word of explanation. The Senator misunderstood the principle on which the Committee on Finance had proceeded in constructing this bill. It was their desire carefully to guard as well those interests which were covered by duties below twenty per cent. as above; but they felt themselves more at liberty to go into an examination where the duty was under twenty per cent., and on articles protected. It was now said, and Mr. W. was not prepared to contradict the assertion, that the removal of the duty on olive oil might prove injurious to the whaling interest. The committee certainly had no disposition to interfere with that important branch of industry. The article of whalebone paid no more than 12½ per cent., yet they had abstained from inserting that in the bill, because it was connected with the whale fishery. Mr. W. considered the whaling interest as one of all others the most clearly deserving the protection of the Government. The nation was deeply interested in it, as a school for our seamen and a nursery for the navy. They did not understand that rescinding the duty on olive oil would at all affect this interest; and Mr. W. regretted that neither himself nor the Senator from Massachusetts was in possession of more distinct information on the subject.

Mr. CUTHBERT said that if the Senator from Massachusetts could present to the Senate information which would enlighten them on this subject, he should be glad if he would do so. Was it a fact that the use of olive oil did compete with the interests of the whale fishery? At the first blush he should say it could not be so. The United States raise no olive trees, and the two articles of whale oil and olive oil were certainly very different from each other. One was a fine article of use in diet, while the other was quite the reverse. If no further information was laid before the Senate, he should think that olive oil ought not to be stricken out of the bill; but if further information should show that to make it a free article would injure the whaling interest, then the duty ought not to be reduced. Some Senators contended that when the duty was above twenty per cent. it must not be touched; others argued that when it was below twenty per cent. it was wrong to interfere with it. Thus, it was evident that the whole attempt to reduce the revenue would prove futile. There was to be no honest, sincere, and strenuous effort at reduction. While, on the one hand, it was pleaded that the Senate must not reduce the tariff, because of the compromise of 1833, he heard nothing of any pledge that the tariff was not to be augmented, because of the compromise. There was evidently gross partiality in the manner in which the compromise was to be construed. As to this article of olive oil, he should like to receive some further information.

Mr. DAVIS said that he would cheerfully give such information as he possessed. Whale oil was commonly used in lamps, and in some processes of the manufacture of woollen goods, while, for both purposes, olive oil was likewise employed. There were many other uses for oil, in which both kinds were not equally proper. Olive oil, for instance, was used in the manufacture of fine soap, while whale oil would not answer for that purpose. He should not go into the details. The whole subject had been fully investigated in 1832, when the existing duty on olive oil had been fixed, and he was not aware of any change which had since taken place to render it excessive or improper.

The question being now put, the motion to strike out olive oil from the list of free articles was rejected: Ayes 15, noes 19.

[At a subsequent period of the session this vote was reversed, and the motion finally prevailed; but, as the whole bill was lost in the House of Representatives, the duty remains, of course, as it stood before.]

Mr. WALL moved to strike out the articles of China and porcelain, earthen, and stone ware. Mr. W., in support of his motion, read a long report on the subject of the protection of this manufacture, and accompanied it by some remarks. He stated the duty to be twenty per cent.

Mr. WRIGHT said that, when the bill had been reported, the committee had been unaware of any important establishment existing in this country for the manufacture of porcelain. Since then, however, they had received a very plain and proper letter from the proprietors of a large establishment in Jersey city, in which there had been invested a capital of $150,000. He should read a portion of this letter, in order to show the importance of this one establishment. He was not, however, aware of the existence of any other. The amount of porcelain and stone ware imported in 1835 was $1,697,000, which paid a duty to the Government of $340,000. He submitted to the Senate whether a duty to this amount should be continued for the protection of a single establishment. For himself, he expressed no opinion. Every Senator would form his own judgment. Here was a worthy manufacturing establishment, in which a large capital had been invested, and which seemed to be in successful operation. Of the amount of ware which had been made there he was not informed.

Mr. CALHOUN observed that his position as a Southern Senator was different from many of the gentlemen who, with himself, were desirous of a reduction in the revenue. According to the compromise bill of 1833, the tariff duties were gradually going off, and they were all to come down to 20 per cent. by the year 1842. If the amount of imports did not interrupt the operation, it would take off two millions of revenue annually. And he would now tell Southern gentlemen on all sides, that no paltry advantage to be derived from striking out $50,000 on this article, and $100,000 on that, should ever induce him to give up the advantages to be derived to the South from a regard to the compromise law; and let him say to Southern gentlemen generally, that they will greatly injure themselves, if, from any such temptations, they should be induced to yield up their stronghold. Senators who are now new in their seats would find, from sad experience, how hard, how very hard a thing it was to get duties taken off when they had once been imposed. He had himself been greatly surprised, in the outset of his public career, when an old and experienced statesman had told him that it was a much easier thing in Congress to lay duties on the people than to take them off. If Southern gentlemen were now guilty of the egregious folly of yielding up the compromise bill by the little petty temptation of repealing a small amount of duties, they would have ample leisure for repentance. Gentlemen on the other side now called upon them not to disturb the compromise, declaring, at the same time, that they understood themselves as pledged to its observance. Mr. C. would respond to the call, and hoped that the response would be general. For his own part, he held that there was no pledge on the part of the South; and, when the compromise bill passed, he had expressly told all the Senators present that he held himself perfectly free from all pledge on the subject, and that he might advocate a further reduction, or not, according to circumstances. He was now prepared to stand upon that bill, and not to disturb it. He should not interfere with the advantage which the Northern States were now deriving from it; and hereafter, when the time came that the South, in its turn, was to reap the benefit, he should, in all fairness, claim a similar observance on the part of the North. As to the duties under 20 per cent., if the friends of the tariff would say that they could not, with propriety, be removed, Mr. C. would say retain them; but if they could be reduced, or altogether abolished, he should rejoice. This was the position he had deliberately taken. He felt it to be both strong and honorable; and he was fully persuaded that it was such a position as would, upon the whole, be found most for the interest of the Southern States.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that he understood the principle of the bill to be to reduce the duties on such articles as would not interfere with those protected. If that was its principle, it had his cordial approbation. He believed that the interests of the manufacturers themselves required the duties, in some cases, to be reduced. But as to the article now in question, the manufacture of it had been commenced on the faith of the continuance of the existing protection, and it came fairly within the compromise. The question was not whether many factories of this species of ware existed or not—because the principles of the compromise were submitted to the opinion of the people. They had been well understood by the whole nation, and universally approved; and, were he engaged in this branch of business, he should expect and claim the protection of the compromise bill, and should deem it a violation of the public faith should the existing duty be removed. Mr. B. concurred with the Senator from South Carolina in his desire that the compromise should stand undisturbed. The purpose, however, for which he had now risen was to give the Senate some information in regard to a manufactory of China ware, entirely distinct from that in Jersey city, which he believed was confined to porcelain or queensware. This was solely for China. The proper material for the construction of China ware of the finest quality had been some years since discovered in the State of Pennsylvania, and an amiable and estimable man, formerly a member of the other House, and well known to many Senators, [Mr. B. was understood to refer to Judge Hemphill, of Philadelphia,] had embarked nearly his whole fortune in the enterprise. He took pride and pleasure in bringing the manufacture to a high degree of perfection, and he had succeeded in the production of ware as beautiful in all respects as any imported. The manufacture had been commenced under favorable auspices, and Mr. B. believed still continued to prosper. He thought that the protecting duty ought to be suffered to remain. It was not right to say that, because there were but two or three hundred thousand dollars embarked in this branch of business, it was nothing; and the manufacture might be ruined and crushed, because it was comparatively in its infancy. He hoped that the amendment which had been offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WALL] would prevail, and that the principles of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] would govern the legislation of the Senate.

Mr. WEBSTER had risen to observe that it would be wise in the Senate to be cautious in the course they should now adopt. They had passed a bill the last year reducing the duties on some articles of domestic manufacture, which were completely out of the reach of foreign competition; and it had encountered no opposition. But he thought the country was not now prepared for a bill which should go beyond that class of manufactures.

Reduction of the Tariff.

[SENATE.]

On the present occasion, so great was the dearth of information, that the Senator at the head of the Finance Committee, who introduced the bill, had found himself obliged to state that, when this article was inserted, he was entirely ignorant of the existence of any domestic establishment of the kind with which it would interfere. Gentlemen, one after another, were rising in their places and stating isolated facts—each of which had an important bearing on the provision proposed to be inserted in the bill. Considering, then, the admitted want of information, which was indispensable to an enlightened discharge of their duty; considering, too, the very short period which had elapsed since the introduction of the bill, and still more the great importance of getting some bill passed which should reduce the duty on articles that would not interfere with our own domestic industry; and taking into view the late period of the session, and the opposition which must be elicited by persisting in a course of this kind, he thought it, on the whole, to be prudent to leave out of the bill all those items which were in a considerable degree doubtful, and confine it to such alone as would interfere with none of our own great interests. Why should not such a course be adopted? Why would not the committee confine themselves to a plain and obvious path?

Mr. W. said that he had made these observations more with a reference to the bill in general than to the particular item now under discussion. He wanted some bill of the kind to pass, but he wanted it to stop short of our own manufactures. A bill of this character would be attended with good results. But as certainly as clauses should be introduced which attacked our own domestic interests, they would raise the opposition of the respective delegations in the other House representing the States more immediately concerned, and thus the bill would in all likelihood be defeated. As to this particular item of porcelain, he thought it presented a pretty strong case. The amount of duty, to be sure, was large, but it was now found that there existed several important domestic establishments—he heard it said around him that there were at least some half dozen of them—to whose protection it was indispensable.

Mr. CUTHBERT inquired what interests were intended to be protected by the compromise bill? According to his understanding, that bill had been designed to cover those, and those only, which were then in existence. It was never intended to protect interests which did not then exist, and which were to be created by the protection provided for them. And would gentlemen vote for the continuance of duties to protect interests of this last description? Whenever they raised up a new manufacture by the force of protecting duties, they prejudiced those which already existed. To do so was not to act on the policy of the compromise, but in direct violation of it. Did Senators owe but one duty to the Government? Had they nothing else to look to but the protection of certain manufacturing establishments? He denied it; they had another and most important duty to perform; and that was, to bring down the revenue to the actual wants of the Government. And, in discharge of this great duty to the whole country, was the existence of a single manufacturing establishment to present an insuperable obstacle? He denied it. He must go on, and perform the duty he owed to the country at large, and let the interests of a few individuals give way. He had heard no Senator, in the course of this debate, while urging the obligation of the compromise, pretend to say that it was any obstacle to the raising of duties, but only to the lowering of them.

Mr. CALHOUN replied, that it was not pretended that the compromise act had any irresistible binding force beyond that of other laws; but both honor and interest called upon him to insist on the advantages which would accrue from its observance. He had declared his intention to stand by it, and he construed the silence of gentlemen on the other side as a pledge that they would do the same. He was sure that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] must well remember that he had insisted that all articles the duties of which were below 20 per cent. should be made free, if it could safely be done; but as it appeared that there were some establishments just coming into being, to whom the protecting duty was very important, he should not be for disturbing it. He was for respecting both sides of the agreement.

Mr. CLAY observed that he thought that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CUTHBERT] must perceive that the rule he had laid down was too narrow; namely, that the protection afforded by the law of 1833, commonly denominated the compromise act, should be limited to the interests which then existed, and must not be extended to any which had sprung up since. Now, what was the aim of the great system of protective policy? Was it not the introduction from abroad of all those branches of manufacture which conduced to the national prosperity, that they might be planted and might flourish upon our own soil? Now, almost all these branches of domestic industry had been largely extended since 1833. Were our extensive cotton mills, for instance, any the less worthy of protection because they had grown to their present perfection since that time? There were many articles not enumerated in that act, which were nevertheless included in its principle. The act established a rule, and laid a foundation by which duties were to be regulated. All those articles on which the duty was 20 per cent. and above, were to remain under their present protection till the year 1842. What was contemplated by such a provision? None, surely, could dream that there was to be a change in the law till the year 1842 arrived. This was undeniably the understanding of both parties at the time, and, he might add, the understanding of the nation generally. The law had every where been received with plaudits and the utmost demonstration of joy. The people accordingly had gone to work and erected their establishments on the faith of this agreement; and these establishments were as much within the spirit and letter of the law as if they had existed when the law was passed, so that the question which had been stated by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GRUNN] was the true question. If the duty on any article was 20 per cent. or above, Congress could not touch that article till the year 1842, if it regarded the compromise. If the duty was below 20 per cent., then it might be touched and abolished altogether, provided such a measure did not interfere with important interests of the country. As to the propriety of adhering to the compromise, Mr. C. had no doubt or hesitation. He went for adhering to it. The country expected this. They reposed upon it, and it should be regarded with that respect which was extended to all other compromises. The constitution itself was one; and yet all profess to hold it sacred. The Missouri question was another. The law in that case had no more binding force than any other act of Congress; but who would think of disturbing the compromise which it embodied? Would any body repeal that act? Would the South repeal it, which contended they were the weaker interest on that question? The same consideration applied to the tariff. Would the South, who were the weaker interest upon the tariff question, consent to give up the compromise? Did they not perceive that the moment they did this the whole question of protective policy was again thrown open, and that the same causes which had produced the tariff laws of 1824 and 1828 would come into operation, and would lead to the passing of another tariff law? It was clearly the interest of all parties concerned to adhere to that compromise.

SENATE.]

Reduction of the Tariff.

[FEB. 21, 1837.]

That was the salt which had preserved our body politic from dissolution. It was the bond of peace and reconciliation between the North and the South. He had no objection to retain protective duties; but he would not, for the sake of doing so, disturb any of the great principles of the compromise law. As to this article of china or porcelain, if it paid a duty of 20 per cent. or above, he was not for disturbing it.

Mr. CUTHBERT said that the item now under discussion presented a distinct subject to the Senate. The question was not whether a large manufacturing interest had grown up since 1833, but it was this: whether, in the application of an important policy of this Government, a certain article not protected by the compromise law when it was passed, because not then in existence, was to be an insuperable obstacle to the action of Congress in reducing the revenue. The duty on porcelain and earthenware exceeded $200,000 annually, and the only establishment to be affected by the repeal of it was one in the State of New Jersey. Ought this single establishment to interpose an insurmountable difficulty against the carrying out a great and necessary policy of the country? He thought not. Was it not admitted to be an important principle of legislation to avoid at all times the imposition of a greater mass of taxes than were absolutely necessary? All good Governments admitted this principle, and acted upon it; and it was certainly a new doctrine that the prosperity of a single small manufacturing establishment should interpose to prevent its observance. Admit this, and the next step he supposed would be to retain the duty on salt, so that the poor man must not be permitted to render his food savory for himself and children, lest the interest of some great capitalist should be interfered with. In a republican Government, where the interest of the many was admitted to be the governing principle, an onerous tax upon the necessities of life must ever be held as odious and detestable. The poor and hard-working man could not throw a little salt into his pot, but the authority of the Government must appear in its most odious form, and demand of him a heavy duty to favor some large manufacturing establishment. Mr. C. had understood the matter very differently. This was a new construction of the constitution, and it had grown up with the growth of the far-famed American system. The original doctrine was, that protective duties were to be imposed only in those cases where art, ingenuity, and improvements in machinery would enable us to contend with the manufacturers of older nations. But now a totally new construction was contended for. Wheat, salt, gold, all that God gave us from out of the earth or above the earth, were manufactured articles, and must be protected accordingly.

Mr. WALL said he did not greatly thank the liberality of the honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CUTHBERT] for throwing salt into his dish without his consent; and he should not suffer the question before the Senate to be drawn off to an issue totally different and unconnected with it. The Senator, too, was incorrect in his facts. The porcelain manufacture in New Jersey had not grown into existence since 1833, but had been established in 1828. Nor was it the only establishment to be affected by this bill. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] had given the history of a large establishment in Philadelphia, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] had spoken of some half dozen others. The Jersey establishment had not grown up under the compromise, and, therefore, it, at least, was taken out from one of the principal objections of the Senator from Georgia. He could not say how extensive the establishment was, but he knew that the duty, which was 20 per cent., had received the sanction of several Senators who had been the most prominent and active in advocating the compromise.

Mr. NORVELL demanded the yeas and nays on the question, and they were ordered by the Senate.

The question being then put on the amendment proposed by Mr. WALL, namely, to strike out from the list of free articles China and porcelain, earthen and stone ware, it was carried, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, McKean, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, White—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Walker, Wright—20.

So the article was stricken out, the duty retained, and the principle laid down in the compromise act complied with.

Mr. DAVIS next moved to strike out the article of "common salt." On this motion a prolonged debate ensued, of great interest and animation, in which Messrs. WRIGHT and PRESTON occupied the floor at considerable length, and in which not merely the immediate question of the duty on salt, but the general bearings of the bill, particularly in its relation to the compromise act of 1833, were discussed.

Mr. BENTON rose to ask for the yeas and nays on the motion, and to give some reasons why it should not prevail. It was a motion vital to the bill, and touched an item in which its greatest value consisted. The motion was to strike from the bill the article of salt, now paying a heavy duty, and which this bill proposed to make free of duty. The item was important for the amount of revenue which it produced, say $650,000 per annum, and far more important as being an article of prime necessity and universal use. This being the importance of the article, I, for one, said Mr. B., am willing to go into the discussion of the whole policy of the bill upon this motion; and, further, if the motion prevails, and salt is to remain a taxed article, I care but little for the rest of the bill. The remainder of the articles embraced in it, with the exception of common blankets, Indian blankets, Liverpool earthen ware, and a few others, are either luxuries or trifles; and if we cannot succeed in rescuing from taxation this article of universal use and prime necessity, I shall not exert myself to rescue luxuries and trifles from it.

We are met at the threshold of this debate by an objection which applies not only to the article of salt, but, also, to almost every article of any consequence or importance which the bill contains; and which objection, if it prevails, will reduce the bill to the lowest degree of insignificance, if not to a state of absolute nullity. This objection is founded upon the last clause in the last section of the famous act of March 2, 1833, commonly called, by its friends, the compromise act, but which has no feature of a compromise, except between politicians, and was, in itself, a frustration of the expressed will of the people, and eminently disadvantageous to the country, as well as grossly derogatory to the powers of Congress. That act, in the clause referred to, undertakes to tie up the constitutional hands of Congress to legislate upon the subject of duties until the 30th day of June, in the year 1842, except in relation to articles which, by the act of July 2d, 1832, were subject to an ad valorem duty of less than 20 per cent., and then limits Congress to action upon this small class of items on the contingency of a deficit or excess in the revenue; with a further gracious permission, in the event of either of these contingencies, to supply the want, if there is a deficit, by raising the duty on this class of articles to 20 per cent.; and to cut off the excess, if there is too much, by reducing the rates of duties on the same class of articles.

This is the act; and the bare statement of its enactments presents an arrogant and unconstitutional, and, as the event has proved, a most unwise, attempt to tie up the hands of Congress for nine years, upon the main subject for which the Federal Government was created, and upon which constant attention and frequent action from Congress is required. I do not, said Mr. B., go into the full objections to this miscalled compromise act at present; another occasion, in the course of the debate, will be taken for that task. At present, I limit myself to a mere reference to the heads of my objections to it at the time it was passed; namely, that it was no compromise to which the States or the people were parties, but a mere arrangement between a couple of politicians, to get rid, for a little while, of a bone of contention between themselves, and to enable them to put their shoulders together against the administration; and, thus arranged, was carried through on a cry of civil war and disunion; that it was artfully contrived to keep up high duties for nine years, and then to let all down at once by a plunge, and so produce a general revulsion, and united effort at restoration to their former position, by all the parties interested in the high tariff; that, far from conforming to the will of the people, it was a frustration of their expressed will, made known in the issue of all the elections, and in the total defeat of the high-tariff candidates for the presidency and vice presidency; that it was eminently disadvantageous to the South and West, as it went to prevent further relief from duties till 1842, and then left Congress at full liberty, after that period, to raise the duties as high as ever; and, finally, that it was an arrogant, unconstitutional, unwise, and impotent attempt to limit, restrain, and nullify the action of Congress upon a subject on which they were bound by the constitution to act just so often as action was necessary. For these reasons, and many others, I opposed this act at the time it was passed; and declared then, as I declare now, that I should pay no more regard to it than to any other act of Congress; and that I should act upon the subject of duties whenever it seemed necessary, by looking to the constitution of the United States, and not to this little truce between a couple of antagonist politicians, for the source of my legislative powers.

The article of salt would fall, as would almost every valuable article in the bill, under the prohibitions of this act. By that act, Congress is doubly prohibited from legislating upon it until the advent of that great day for recovering our constitutional powers, which is designated as the 30th day of June, in the year 1842. The prohibition is double—first, as an article not paying an ad valorem, but a specific duty; and next, as paying a duty above 20 per cent. on the value. Under this act, then, our powers are gone, but under the constitution they are in full force; and, as that constitution does not warrant the levy of more money for the federal Treasury than the federal wants require, and we are now levying more than we want, I, for one, shall proceed to reduce the levy, and shall have recourse to the salt tax as the leading and most eminent article on which the reduction should fall. I put it at the head of the list of the articles for abolition of duty, both for the amount of the tax which it produces, and the nature of the article itself. The tax which it brings to the Treasury is about $650,000 per annum; the article upon which it is levied is one of most universal use and of most indispensable necessity. This tax is great in itself, amounting to near an average of 100 per cent. upon the mass of the salt imported; but it is only by looking into the detail of the tax, its amount upon different varieties of salt, its effect upon the trade and sale of the article, upon its importation and use, and the consequences upon the agriculture of the country, for want of adequate supplies of salt, that the weight of the tax and the disastrous effects of its imposition can be ascertained. To enable the Senate to judge of these effects and consequences, and to render my remarks more intelligible, I will read a table of the importation of salt for the year 1835—the last that has been made up—and which is known to be a fair index to the annual importations for many years past. With the number of bushels, and the name of the country from which the importations come, will be given the value of each parcel at the place it was obtained, and the original cost per bushel.

Mr. B. would remark that, salt being brought in ballast, the greatest quantity came from England, where we had the largest trade; and that its importation, with a tax upon it, being merely incidental to trade, this greatest quantity came from the place where it cost most, and was of far inferior kind. The salt from England was nearly one half of the whole quantity imported, its cost was about sixteen cents a bushel, and its quality was so inferior that neither in the United States nor in Great Britain could it be used for curing provisions, fish, butter, or any thing that required long keeping, or exposure to southern heats. This was the salt commonly called Liverpool. It was made by artificial heat, and never was, and never can be made pure, as the mere agitation of the boiling prevents the separation of the bittern and other foreign and poisonous ingredients with which all salt water, or even mineral salt, is more or less impregnated. The other half of the imported salt costs far less than the English salt, and is infinitely superior to it; so far superior that the English salt will not even serve for a substitute in the important business of curing fish and flesh, for long keeping or southern exposure. This salt was made by the action of the sun in the latitudes approaching and under the tropics. We begin to obtain it in the West Indies, and in large quantity on Turk's Island, and get it from all the islands and coasts under the sun's track from the Gulf of Mexico to the Black sea. The Cape de Verd islands, the Atlantic and Mediterranean coasts of Spain and Portugal, the Mediterranean coast of France, the two coasts of Italy, the islands in the Mediterranean, the coasts of the Adriatic, the Archipelago, and up to the Black sea, all produce it and send it to us. The table which has been read shows that the original cost of this salt—the purest and strongest in the world—is about nine or ten cents a bushel in the Gulf of Mexico; five, six, and seven cents on the coasts of France, Spain, and Portugal; three and four cents in Italy and the Adriatic; and less than three cents in Sicily. Yet all this salt bears one uniform duty; it was all twenty cents a bushel, and is now near ten cents a bushel; so that while the tax on the English salt is a little upwards of fifty per cent. on the value, the same tax on all the other salt is from 100 to 200, and 300, and near 400 hundred per cent. The sun-made salt is chiefly used in the great West, in curing provisions; the Liverpool is chiefly used on the Atlantic coasts; and thus the people, in different sections of the Union, pay different degrees of tax upon the same articles; and that which costs least is taxed most. A tax ranging to some hundred per cent. is in itself an enormous tax; and thus the duty collected by the Federal Government from all the consumers of the sun-made salt is in itself excessive; amounting, in many instances, to double, treble, or even quadruple, the original cost of the article. This is an enormity of taxation which strikes the mind at the first blush; but it is only the beginning of the enormity, the extent of which is only discoverable in tracing its effects to all their diversified and injurious consequences. In the first place, it checks and prevents the importation of the salt. Coming as ballast, and not as an article of commerce on which profit is to be made, the shipper cannot bring it except he is supplied with money to pay the duty, or surrenders it into the hands of salt dealers, on landing, to go his security for the payment of the duty. Thus the importation of the article is itself checked; and this check operates with the greatest force in all cases where the original price of the salt was least; and, therefore, where it operates most injuriously to the country.

In all such cases the tax operates as a prohibition to use salt as ballast, and checks its importation from all the places of its production nearest the sun's track, from the Gulf of Mexico to Constantinople. In the next place, the imposition of the tax throws the salt into the hands of an intermediate set of dealers in the seaports, who either advance the duty, or go security for it, and who thus become possessed of nearly all the salt which is imported. A few persons employed in this business engross the salt, and fix the price for all in the market, and fix it higher or lower, not according to the cost of the article, but according to the necessities of the country, and the quantity on hand, and the season of the year. The prices at which they fix it are known to all purchasers, and may be seen in all prices current. It is generally, in the case of alum salt, four, five, ten, or fifteen times as much as its cost. It is generally forty, or fifty, or sixty cents a bushel, and nearly the same price for all sorts, without any reference to the original cost, whether it cost three cents, or five cents, or ten cents, or fifteen cents, a bushel. About one uniform price is put on the whole, and the purchaser has to submit to the imposition. This results from the effect of the tax, throwing the article, which is nothing but ballast, into the hands of salt dealers. The importer does not bring more money than the salt is worth, to pay the duty; he does not come prepared to pay a heavy duty on his ballast; he has to depend upon raising the money for paying the duty after he arrives in the United States; and this throws him into the hands of the salt dealer, and subjects the country purchaser to all the fair charges attending this change of hands, and this establishment of an intermediate dealer, who must have his profits, and also to all the additional exactions which he may choose to make.

This should not be. There should be no costs, nor charges, nor intermediate profits, on such an article as salt. It comes as ballast—as ballast it should be handed out—should be handed from the ship to the steamboat—should escape port charges and intermediate profits; and this would be the case if the duty was abolished. Thus the charges, costs, profits, and exactions, in consequence of the tax, are greater than the tax itself. But this is not all; a further injury, resulting from the tax, is yet to be inflicted upon the consumer. It is well known that the measured bushel of alum salt—and all sun-made salt is alum salt—it is well known that a bushel of this salt weighs about eighty-four pounds; yet the custom-house bushel goes by weight, and not by measure, and fifty-six pounds is there the bushel. Thus the consumer, in consequence of having the salt sent through the custom-house, is shifted from the measured to the weighed bushel, and loses twenty-eight pounds by the operation. But this is not his whole loss; the intermediate salt dealer deducts six pounds more, and gives fifty pounds for the bushel; and thus this taxed and custom-housed article, after paying some hundred per cent. to the Government, and several hundred per cent. more to the regraters, is worked into a loss of thirty-four pounds on every bushel. All these losses and impositions would vanish, if salt was freed from the necessity of passing the custom-houses; and to do that, it must be freed in toto from taxation. The slightest duty would operate nearly the whole mischief; for it would throw the article into the hands of regraters, and would substitute the weighed for the measured bushel.

Such are the direct injuries of the salt tax; a tax enormous in itself, disproportionate in its application to the same article in different parts of the Union, and bearing hardest upon that kind which is cheapest, best, and most indispensable. The levy to the Government is enormous, $650,000 per annum upon an article only worth about $600,000; but what the Government receives is a trifle, compared to what is exacted by the regrater—what is lost in the difference between the weighed and the measured bushel—and the loss which the farmer sustains for want of adequate supplies of salt for his stock, and their food. Assuming the Government tax to be ten cents a bushel, the average cost of alum salt to be seven cents, and the regrater's price to be fifty cents, and it is clear that he receives upwards of three times as much as the Government does; and that the tribute to those regraters is near two millions of dollars per annum. Assuming, again, that thirty-four pounds in the bushel are lost to the consumer in the substitution of the weighed for the measured bushel, and here is another loss amounting to nearly three eighths of the value of the salt; that is to say, to about $250,000 on an importation of $650,000 worth.

These detailed views of the operation and effects of the salt duty, continued Mr. B., place the burdens of that tax in the most odious and revolting light; but the picture is not yet complete; two other features are to be introduced into it, each of which, separately, and still more, both put together, go far to double its enormity, and to carry the iniquity of such a tax up to the very verge of criminality and sinfulness. The first of these features is, in the loss which the farmers sustain for want of adequate supplies of salt for their stock; and the second, from the fact that the duty is a one-sided tax, being imposed only on some sections of the Union, and not at all upon another section of the Union.

A few details will verify these additional features. First, as to the loss which the country sustains for want of adequate supplies of salt. Every practical man knows that every description of stock requires salt; hogs, horses, cattle, sheep; and that all the prepared food of cattle requires it also—hay, fodder, clover, shucks, &c. In England it is ascertained, by experience, that sheep require, each, half a pound a week, which is twenty-eight pounds, or half a custom-house bushel, per annum; cows require a bushel and a half per annum; young cattle a bushel; draught horses and draught cattle a bushel; colts and young cattle from three pecks to a bushel each per annum; and it was computed in England, before the abolition of the salt tax there, that the stock of the English farmers, for want of adequate supplies of salt, was injured to an annual amount far beyond the product of the tax. Dr. Young, before a committee of the British House of Commons, and upon oath, testified to his belief that the use of salt, free of tax, would benefit the agricultural interest, in the increased value of their stock alone, to the annual amount of three millions sterling; near fifteen millions of dollars. Such was the injury of the salt tax in England to the agricultural interest, in the single article of stock. What the injury might be to the agricultural interest in the United States, on the same article, on account of the stinted use of salt, occasioned by the tax, might be vaguely conceived from general observation and a few established facts. In the first place it was known to every body that stock in our country was stinted for salt; that neither hogs, horses, cattle, nor sheep, received any thing near the quantity found by experience to be necessary in England; and, as for their food, that little or no salt was put upon it in the United States; while, in England, ten or fifteen pounds of salt to the ton of hay, clover, &c., was used in curing it. Taking a single branch of the stock of the United States, that of sheep, and more decided evidence of the deplorable deficiency of salt can be produced. The sheep in the United States were computed by the wool growers, in 1832, in their petitions to Congress, at twenty millions; this number, at half a bushel each, would require about ten millions of bushels; now, the whole supply of salt in the United States, both home-made and imported, barely exceeds ten millions; so that, if the sheep received an adequate supply, there would not remain a pound for any other purpose. Of course, the sheep did not receive an adequate supply, nor perhaps the fourth part of what was necessary; and so of all other stock. To give an opinion of the total loss to the agricultural interest in the United States, for want of the free use of this article, would require the minute, comprehensive, sagacious, and peculiar turn of mind of Dr. Young; but it may be sufficient for the argument, and for all practical purposes, to assume that our loss, in proportion to the number of our stock, is greater than that of the English farmers, and amounts to fifteen or twenty times the value of the tax itself!

That the duty upon salt is a one-sided tax—a tax upon some sections of the Union, and not upon other parts—results from the fishing bounties and allowances, which are only applicable to the Northeastern States. These bounties and allowances are founded upon the salt tax, and proceed upon the assumption of reimbursing to the fishing interest the amount of the duty paid upon the salt which is put upon the fish which is exported from the United States. Upon this assumption, about six millions and a half of dollars have been drawn from the federal Treasury; and the payment is still going on at the rate of about $250,000 per annum. Our constitution declares, and, if it did not, the first principles of common justice would prescribe, that taxes and duties should be uniform and equal throughout the Union; but here is no uniformity, no equality. The whole tax that is assumed to be paid in one section of the Union, and far more than is actually paid, is refunded to that quarter; not a cent is refunded in the other quarters of the Union. Thus, what is a grievous tax in some sections of the Union, is no tax at all, but, on the contrary, a money-making business, in another quarter. This is unjust; it is unconstitutional; it is odious and reprehensible. Formerly, at the suppression of the salt tax, in Mr. Jefferson's time, the fishing bounties and allowances were abolished; and in a bill which I myself introduced for the suppression of the tax some years ago, the abolition of these bounties and allowances was made part of its enactments; but opposition was made to it in the Senate; and in the partial reduction of the tax which took place in the bill from the House of Representatives, no corresponding diminution had been made in the fishing bounties and allowances. The present proposition to abolish the salt tax made no alteration in these bounties and allowances. They were permitted to stand, although the whole foundation might be removed on which they rested. Without admitting the equity of this forbearance, I am not disposed to depart from it. I shall make no motion to abolish these allowances; but I draw an argument from it, addressed both to our fellow-citizens of the Northeast and to those of the other sections of the Union; it is an argument addressed to the equity of one side to relinquish, and to the injured rights of the other to demand the repeal of a tax, which is a tax on some quarters of the Union, and not on another part; which is a burden so unequal, so unjust, so partial, so contrary to the declarations of the constitution, and so incompatible with the principles of taxation in a country of equal laws and equal rights.

I think reasons enough have been given for the abolition of this tax; but another reason remains to be advanced. There is a compromise in this case also—a compact—a bargain—for this abolition; one well known to our legislative history, and as binding on the honor of the parties as any such compromise can ever be. The present duty was imposed on a pledge to be taken off in a certain contingency, which contingency has long since happened. The circumstances are these, and they will be recollected by some now present on this floor; and if their memories fail them, recorded evidence will supply the defect. The breaking out of the late war with Great Britain found this article free of tax; it had been made free in Mr. Jefferson's time, and remained so at the breaking out of the war. As a consequence of increased expenses, new taxes were resorted to for the support of the war; and it was proposed to revive the duty of twenty cents per bushel on imported salt. The imposition of the tax was vehemently resisted, but finally carried. The Cato of America, the patriarchal Mr. Macon, though in favor of the war, and of the measures to make it successful, resisted to the last the imposition of this tax, which was finally carried by the small majority of twenty-two votes. It was not until a year after the war was declared, and when the Treasury was driven to extremity for money, that a tax on this article of prime necessity could be imposed. The war was declared in July, 1812; the salt tax was imposed in July, 1813; and then as a war tax, as a temporary measure, to continue to the end of the war with Great Britain, "and for one year after its termination." So says the statute. The war terminated in February, 1815, and in February, 1816, the tax on salt should have ceased; but a heavy debt had been incurred by the war; it was necessary to keep up taxes to pay that debt; and the salt tax, among others, was continued for that purpose, upon the most solemn assurances of being abolished when the war debt was paid. This event has now occurred. The war debt is paid. The contingency for the abolition of the tax has again happened; and the fulfilment of the pledge solemnly pledged is now as solemnly demanded.

These being the great and cogent reasons for abolishing the duty on this article of prime necessity, the question presents itself, what are the opposing reasons? what can be said against it? To this question we find it answered by the speakers on the other side, [Messrs. CALHOUN and PRESTON,] that the act of 1833 forbids it; and by another, [Mr. DAVIS,] that the fishing bounties and allowances will be endangered, and that the protection due to the salt manufactories will be withdrawn from them. To two of those reasons, full and explicit answers have already been given. The act of 1833, so far as it attempts to tie up the hands of Congress for nine years, and to prevent them from performing a constitutional duty within that time, is a nullity. As such it has already been treated, and that by the identical persons now composing the Senate and House of Representatives. In the month of June last, and by a clear vote of the majority of the two Houses, approved by the President, the duties on wines, then far above 20 per cent., and in some instances 100 per cent., were reduced one half. This was done in open contravention of the terms of the compromise law; and is a legal declaration, by each House and by the President, that there is nothing in that act which can arrest or ought to arrest the action of Congress, when it thinks proper to act. Besides, compromise can be quoted in favor of this reduction also; for the duty was revived, as has been shown, as a temporary imposition—as a war tax—only to continue till the war with Great Britain was over, and afterwards until the war debt was paid, and with explicit pledges then to be taken off.

With respect to the fishing bounties and allowances, the bill does not propose to touch them; and it is unnecessary to conjure up, through the medium of alarm, an opposition from the fishing interest on that account. Their interest is untouched; why can they not be quiet? Why not let this bill pass?—this bill, which relieves others, and injures not them. Some years ago I moved the abolition of these fishing allowances, as a sequence to the abolition of the salt duty. The whole fishing interest rose up against it; and at that I did not marvel much, for it touched their interests. Now, we propose to abolish the tax, and let the fishing bounties stand; the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] objects; and at this I marvel greatly; for it does not touch the interest of his constituents. Thus, the fishermen rise up against us, whether we disturb them or not; so that there is no way to relieve ourselves without exciting their opposition. We have to encounter their opposition, whether we disturb their interest or not; and, this being the case, they will have nobody but themselves to blame if, unsuccessful in our attempt to abolish the duty now, without touching the allowances founded upon it, we should, at the next session, at the introduction of another bill, copy the act which was passed in Mr. Jefferson's time, and proceed against the whole together.

The third objection has not been answered, and requires something more of development and detail. It invokes the principle of the protective policy for the preservation of this duty, and calls on the friends of that policy to rally in its defence. Claiming to be a friend to the domestic industry of the country myself, and always voting in favor of protection to it as incidental to the revenue-raising power, when proper occasions are presented, I have now to inquire whether the continuance of this duty can be vindicated on that principle. I maintain that it cannot; and appeal to all the recognised principles of the protective policy for the correctness of this opinion. What are those principles? They are, first, that the protected article must be a necessary of life, for the production of which we should be independent, if we can, of foreign nations. Secondly, that it must be an article requiring skill and capital in its production, and, therefore, necessary to be shielded, during its infancy, from rivalry of perfected skill and accumulated capital in old countries. Thirdly, that, with reasonable protection, for a reasonable time, the domestic manufacture will become established, and will supply the country with the same article, better and cheaper than it comes from abroad.

These are the principles on which the protective policy rests; and now let us test their application to the article in question. In the first place, is it a necessary of life? To that the answer is affirmative, and the test, in this particular, is favorable. In the next place, is it an article requiring skill and capital in the manufacture? To this the answer is, that with respect to the skill, none is requisite; that either in making salt by artificial heat or solar evaporation, the process is so simple that the merest ignoramus can perform it; with respect to capital, whether by sinking wells in the interior of the country, or lifting water from the sea on the maritime coast, very little capital is necessary; and at these two points the test fails, and the protection vanishes. Thirdly, will reasonable protection, for a reasonable time, secure an adequate supply of the domestic article cheaper or better, or even as good and as cheap, as the foreign article? And here the test becomes utterly fatal to the claim of protection. For the salt duties, with a brief intermission of six years—from 1807 to 1813—have now continued almost half a century, and at the enormous rate of several hundred per cent.; and the domestic supply is utterly deficient in quantity, and still more in quality, and far higher than the foreign in price. Upwards of half the salt used in the country is still obtained from abroad; the whole of that used in the provision trade is still so obtained; and the price of the home-made article is often 30, 40, or 50 cents for the regater's bushel of 50 pounds—in reality about two pecks and a half—while the foreign article, especially the pure alum salt, costs originally from 3 cents to about 9 cents for the measured bushel of about eighty-four pounds; and, coming as ballast, it would cost no more, were it not for the duty, in the seaport towns of the United States, than it does at the place of its production. This test is fatal. Of common salt, near fifty years' extravagant protection has not produced any adequate quantity—not more than about five millions of bushels per annum, which is only half enough for the sheep alone of the country. Of alum salt, it may be assumed that none is made; for, in a national point of view, there is none; the establishments on some parts of the New England coasts only supplying a neighborhood demand. In the Great West, where it is most needed, and where it is indispensable to the provision trade, not a pound of solar-made alum salt is produced. This is enough; but a further view yet remains to be taken. The salt manufactories in the United States are divided into two classes: those of the interior, which draw water from wells and boil it; and those of the maritime coast, which lift it from the sea, and evaporate it by the heat of the sun. The former are protected by distance; the latter have had it long enough; and if they cannot now stand alone, let them fall. It is no part of the protective policy to perpetuate protection, to increase private profits, without accomplishing the national object of procuring a home supply on cheaper and better terms than from abroad. Protective duties were never intended to pamper private cupidity, at the expense of public good. They were not invented to perpetuate and accumulate private wealth, but to promote and diffuse public benefits. When they fail or cease to promote the public good, the reason for them ceases. Finally, the present duty was not laid for protection, but for revenue. It was solely, and in all the periods of its imposition, simply and exclusively a revenue measure. The original duty of six cents a bushel was laid in 1789, along with other duties, to raise money to discharge the debt of the Revolution, and to defray the expenses of the Government. It was raised to twenty cents per bushel in 1797, in the time of the elder Mr. Adams, and to aid in defraying the expenses of the preparations occasioned by the prospect of a war with France. Being suppressed in the time of Mr. Jefferson, it was revived in 1813, as a war tax, to continue during the war, and for one year after its termination. At the end of the war it was continued, with other taxes, to pay the debt of the war. Thus all claim to the continuance of the tax, as a protection due to the manufacturers of salt, entirely vanishes, and leaves that argument without a particle of foundation to rest upon.

It is now above eight years (continued Mr. B.) since I began this war upon the salt tax. When I first began it, the venerable and venerated Mr. Macon was a member of this body. From his detestation of this tax I learnt to abhor it; and to his sagacious mind, to his enlightened experience, and to his philosophical observation, I am indebted for many of the arguments which I have used against it. I was, comparatively, young and sanguine; he aged and considerate. I expected my speeches to put down the tax; he counted but little on the effect of speeches against interest and numbers. On one occasion, when I had signally failed of my expected results, getting no votes in return for many good arguments, he said to me, in the tone of despair, that we should never succeed: New York and her forty votes was against us. This, indeed, was discouraging; it brought him to despair, and me to doubt. But despair now vanishes; hope breaks in; light appears in the very quarter where lately the black cloud hung. New York is for us; and this very movement—this bill itself, for the instant and total abolition of the impious tax—is a New York movement. The Senator from that State, chairman of the Committee on Finance, [Mr. WARENT,] brings in the bill. He supports it with the distinguished ability and the disinterested zeal which illustrate his character. His exposition, at the presentation of his bill, was the guarantee of its success; and I sent off that exposition, as a tribute worthy to be offered, to him who was the oldest and noblest opponent of unjust taxation, and the wisest and steadiest friend of the rights of the people. He sent me back, in reply, these characteristic words: that the repeal of this tax would be a proof that righteousness had not yet left the earth. To the good work, then, let us all stand. Cheerily, let us stand to it. Let us suppress this odious tax. President Jackson, in his last annual message, recommends the task; New York leads off; Macon bestows his benediction; the productive classes await the result. And in this first movement—this auspicious commencement—we all see the earnest of the future, and the wisdom of that policy which has taken, for our next President, the friend and supporter of the present one; and taken him from a State whose lead is as powerful and efficacious as it is patriotic and judicious.

When Mr. BENTON sat down, Mr. DAVIS obtained the floor, and was about to address the Senate, when,

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the Indian department for 1837.

Mr. W. explained, at some length, the various provisions of the bill; and the several amendments to the bill proposed by the committee were considered and adopted.

Messrs. SEVIER, LINN, CALHOUN, and TIPTON, participated in a discussion, chiefly relating to the removal and location of the Indians.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the bill was amended so as to authorize the removal of the Indians to the west of the Mississippi, generally, instead of southwest of the Arkansas.

The bill, having been still further amended, on motions of Messrs. SEVIER and WHITE, was ordered to a third reading.

After taking up and considering two or three other bills,

The Senate adjourned.

REDUCTION OF THE TARIFF.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to reduce the duties on certain imports; and the question being on the motion of Mr. DAVIS to strike from the bill the article of common salt, the effect of which is to retain the protecting duty now levied on that article—

Mr. DAVIS rose and said, that as the motion had, on a former day, called forth much discussion in opposition, he felt bound to justify himself in proposing it; and he would here take the occasion to say that he was gratified that this bill, instead of sleeping on the files, had been brought under discussion, for two reasons:

First. The revenue was greater than the demands of the United States required, and therefore ought to be reduced; and, as he approved of most of this bill, he was anxious to give it his support. He should do so, if it received some modifications, so as to save a large body of the citizens of Massachusetts from a sudden, unexpected, and probably a great reverse of their affairs.

Second. If the bill passed in its present form, it would be a distinct declaration to the country that the policy of the coming administration would be to agitate this subject, and to revive the struggles of the opposing sections of the country, which had for a time subsided. If this was to be the policy, he was gratified to have it thus early announced; for those who had spread their canvass to catch the breeze could reef or take in sail before the political storm reached them. It was better to be advised of its approach than to be suddenly overwhelmed by its violence. He had nothing to regret in seeing this subject under consideration, though he should press for some amendments which he deemed important. He should not, in his remarks, touch upon the general subject of protecting the great industry of the country, but should confine himself to the matter in hand, and would show distinctly that common salt had long been manufactured in the United States; that it had on several occasions been countenanced by the Federal Government; that a large capital was employed in it; that the duty was now more than twenty per cent.; that it falls within the provisions of the act of 1833, commonly called the compromise act, and consequently cannot be retained in this bill without modifying the terms of that act, which some gentlemen at least affirm to be sacred. If he proved all this, he felt well assured that this bill, if it became a law, making common salt free of duty, must be held by the country as a declaration which could not be misunderstood; that the tariff of duties was to be the subject of political agitation at future sessions as well as at this.

The time was when it was deemed high and patriotic service to the country to promote the manufacture of salt. All admit it to be an article of the first necessity, as it enters into the consumption of man and beast; and of universal necessity, for the laws of our natures make it almost as indispensable to our existence as the air we breathe. This was early urged as a reason why we should not rely upon the uncertain supplies afforded from foreign countries by commerce, which is liable at all times to be interrupted by wars and restrictions, but should have supplies afforded from our own production, which would be certain and unfailing in all contingencies.

This matter was brought to the test in the revolution—ary war. Commerce was broken up, and the supplies so utterly failed that the privation and distress was great, as the journal of the Congress during that period will prove.

The price became so great that even the Government could not obtain it for the army; and I need state no other fact to show that it was out of the reach of the poor, who were obliged to yield to the distressing privation.

In July, 1775, Congress raised a committee of thirteen, "to inquire into the easiest and cheapest method of making salt in the colonies."

In December, 1775, "Resolved, That as the importation of any universally necessary commodity, and the exportation of our produce to purchase the same, must give a proportionally greater opportunity to our enemies of making depredations on the property of the inhabitants of these colonies, and of occasionally distressing them by intercepting such commodities, it is earnestly recommended to the several assemblies or conventions immediately to promote, by sufficient public encouragements, the making salt in their respective colonies."

June 3, 1777, "Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed, to devise ways and means for supplying the United States with salt."

June 13, 1777, "Resolved, That it be recommended to the several States to offer such liberal encouragement to persons importing salt as they shall judge will be effectual," &c.

"That it be recommended to the several States to erect and encourage, in the most liberal and effectual manner, proper works for the making of salt."

These are some of the resolves of that distinguished body, which indicate the grievous scarcity of that article, and the privation and suffering both in and out of the army in consequence of it.

In response to this public demand, he said he was informed that the works upon Cape Cod, in Massachusetts, were commenced, and have been continued from thence down to this time. They, therefore, had this early origin in an appeal to the patriotic to meliorate the sufferings of their countrymen.

When the Federal Government went into operation, in 1789, under the constitution, the first work of Congress, after providing the forms of the oaths necessary to organization, was to pass that memorable act with this preamble: "Whereas it is necessary, for the support of Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement of manufactures, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported: Be it enacted," &c. This act imposed a duty on salt of six cents a bushel. The duty, therefore, which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] has condemned as odious, and assigned it to the administration of Mr. Adams, as if that cast upon it additional infamy, was the first act of the first Congress under George Washington. In 1790 it was raised to twelve cents, and in 1797 to twenty cents. Odious as it was represented to be, it was continued until 1807, the last year of Mr. Jefferson's administration, when it was all removed, and salt was imported free of duty. Twenty-five years had then elapsed since the revolutionary war, and the privations and distress of that period had faded out of the memories of men; and with this oblivion of the past they forgot the occasion which had excited the public to encourage home production. The country passed on till 1813, when the duty of twenty cents a bushel was restored, and so continued till 1830. The embargo, the non-intercourse acts, and the late war, brought a new pressure upon the country, and fresh suffering, which again reminded the people that salt was an article indispensable to their comfort, and that the supplies by commerce were uncertain and liable to interruptions. The article rose to an extravagant price, selling in many parts of the country at more than five dollars the bushel, (as he had been well informed, here and elsewhere,) and at five and a half dollars the sack in the cities, as a document before him testified. This fresh experience restored men to their senses, and brought them back to the policy of the Revolution; consequently, when the double duties after the war were repealed, that upon salt was left in full force, doubtless to encourage the production.

Fifteen years elapsed, scarcity and high prices were again forgotten, and the necessity of domestic production was again overwhelmed by the very argument used to enforce its expediency. The manufacture was urged, because salt was necessary to all, under all circumstances, and stood upon the same footing as lead, powder, ordnance, arms, and all things necessary to the defence of the country. These, it was said, we should produce ourselves, and rest our dependence upon no foreign nation for supply, as it would be manifestly unwise to trust to the uncertain resources of commerce for the means to defend our country against invasion. Equally unwise was it considered to rely upon a source which had, and doubtless would again, fail us, when commerce should be interrupted from any cause, for an article so necessary as salt. While, therefore, the duty was imposed because the article was one of prime necessity, it was repealed, in part, in 1830, for precisely the same reason. It was then urged, as it now is, that, because all must use it, it ought not to be taxed, but to come in free, though it should destroy the manufactures which had been reared up at a great outlay of capital, and in obedience to the urgent call of the Government itself. The act of 1830 reduced the duty five cents in that year, and five cents in the succeeding year, bringing it down to ten cents, where it stood when the act of 1833 passed, and then it fell under the reducing process of that act. The duty is now eight cents, and next December will fall to seven and a very small fraction.

Such is the history of legislation here upon salt. It proves conclusively that the manufacture is of long standing, and has had the countenance of the Government as deserving protection.

He would now prove its magnitude, as far as he could, by such evidence as he could find on the files here; for he had had no opportunity to hear from those interested, who were at work peaceably at home, and unconscious of the efforts suddenly made here to overthrow them.

The consumption of the country in 1831 was ascertained to be about 10,000,000 bushels, five and a half of which were imported, and the residue, four and a half, produced. The consumption now must be nearly, if not quite, 12,000,000; but the imports for the year ending September, 1835, rise a little above 5,000,000, and, consequently, the domestic production is equal to about 7,000,000 bushels. The capital in 1831 was estimated at about $8,000,000; and, as the production has nearly doubled, the capital now employed doubtless equals $10,000,000 or $12,000,000. The chairman of the committee estimates the duty at 80 per cent. In this I think he is mistaken, as it is manifestly less; but this is not material, as it is admitted on all hands to be more than 20 per cent., and is therefore strictly embraced as a protected article by the terms of the compromise act. And the question is, shall it be abandoned? Is it the purpose of those who go for this measure to disregard that act? If so, then we understand your policy, and, for one, I am happy to see it disclosed.

But is the country prepared for this step? The idea has gone extensively abroad that the compromise act was to be regarded as disposing of these matters for some years to come. The President, in his message, and the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, have both so viewed the matter, and so proclaimed to the nation. The public is therefore at this moment reposing in tranquillity, not anticipating this action, and not prepared to meet it. Is it just, under these circumstances, to affect deeply an interest which has been maturing for more than half a century, and now affords you the best article of the kind in the country? Shall the people engaged in this business be condemned unheard? Will you not let them have an opportunity to prove that they are entitled to your forbearance? I (said he) ask it in their behalf, and, in fairness, it ought to be extended them. But, reasonable as this request is, I foresee that it will be overruled; and this measure will go through this body. It requires no spirit of prophecy to foretell that an important consequence will follow it. The repeal of the law giving a bounty to those engaged in the cod fishery will follow. This is an old policy, almost coeval with the Government; but it stands on two foundations—on two legs—and, if you cut away one, the superstructure will fall. It rests on the desire of this Government to create a nursery of seamen, by encouraging them to pursue the fishery; and the bounty is further justified, on the ground that the duty on salt ought to be reimbursed.

FEB. 23, 1837.]

Reduction of the Tariff.

[SENATE.]

The manufacture of salt and the cod fishery are carried on by the same population, and at the same ports and places; not that the same individuals are engaged in both branches, but having a soil naturally unproductive, they draw their living from the resources of the sea. It is, as I am informed, the business upon which many mariners who have spent the most vigorous period of their lives in hard and perilous service retire, and employ their capital, to enable them to live comfortably.

Now, sir, I have seen enough of things here to satisfy my mind that, if the duty on salt is taken away, the bounty will follow; for those who have no sympathy with the fishermen will claim this as a matter of right.

Such, sir, is the selfishness of our natures, that, when we are interested to forget the gallant deeds, the heroic achievements, the privations and sufferings, of those who have saved the country from dishonor, and won for it an imperishable name, are obliterated from the mind. Why do you wish for seamen? Why desire to increase their number? Because, in the hour of national peril, they stand on the frontier, and interpose their shield between us and the conflict. They are a living wall along the Atlantic, behind which we take shelter. On them it has been our policy to rely; to them we confide our honor, and at no time have they abused the great trust.

Must we break down this policy? Has the period arrived when the people are so imbued with the spirit of avarice, that we grudge this little pittance to the gallant tars of our country? You have taken from them all the little navigating privileges which they had. You have narrowed, by the last treaty, their fishing ground; and this, and this alone, remains to them. If it must be sacrificed also, be it so. Go on with your policy; take away this 250,000 dollars, or whatever the sum is; take it from the sailors, and give it to your ostentatious fleet, fitting out to explore unknown regions; take the bread from them, and bestow it upon those who are sent out in pursuit of glory! And, while you do this, to make your injustice the more manifest, carry your land bill through the other House, and bestow upon favored individuals your public lands, worth three or four hundred millions of dollars. Do it, and, unjust and ungenerous as it is, the lofty-spirited sailor will scorn to entreat any favor at your hands. He will leave this to those who have smoother tongues and more pliant knees.

But, whatever you do, do not invoke the interests of the poor to aid your course or to justify your measures. The poor desire no such measures, for they have no such contemptible spirit. Their sympathies are all with the sailor; they glory in his generous spirit, his noble achievements, his patriotic devotion, his disinterested benevolence, his lofty American character; for the sailor is poor, and labors for the bread he eats. The poor demand no sacrifice of his rights in their name or for their benefit. The poor only ask of you that you would pursue towards them an American policy—a policy which will give them good wages for their labor—and they will take care of themselves. They entreat of you not to degrade them into the deplorable condition of the miserable population of foreign countries, by reducing their wages to the same standard. Can any truth be more apparent than that, where wages are lowest, there is the most poverty and there the most suffering? The whole history of man proves this. What makes the condition of the laborer so eminently prosperous here? How is it that he enjoys not only great physical but moral comforts and blessings, to an extent surpassing that of the laborer in any other country whatever? It is because he is better paid. Now, sir, if you would degrade this population, if you would assimilate it to that of Ireland, then reduce its wages to the same standard, and you will accomplish your object. Break down the business in which it is employed, by subjecting it to direct competition with foreign pauperism; lessen the demand for labor, by introducing foreign productions instead of our own, and like causes will produce like effects. You will then have as poor and wretched a population as that against which it will, in such circumstances, contend for bread. But I will not here pursue the subject. The laborers, I trust, know their interests, and will take care of them. They shall, at all times, have my most hearty co-operation.

But what is this boon which the Senator from Missouri proposes to give to the poor, at the expense of the sailor? The whole revenue derived from salt is rather less than half a million of dollars. Now, divide this among the whole population of the country, rich and poor, equally, and what is it, if every soul should pay an equal sum? Less than three cents a head. And does he seriously believe the poor to be so selfish as to desire this, when such a result is to follow? If he thinks the poor are mean-spirited or avaricious, he mistakes their character: they are not to be tempted to be instrumental in perpetrating a wrong, under such a delusion as this. He mistakes their character and sentiments, and does them great injustice. They ask no such favors, and are the advocates of no such measures. Nothing can be further removed from my views of a wise policy than to tax the poor. I desire no such thing, and they shall have every effort of mine to relieve them from all burdens, as far as it lies in my power. But I would not take from them an ounce, to lay upon them the greater weight of a pound. I would not relieve them from an annual tax of three or four cents, and thereby introduce a policy that would soon call for the sacrifice of half their earnings. I can have no desire but that of their prosperity; no interest that is not theirs also. If they suffer, I must suffer with them. If they prosper, I may hope to participate in it; for a common prosperity is felt by all the community.

If this sacrifice must be made, forbear, I entreat you, to wrong the poor so much as to do it in their name. Strike at the protection of the salt works; take away the bounty on the fisheries, if your policy requires it; leave no proofs behind you that you respect the character or the occupation of the sailor; and still he has a manly spirit that will triumph over it all; he will live without it, and, I doubt not, the patriotic ardor of his honest heart will remain unquenched.

But this is not the only thing this bill aims at, as I stated yesterday, when I moved to strike from it olive oil.

SENATE.]

Reduction of the Tariff.

We have another great fishery, which employs a vast capital, and about 12,000 seamen. There are now, as I am informed by one engaged in the business, 506 ships afloat in the whaling business, estimated to be worth about $15,000,000, and their returns estimated at the probable value of from twenty-two to twenty-five millions. This, like the cod fishery, is carried on as a partnership, each sailor being interested in the voyage. The fishermen have thought the duty on olive oil to be useful to them, as it comes in competition with theirs. They have thought it reasonable that it should be kept on, as our oil is subjected to very heavy duties in Europe. Of the extent of this advantage I am not able to judge, as I have had no opportunity since this bill came before the Senate to learn the views of those interested. It is, however, enough for me to know they have heretofore thought it important. It is all they ask, and the whole revenue derived from it is $23,000. It may affect them injuriously, and therefore it seems to me unwise to take it off. Is it not most judicious first to learn the facts? The men engaged in this business are high-minded and honorable, and, if they cannot make out the propriety of the course, they will not ask you to adhere to it. But I must be permitted to ask why these two navigating interests are selected from all the branches of industry, for this experiment? Are they the least worthy of regard—the least important—the least meritorious? Your legislation has long been tending towards subjecting the navigation of the country to the severest possible competition. One privilege after another has been removed, until we have now reached the last, and there seems to be an impatience to tear them away. With what justice can you call on the navigator to pay duties on duck, on iron, and many other articles which he consumes largely, and take from him these little compensations? If they must be removed, be it so. Let the decree go forth; but I hope some reason will be assigned for it.

I know it is said, and said truly, that we have too much revenue. And while I admit it ought to be reduced, and am as anxious as any gentleman on this floor to accomplish it by this bill, still I cannot resist the conviction that there ought to be something like reciprocal justice in the policy; and if certain interests are selected, while others are left, there ought to be some reason for it. The system of protection embraces the whole industry. It is an entire thing, for the benefit of all; and when you lose sight of that view, it becomes partial and unjust. It contains in itself a compensating principle, that is designed to do justice to all; and if you take that away, you cannot fail to create discontent, and to weaken the interests which are not attached. There is no more sure way of reducing wages than to assault each branch of industry in detail, and by that policy bring those who ought to be united to war one upon another. Those who produce iron claim protection; but with what propriety can they ask for the countenance of the navigators, who consume it largely, if they take away what goes to protect and foster the navigating interest? The laborers, and by laborers I mean all who work, must stand together and protect one another, or they will be made the victims of a policy that will bring them to a level with those who struggle for existence in Europe. They must not be deluded, by little promised advantages, to adopt a course that will be ruinous.

I have been looking forward to the time when this great matter would be disentangled from politics and politicians; when the fervor of excitement would subside, and the public mind become tranquil; when the two great contending parties would see what is undeniably true—that an exclusive policy, adapted to one part of the country, and one alone, can never meet with public approbation; when this great subject would be approached in a spirit of mutual concession and forbearance, and the Southern and Northern industry be all placed upon a footing that would secure to it a stable and enduring prosperity. I thought I saw the dawnings of such an era, a gradual conviction gaining upon the public mind that the prosperity of the North and the South might exist in harmony. When a proper time comes, as I trust it may be permitted to, I hope this adjustment will take place, and public harmony follow upon it, giving to the Union new strength and vigor. With feelings and sentiments of this kind, it seems to me the North has forbore to disturb or to complain of the compromise act, but have acquiesced thus far in its provisions. They are, in no respect, responsible for this movement.

The proposition now is to make salt free. This is not a modification, but a total abandonment of the interest. We have in Massachusetts a capital of about two millions of dollars invested in a great number of works, exposed as much as capital can be in any part of the country to all the fluctuations of price arising from heavy importations. You are about to remove all protection, and leave it to its fate. This is what Great Britain dare not do with her strongest interests. She does not venture upon such a measure with articles which she exports to a vast amount, for the plain reason that a state of things may exist in other countries, from an excess of production, or from pecuniary distress or embarrassment, which may induce them to export at a loss. If such goods or merchandise can come in free in large quantities, even for a short period, prices are greatly reduced, and ruin follows, without any permanent benefit; for prices go back after the mischief is done, and the causes which created it have subsided. It can never, therefore, be wise, when you mean to give stability to business, to suffer it to be thus exposed to all the fluctuations of foreign distress and embarrassment. Let your own citizens have the benefit of some protection, even if it be small, to enable them to withstand such contingent shocks, which constantly occur in commerce. From sixty per cent. to nothing is a long, and, I fear, a hazardous stride as well as bad policy. All goods can never be free, unless the mode of raising revenue is changed. Why should the policy be reversed as to salt? Has it been unwise? Look at the prices since the reduction of duty, and see whether any such great advantages as are predicted will follow. If the works here are destroyed, I will hazard the opinion that the average price of salt will be fully equal to what it has been.

I am aware, however, that the works on the seacoast are in a different condition from the great works of the interior. The latter have all the benefit of a long and expensive transportation, which is equivalent to a strong protection against the foreign article. The manufacturers, therefore, of the interior, have comparatively little cause to complain or to be alarmed; and probably this is the reason why our interest is so little regarded.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] expressed himself highly gratified at what he described as the unexpected magnanimity of New York, and the patriotic sacrifice made by her of her great interest in this manufacture, for the public good. It seems that his venerable friend (Mr. Macon, of North Carolina) had on some former occasion despaired of ever throwing off this duty, because of the great interest of the empire State. When this bill was brought in, the Senator from Missouri took an early occasion to congratulate his friend upon such signal disinterestedness. Now, if the Senator and his venerable friend had looked into this matter, and better informed themselves, they would have spared me the trouble of proving that this matter affords little occasion for compliment or the high commendation bestowed upon it. The works of New York are far interior, upon and near her great canal. She holds in her own hand the key that unlocks the gates of this highway, and exacts a toll upon all foreign salt, which so entirely prohibits it from entering the country that it is utterly excluded; and New York secures to her works not only a complete monopoly of the market of her great interior West, but of the vast country on the lakes, extending thousands of miles. If this information, which I derive from sources that may be relied on, is incorrect, the Senator from that State can inform the Senate. This monopoly is so exclusive, that the State levies an excise of six cents a bushel on the manufactured article at her own works, and puts the money into her treasury. This bill does not, therefore, touch the works of New York, or affect the interest of her citizens in the slightest degree. She can, therefore, very well afford to make such sacrifices, in which she gets commendation for her magnanimity, while we are the victims. The Senate and the country will now understand how to appreciate this magnanimity.

The Senator from Missouri has offered another reason in support of this measure, which I will also notice, for its singular character. He says the business is in the hands of regraters, a term, though not unknown, yet nearly so in commerce. Regraters are traders, persons who buy and sell; and the Senator thinks this would be broken up if the duty should be repealed. I know not what his expectations are, nor what his ideas in regard to trade are, but he must have come near to the conclusion that it is criminal to buy and sell. What does the Senator desire? What does he aim at? Are people to be deprived of the liberty of traffic? Must they come here, and, bowing themselves down, humbly ask permission to do ordinary business? If a man is engaged in the common pursuits of life, is he to be denounced and condemned, loaded with opprobrious epithets, and held up to scorn? Is it not one of the first and highest principles of public liberty, that all persons may engage in lawful pursuits? Where is this intermeddling with private concerns to end? Is this Government to pry into individual concerns, to ascertain how much and in what way men do business? To give this man permission to go on, that to enlarge, and order another to diminish? No people of spirit could for a moment bear this arbitrary interference.

But suppose it is true that there are regraters, speculators who buy and sell, and the public are craftily played upon by their artful contrivances, how will removing the duty remedy this evil? Will the power of regrating be taken away or impaired? What is to hinder their operating upon salt free of duty as effectually as upon that subject to duty? Let the Senator assign a reason if he can. The proposition shows at once that none can be assigned. This remedy for such an evil may therefore be set down as extraordinary.

Again: that Senator has taken much pains to speak of the low price of salt in foreign countries, showing that it may be purchased in some places at three cents a bushel. But, while he stated this, he omitted to state another fact, that we import no salt, or substantially none, that costs so small a sum. The tables of imports which lie before me settle this matter. The importation of 1835 may be taken as a sample of all other periods. The amount was 5,375,000 bushels; of this, 3,800,000 came from England and her dependencies; of the remaining million and a half, about one million from Portugal. By far the larger portion of salt comes direct from Liverpool, and is estimated to cost there, in the document before me from the Treasury, fifteen cents. It is, as every body knows, an inferior article to the salt of Cape Cod, which is made by solar evaporation. The reason of this is manifest. Our great exporting trade goes to England, and the homeward freights are comparatively cheap, and the price of salt will always depend much upon the activity of that trade, and the consequent occasions vessels have for ballast or homeward cargoes. The statement of the Senator, therefore, if taken without explanation or qualification, would mislead the public mind.

Sir, twelve cents of the duty has been removed, and although the last three years have been very great exporting years, and consequently very favorable to a strong reduction of price, yet no reduction has been experienced, approaching to the predictions made when the law of 1830 was passed. This has probably served to perplex the Senator. If this bill should affect, as it probably will, the manufacture here injuriously, the trade will only be more fluctuating than it has been, while little or nothing will be gained in the average price.

I have, sir, felt it to be my duty to say thus much in vindication of the interests of a portion of my constituents, and of the principles which guide me in voting here. And I repeat that I am anxiously desirous to throw no unnecessary obstacle in the way of this bill. I approve of nearly the whole of it, and hope it will take a form that I can vote for it. I cannot, however, be reconciled to an act which selects our interests, and especially our navigation, for experiments. Let us have equal and exact justice, and we are content; for we ask no local or special privileges. If I do not mistake the facts, I think I have proved all I proposed to establish; and with this vindication of our rights I leave the matter to the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. BENTON rose, and went into an argument at some length in reply, to prove that the bounty on the cod fishery rested wholly on the duty upon salt, and that there would be no ground for continuing it after the duty was repealed.

Mr. DAVIS observed that he was gratified with the frankness of the Senator, for some discredited him when he said the repeal of the bounty law would follow this act. He thought he did not misunderstand the hints which were thrown out, and he now had the best evidence that he did not. He would, however, on a proper occasion, show that the bounty was for other purposes besides reimbursing the duty on salt. He could establish this, but he feared it would avail the fishermen nothing.

Mr. CALHOUN rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

The announcement by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that this bill was framed and introduced on the assumption that the act of 1833 was no longer to be respected, gave to it an importance which demanded the most serious consideration. That act closed the tariff controversy between the North and the South; and the question now presented is, shall it again be opened? Shall we reopen a controversy which, during the long period from 1821 to 1833, agitated the country, governed its legislation, controlled the presidential elections, and finally shook its institutions to the centre? Shall we of the South, in particular, assent to open this formidable controversy—we who are, on this subject, in a permanent minority? Shall we agree to surrender our share of interest in the act of 1833—an act which has already repealed from twenty to twenty-five millions of duties annually, and which, if left undisturbed, will in a few years take off ten more, and reduce the duties to the constitutional and legitimate wants of the Government? Will we agree to surrender all of these advantages, which were extorted from the adverse interest at the hazard of civil conflict, and take our chance in the renewed conflicts which must follow, if the controversy be again opened? This the chairman of the Committee on Finance asks you to do; and what is the compensation he holds out to you for such great sacrifices?

The whole may be summed up in the repeal of the duty on salt, amounting annually to about $550,000. It is true, this bill goes further, and provides for a reduction to the amount of $2,400,000 annually; but of these the larger portion are duties under twenty per cent. ad valorem, which by the act may be repealed without disturbing the compromise; and the residue, with the exception of salt, and perhaps on one or two other articles, are either of a doubtful character, or can be repealed by common consent of all the interests involved. Here, then, is the great boon which is proffered by the Senator, [Mr. WRIGHT,] to induce us to sacrifice our interest in the act of 1833; to magnify which, he has pronounced an eulogium on the magnanimous course of the State of New York, in assenting to the repeal of the duty on salt; of which article, he tells us, she manufactures more than any other State, while he forgets to inform us that she has little or no interest in the repeal, as she has secured a monopoly in favor of her manufacture by the imposition of an enormous duty on the transportation of salt on her canals, through which channel only the imported can come in competition with the manufactured salt. The question now to be decided is, shall we accept the boon, and make the sacrifice?

I acknowledge the duty to be odious and unequal, but I must think, as much so as it may be, we should purchase its repeal too dearly by the sacrifice we are asked to make. Regarded as a mere pecuniary transaction, and laying aside all political considerations, we would not be justified. The duty on salt amounts, as I have stated, to upwards of half a million annually, while the average reduction of duties under the act of 1833 will not be less than two millions annually, for the next five years, all of which we may reasonably expect will be taken off, if, on our part, we firmly adhere to the act. But this is altogether too strong a statement of the case on the side of repeal.

The Senator, in his eagerness to magnify the oppressive character of the duty on salt, stated it to be ten cents the bushel, overlooking the fact that the act of 1833 has already reduced it below eight cents, and that it will in a short time reduce it below three, if it be left undisturbed; so that the real question is not between a repeal and a permanent continuance of the duty at ten cents, as the Senator would have us believe, but between a sudden repeal of eight cents, and a gradual reduction, in the course of a few years, to the low rate of duty I have stated. It is, in fact, substantially a question between a sudden and a gradual repeal; and, regarded in that light, I would submit to the judicious of all parties which is the preferable, viewed in the abstract, without regard to the act of 1833. The chairman states the present duty at an average of about eighty-six per cent. ad valorem; I would ask, would it be wise to repeal at once so high a duty? Can it be done without ruinous losses, as well to the dealers in the article as the manufacturer? Even Carolina, in the heat of her contest against the protective system, never contemplated allowing less than six or seven years for the reduction of the protective duties to the revenue point; and shall we now, by a sudden and total repeal of so high a duty, prove ourselves less considerate in relation to existing investments than a State so decidedly opposed to the whole system in the midst of the greatest excitement?

But, whichever may be preferable, it is certain that the practical difference, as far as the South is concerned, is too small to warrant the sacrifice of the great interest which she has in maintaining inviolably the act of 1833, particularly when we consider that, as small as is the difference, we have no assurance of ever receiving this inconsiderable boon. Let us not forget that, if we of the South vote for this bill, we not only give much where we can receive but little, but we also give a certainty for an uncertainty. By the vote itself, whether the act passes or not, we surrender our position. We cannot, after disregarding the interests of others in the act, insist that they shall respect ours, when they become the subject of discussion. If we should now vote to repeal or reduce duties more rapidly than the act provides, how can we complain if the manufacturing interest should hereafter increase the duties, or retard or arrest the reduction provided by the act? Fair and honorable dealing has ever distinguished the Southern character; and I trust we have too much self-respect to complain, if the measure we now mete to others should hereafter be measured to ourselves. Our vote, then, for this measure would release the opposite interest from all obligation to respect the act of 1833, whatever may be the fate of this bill. Now, I ask, what assurance have we that this bill will pass? Is it not almost certain that it cannot? We are now within seven days of the end of the session. The bill is in Committee of the Whole, and cannot pass the Senate in less than two days; and what prospect is there that it can pass the other House in so short a time as remains, with the great diversity of opinion which must exist there as to this measure? It is next to impossible.

But suppose it to be practicable, have we any assurance that those who have introduced the bill are sincere in their desire to pass it? Have we no cause to apprehend that it is a mere political manœuvre, without regard to the interest of North or South, and which the contrivers would rather see defeated than passed? I must say that, to me, it seems to wear that appearance. Why has this bill been delayed to this late period? It is now more than three weeks since it was reported, and why were measures of little importance, and, to say the least, of doubtful policy, permitted to occupy the time of the Senate, in preference to this, which we are now told is so important? Why such contradictory declarations as to the state of the Treasury? At one time we are told there will be no surplus, and that the duties must be raised; and at another that the revenue will be so excessive as to call not only for the passage of this bill, but the extraordinary one which has passed this body in relation to the public lands? With all these indications, gentlemen must not be surprised that I am somewhat incredulous as to their zeal or sincerity, which is not a little increased when I look to the source from which it comes. Have you forgot the tariff of 1828, that bill of abominations so execrated by the South, and which has brought so many disasters on the country? I have [looking at Mr. WRIGHT] its author in my eyes, and he knows the fact. He well remembers the part he bore in the passage of that act, and the means by which it was effected. It was passed by a breach of faith. We were deceived then. It will not be my fault if we be deceived now. To guard against that, I must ask the indulgence of the Senate while I give a brief narrative of the passage of that oppressive act, and the part which the Senator acted at the time. I have no intention to wound his feelings. My object is not personal. That would be unworthy of the occasion, and, I trust, of myself. Far different motives actuate me. From the past we learn to anticipate the future. We then followed his lead. We know the result. He now invites us again to follow him on the same subject, though apparently in an opposite direction. Shall we follow? His course on the former occasion will best enable us to decide that question. I was a witness of the events of the day, and feel called upon to give the history of the transaction, in order to guide our decision now.

The tariff of 1828 was as much a political movement as a measure of protection. The protective policy had triumphed in Congress by the passage of the tariff act of 1824, which was followed by the election of Mr. Adams to the presidency the next year, by which the protective system gained an ascendancy in the executive, as it had previously in the legislative department of the Government. Emboldened by this success, an attempt was made in the session of 1826-'27 to increase the duty on wool and woollens, which was rejected by my casting vote as presiding officer of this body. These interests, not finding themselves strong enough to force their way through Congress, determined, in the spirit of the system, to unite with other interests, so that by their joint influence they might secure a majority. With this view, a combined movement was made by the manufacturing interests, which met at Harrisburg, and agreed on a new tariff, to be laid before Congress at the next session, and containing a long list of articles, with a great increase of duties. This movement was understood to have the countenance and support of the then administration. In the mean time, the anti-tariff interest of the South had selected General Jackson as the candidate against Mr. Adams for the presidency. His principal strength in the tariff States lay in Pennsylvania, New York, and Ohio. They were thoroughly in favor of the protective system, and his supporters there were not a little alarmed at the movement at Harrisburg. The battle was to be fought in Congress, and thus the presidential election came to be blended with the subject of the tariff, as it will ever be when an open question.

On the meeting of Congress, the administration proved to be in a minority in the House of Representatives, and their opponents elected Mr. Stevenson (now minister at the court of St. James) Speaker; and then, as now, a devoted friend to the President elect. It was apparent that the movements of the session would be governed by the tariff question, and the Committee on Manufactures was so organized as to give the control to the friends of Mr. Van Buren in the Middle and Western States. Mr. Mallary, who had long been chairman, was continued, but the present chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. WRIGHT] who was then a member of the other House, Mr. Moore, of Kentucky, afterwards minister to Colombia, and Mr. Stephenson, of Pittsburg, were placed on the committee, who, with one member from the South, gave a majority against the administration. Representing, as the committee did, the interests of the Middle and Western States, which were thoroughly tariff, without opposing or conflicting interests of any kind, they reported a bill with much higher duties and far more comprehensive in its items than the Harrisburg project, which was predicated on the joint interests of the whole tariff party, comprehending New England, where industry was divided between manufactures on one side and commerce and navigation on the other. The staple States were wholly opposed to the protective system; and their representatives, being in a minority, had no alternative but to choose between the two projects; and the question was then presented, what ought to be done? One of two courses might be taken: to join the New England interest, and vote such amendments to the bill as would make it acceptable to them, or to resist all such amendments, and take the chance of the members from New England joining those of the South, to defeat the bill on its passage in one or the other House. By the former course they would certainly defeat the bill as reported by the Committee on Manufactures, but they would as certainly insure its passage in a mitigated form, as the members from the Middle and Western States would take any tariff, however small the increase of duty, rather than have none. The former would have fixed the system on the country more firmly than ever, particularly as it would have involved, in all probability, the re-election of Mr. Adams, the acknowledged candidate of the tariff interests. The latter afforded a reasonable prospect of defeating the whole system, as well as the re-election of Mr. Adams. The difficulty in this course was the possible reunion of the two tariff interests by mutual concession in the last stage, in order to insure the passage of the bill. To guard against that result, assurances were given which placed the representatives of the South at ease on that point. I speak not of my own personal knowledge. It was generally so understood at the time; and I was informed by individuals who had a right to know, and who consulted with me what course, under the pressing difficulties of our situation, ought to be adopted, that such was the fact. Our friends accepted the assurance, and accordingly resisted all amendments that would make the bill acceptable to the Eastern interests, as the only possible means of defeating an odious and oppressive system.

The bill passed the House, but in so obnoxious a form to the New England States that a large portion of their Representatives joined those of the South in voting against it. When sent to the Senate, it was soon ascertained that, in this body, where the Southern and Eastern States had a much larger representation in proportion, there was a decided majority against it in the form it came from the House. Every New England Senator, with the exception of one or two, was understood to be decidedly opposed; and, relying on the assurance on which our friends acted in the House, we anticipated with confidence and joy that the bill would be defeated, and the whole system overthrown by the shock. Our hopes were soon blasted. A certain individual, then a Senator, but recently elected to the highest office in the Union, was observed to assume a mysterious air in relation to the bill, very little in accordance with what there was every reason to believe would have been his course. The mystery was explained when the bill came up to be acted upon. I will not give in detail his course. It is sufficient to say that, instead of resisting amendments, as we had a right to expect, he voted for all which were necessary to secure the votes of New England; particularly the amendments to raise the duties on woollens, which were known to be essential for that purpose. All these amendments, with one or two exceptions, were carried by his votes, as appears from the journal, now on my table, which I have recently examined. If his name had been recorded on the opposite side, they would have been lost, and with them the bill itself. He held, at this critical juncture, the fate of the country in his hands. Had he acted in good faith, the bill of 1828 never would have become a law; and the responsibility of its defeat would have fallen on those who first moved on the subject, and would have prostrated the administration which gave that movement its support. With the prostration of the administration would have followed that of the protective system itself, and thus all the consequences which followed that disastrous act would have been averted. Why a course which good faith as well as the public interest so obviously dictated was avoided, and the opposite pursued, has never been explained. It is certain that the instructions of the New York Legislature did not require it; but it may be that those by whose agency the bill was passed, and who owe their present ascendancy to it, then, as now, saw the advantage, in a party view, in having the tariff an open question, however much the country might be the sufferers.

Having traced the tariff of 1828 to the chairman of the Committee on Finance and the President elect, as its authors, I next propose to trace, very briefly, what followed, down to the passage of the act of 1833, which settled the controversy that grew out of the former, and which this bill, originating with its authors, is intended to unsettle, in order that the Senate may have a connected view of the whole series of events connected with this deeply important subject, and of which the present measure forms the last.

I have already stated that General Jackson had been selected by the opposition, as the candidate against Mr. Adams; and it now becomes necessary to add what were the motives which governed the opposition, as far as myself and friends were concerned, in making this selection. They were altogether political. There never was any intimacy, at any time, between him and myself. Our relations were simply friendly, without being in any degree confidential. The leading objects were to reverse the precedent that brought Mr. Adams into power; to arrest the protective system; to overthrow the principle in which it originated, and to restore the old republican doctrines, from which the Government had so greatly departed.

After a long and arduous struggle, the protective system had completely triumphed, as has been stated, in the election of Mr. Adams. Successful opposition to an anti-tariff candidate was hopeless; and the opponents of the system were, accordingly, compelled to elect some one whose position, in relation to the tariff, was not well defined; and who had a popularity in the States friendly to the protective system, unconnected with politics. General Jackson united these advantages, to which he added others, which recommended him to the confidence of the South. He was a cotton planter and a slaveholder; and as such, it was believed, would use his power and influence to arrest the further progress and to correct the excesses of a system so oppressive to the staple States. Circumstances connected with the passage of the act of 1828 first weakened that confidence. I refer in particular to the course of one of the Senators from Tennessee at the time, who was known to be in the entire confidence of General Jackson. I mean not him [Judge WHITTE] who sits at my right; his conduct throughout was above all suspicion; and let me here add, as an act of justice, that, at a subsequent period, when the bill of 1833 was pending, the country owes much to his upright and firm conduct, as the presiding officer of the Senate, in effecting the passage of that measure, which closed the controversy and saved the country from a civil conflict. The course of Mr. Eaton, the individual to whom I allude, was well calculated, on the occasion, to excite doubts as to the views and intentions of General Jackson in relation to the protective policy. Without going into detail, it is sufficient to say that he voted for the bill; and that on one or two decisive questions, on which the fate of the bill depended, it was saved by his votes. These indications shook our confidence in General Jackson; and that, at the critical moment when the passage of the bill cast so deep a gloom over the South, and menaced with so much danger the liberty and institutions of the country.

With the decline of our confidence in General Jackson, it became necessary to seek some efficient remedy that could not deceive, should he fail to fulfil the object for which we selected him as our candidate. That remedy we found in State interposition, and every effort was made without delay to revive the doctrines of the Kentucky and Virginia resolutions of 1798, which formed the original basis of the republican party, but which had so long laid dormant, or neglected, as furnishing means of arresting the fatal consequences of the act 1828, in the event that all others should fail.

In the mean time, the opposite interest was not idle. Measures were taken without delay to secure and perpetuate the advantages already acquired. With this view, the first movement was made by Mr. Dickerson, then a member of the Senate, but now Secretary of the Navy, and who was then, as now, a decided friend of the President elect. At the next session he introduced a bill for the distribution of the surplus revenue, as a permanent measure, intended to perpetuate and protect the system. This was the origin of the measure, now so frequently and loudly denounced by the Senator from New York, and those who acted with him. Whatever evil may flow from it, the responsibility is on him and his political associates, who originated and supported the tariff of 1828. As to us, we saw at once the design and tendency of the measure, and without delay opposed it so decidedly as to defeat its passage. I am gratified to perceive that the Senator, with whom the act of 1828 (the cause of the surplus) originated, is now compelled to acknowledge by his acts our foresight, and the correctness of the course which we pursued; but he must permit me to say that it is unkind in him, who was the author of the evil, to hold us up as the friends of distribution—a measure originating with his party, and introduced in order to perpetuate an act of which he is the author. Instead of censure, he ought to give us some credit for sagacity in foreseeing those evils which he now so often denounces, and for our patriotism in raising our warning voice against the measure in which they originated. He might surely, in our past conduct, find some apology for us, in the fact that we, who have been opposed to distribution, should now, when the surplus is in a regular course of reduction by the act of 1833, prefer depositing an unavoidable surplus with the States, rather than leave it to the deposit banks, for the benefit of stockholders and political partisans. It is not exactly just that they who have done the mischief should escape the blame, and that censure should fall on those who have in every stage been opposed to distribution, and have done all in their power to prevent a surplus.

The failure of Mr. Dickerson's movement in Congress, to perpetuate the tariff of 1828 by distributing the surplus revenue, did not deter the party from pursuing their favorite scheme. The next movement was at the Hermitage, and with so much success that General Jackson was secured in its favor before he arrived in this place to assume the duties of Chief Magistrate. As short as was his inaugural address, it contained, as originally draughted, a recommendation in favor of distribution, which he was induced, with great difficulty, to take out. I speak not of my own knowledge, but on authority on which I implicitly rely. The scheme was not abandoned, though taken out of his inaugural address. He strongly recommended it to Congress in his first and second annual messages, in direct opposition to the opinion of several of the ablest members of his cabinet; and this, too, before the reduction of the tariff of 1828, when, according to his confession in his last message, it would have tended powerfully to perpetuate that oppressive and disastrous measure.

That he acted in concert, in all this, with the authors and supporters of the tariff of 1828, we have conclusive evidence in the corresponding movements of the New York Legislature. Governor Marcy, of that State, followed up the message of the President by a strong recommendation in favor of the distribution of the surplus, to which the Legislature responded by a vote of approval, with a decisive majority; but the measure was too repugnant to the feelings of the community to be forced through Congress, even by the aid of party machinery, backed by the influence and popularity of the President.

In the mean time, the period of the final payment of the public debt was rapidly approaching, when, without a very great reduction of duties, there must be an immense surplus revenue, which could not be absorbed by the legitimate objects of expenditure; and yet the administration then, as at all times, under the control of the party to which the Senator belongs, were too much engrossed in the paltry politics of the day to make the least preparation to meet a juncture so full of embarrassment and danger. Our course was different. We clearly saw what was coming, and prepared in time for the crisis. We saw that if the tariff of 1828 was perpetuated, the staple States would be reduced to poverty and ruin; and accordingly opposed, with all our might, every attempt of the Senator and his party to perpetuate that odious and oppressive measure. We saw, with equal clearness, that without reduction there would be an immense surplus, and, at the same time, that there was not the slightest prospect of such reduction from those in power, who were either blind to the danger or too indifferent to the interests of the country to bestow a moment's attention on the subject. Above all, we saw the danger of so large a surplus; the vast increase, in consequence, of the power and patronage of the Executive; the corruption and speculation that would follow, with the loss of all responsibility on the part of those in power. In all this we could not but see the overthrow of our institutions, and, with them, of the liberty of the country, unless some effectual remedy should be applied. This remedy, as I have stated, was to be found in State interposition; and we accordingly spared no exertion in preparing our State to meet the coming danger, under the banner of State sovereignty. In the mean time, we patiently waited the final payment of the public debt, when, if a sufficient reduction of the duties was not made, by which only the approaching calamity would be averted, it was resolved to interpose the sovereign voice of the State, as the last and only efficient remedy.

At the opening of the session of 1831-'32, the President, in his annual message, announced that the public debt might be considered as extinguished, as there was sufficient money in the Treasury to meet the remnant unpaid; and then, for the first time, the administration began to move on the reduction of the protective duties; but even then, when forced by necessity to act, so absurd and inefficient were the schemes proposed for reducing the duties, that it may well be doubted, even now, whether their desire to keep open the dangerous and vexed question of the tariff did not preponderate over all other motives. Instead of proposing a system of gradual reduction, which would bring down the duties in a limited period to the wants of the Treasury, after the discharge of the debt, without the overthrow of the manufacturing establishments of the country, which was obviously the only practicable and wise course, a partial and inefficient bill was introduced, which provided a limited reduction, without any regular plan. It received the sanction of Congress, and was officially announced to be a final adjustment of the tariff between the conflicting interests. The amount of the reduction of the revenue under its provisions was estimated not to exceed three or four millions of dollars, and yet it was seriously maintained that this inconsiderable reduction would bring down the revenue to the wants of the Government; and such was the force of party delusion at the time, that gentlemen of intelligence returned home and staked their reputation and re-election on that issue. But we were not deceived then, as we do not intend to be now. We clearly saw through the deception, and took our stand at once, with a fixed determination to close the dangerous controversy, and throw off the oppressive and unconstitutional burden which weighed so heavily upon the energy and prosperity of the South. The time for action had arrived. The debt was paid, and yet the tariff of 1828, the offspring of the Senator from New York and his party, remained almost in full energy. After a warm canvass, the State of South Carolina, as one of the sovereign members of this Union, met in convention, declared the act to be unconstitutional, and, as such, null and void. In a word, we nullified. Then followed the proclamation and force bill, as the ultimate means of prolonging the existence of the odious and unconstitutional act of 1828, which the party of which the Senator is a member had attempted to fix on the country by a scheme of permanent distribution; and which, when the issue was made, they were ready to sustain at the hazard of civil war. But, thanks to a kind Providence which had watched so constantly over our destinies, their counsel did not prevail. The spirit of conciliation and compromise overruled that of violence and force. The memorable bill of 1833 was introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] and became a law of the land, in despite of the protective and force-bill party. It closed the conflict between the North and the South, which, if not revived by the arts of those who passed the tariff of 1828, will, I trust and believe, remain closed forever.

Such is the train of events which led to the act of 1833, and the circumstances under which it passed; and we are now called on to decide whether we shall adhere to its provisions or not. The Senator from New York invites us to surrender our interest in it, and to open anew the tariff controversy; and, with a view to test our determination, has inserted in this bill the repeal of the duty on salt. He signifies his dissent. I am glad of it. It proves that he dreads a direct issue on the subject, which is not surprising after the statement made; but I must tell him that it is immaterial whether it was so intended or not. Salt is among the articles comprehended in the act, and, if we may touch one item, we may all. To vote for the repeal of a single item, unless with common consent, as effectually surrenders the compromise as to vote for the repeal of all.

The Senator from New York must excuse me. I feel it my duty to speak plainly where the interest of my constituents and the whole country is so deeply concerned. I must tell him I lack confidence in him. I see in his bill a design, under the show of reduction, to revive the tariff controversy, by which he and his party have so much profited at the expense of the country. It is an artful and bold stroke of party policy, calculated to distract and divide the opposition, and place almost unlimited control over the capital and labor of the country in the hands of those in power. It affords the means of appealing to the hopes and fears of every section and interest, while the distraction and division which must follow would prevent the possibility of united efforts to arrest the abuses and encroachments of power. Experience has taught us to understand the game, and to be on our guard against those who are playing it. We cannot close our eyes to the fact that the party which is now so intent to disturb the compromise is the very party that was the author of the tariff of 1828; and which, after using every effort to render it permanent, was ready to shed our blood rather than surrender the act. Their devotion to a measure, of which they are the authors, and to which they owe their present elevation, prepared us to expect that deep hostility to the act which gave their favorite a mortal blow, and opened the way for a united, and, we trust, ere long, a successful resistance to power, acquired by deception, and retained by delusion and corruption. The entire South may well apply to the Senator, as the author of the tariff of 1828, the reply which a distinguished Senator gave, after its passage, to one who now occupies a higher station than he then did, and who undertook to explain to him his vote on the occasion; "Sir, you have deceived me once; that was your fault; but if you deceive me again, the fault will be mine." Alas, for Virginia! that once proud and patriotic State; she has dismissed her honest and enlightened son, who served her with so much fidelity, and has elevated to the highest office him who betrayed her and trampled her interest in the dust.

I know full well the attempts that will be made to misrepresent my position on this occasion, and to weaken me in the confidence of the public. I fear them not. I know well those whom I represent. They have too clear a conception of their true interest, and place too high an estimate on truth and honor, to withhold their confidence from him who fearlessly follows their dictates. They will scorn the miserable boon proffered by the Senator from New York, and the hand that offers it, and will cling to the act which they so proudly wrung from this Government. Were I to listen to the voice of the Senator from New York, they would hold me blind to their interests, and indifferent to their honor. I shall firmly maintain the position I have taken. I shall not assent to disturb the act of 1833, in the slightest degree, so long as the manufacturing interests shall adhere to its provisions, be the conduct of politicians what it may. Thus far they have firmly adhered. Not a murmur has been heard, or a petition offered, from that quarter, against it, from its passage to the present day; while the memorial of the Legislatures of the two great tariff States—Massachusetts and Pennsylvania—which pledge themselves to abide by the provisions of the act, give strong additional assurance that, if we do not disturb it on our part they will not on theirs.

Mr. BROWN said that, as one of those representing in part one of the Southern States, he felt himself called upon to say that he did not approve the doctrines which had been advanced by the Senators from South Carolina, and considered himself bound, by a proper regard to the interests of his constituents, to vote for the abolition of the duty on salt. This tax on an article of such prime necessity and universal use had always been viewed as odious, even when intended as a financial measure, to relieve an embarrassed Treasury. What, then, he would ask, should be the degree of repugnance felt towards it, when millions were annually flowing into the Treasury beyond its legitimate wants?

Among the most extraordinary spectacles that he had witnessed here, in the various mutations of political parties, none had struck him as more remarkable than that presented by the co-operation of the Senators from South Carolina with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] who had always been distinguished for his zeal in support of high protecting duties, against the reductions proposed by the Committee on Finance. This, indeed, was a strange and extraordinary coincidence! And what more did we see and hear? Both of the Senators from South Carolina denouncing, in the most unqualified terms, those of our Northern friends who advocated these reductions!

The Senate had been told that the State of Virginia, and other Southern States, which had aided in elevating the President elect to the station which he was shortly to fill, had done an act fatal to their interests, and inconsistent with their political principles. As one of the Senators from a Southern State, he could not sit in silence and hear the charges which had been brought against that gentleman, on the subject of the tariff, without expressing the opinion that great injustice had been done him. He (Mr. B.) had no hesitation in making the assertion that, from the period when he had first taken his seat in that body, at the session of 1829-'30, down to the period when South Carolina passed her ordinance of nullification, the only efficient aid given by any party from the North in favor of reduction came from the political friends of Mr. Van Buren. He would ask if it had not been almost a constant topic of abuse and denunciation against him, during the period to which he had referred, that he favored a reduction of the tariff? If any one doubted the accuracy of his recollections of that period, he would refer them to the contemporaneous debates in both branches of Congress, and they would find that portion of the opposition who were in favor of high protecting duties repeatedly assailing him as an adversary of the system, and as meditating its overthrow. Such Mr. B. knew to be the fact. He knew, likewise, upon all test questions which came before either House of Congress, during the period to which he had alluded, that almost the only aid that the Southern States had received, either in discussion or by votes, was given by the political friends of the gentleman whom the Senate had heard so much denounced. And, notwithstanding this was the fact, he was held up here, and charged with having attempted to fix permanently high duties on the country! Mr. B. considered the charge which had likewise been made against the administration in this debate, of having wanted in proper efforts to reduce the tariff, pending the progress of the great controversy which had agitated the country on that subject, to be equally unsustained. Those who were then members of that body could not fail to recollect the anxious exertions made by the leading members of the administration to obtain a reduction of the tariff to some reasonable standard. At the session of 1831-'32, the then Secretary of the Treasury submitted a plan to the House of Representatives, which he was, he believed, called on by a resolution of that body to do, which proposed a very large reduction, and which met with warm opposition from the manufacturing interests. This plan was then considered as having not only the sanction of the administration, but its warm support. How, then, he would ask, could it with justice be said that there was no effort made in good faith by those in power to adjust this question at that time?

The honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had said that the act of 1832, by which the tariff was reduced some five or six millions annually, was considered by those who voted for it as settling the great question of the tariff between the North and the South. He (Mr. B.) was one of those who voted for the act of 1832, and he also remembered the little favor which it met with from some other quarter. He did not consider it as at all settling the question, nor did other gentlemen from the South, who supported it, view it in that light. On the contrary, the debates of that day would show that they had declared their unalterable hostility to the system, while it continued on the statute book. The gentleman from South Carolina was, therefore, certainly mistaken when he had said that the act of 1832 was considered as settling the question of the tariff between the North and the South. He would add that, in his opinion, much of the credit was due to the operation of that law in mitigating the tariff, which was now claimed exclusively for what was generally designated as the compromise act, passed in 1833! By the former act, it was estimated that the revenue would be reduced annually five or six millions; yet it seemed that all the credit is now to be given to the compromise act. He felt towards that act, and for the motives which prompted the honorable gentleman who originated it, that respect to which they were so justly entitled.

The honorable Senator from South Carolina who had first addressed the Senate on this question, [Mr. PIERCE], took occasion, in the course of his remarks, to say it was owing to the virtue and patriotism of the State of South Carolina, in taking the stand she did in relation to the tariff, that the Southern States were now enjoying the advantages of diminished burdens on their productions. Now, it was far from his intention to speak with censure of the movement of that State, which had been alluded to as possessing so much virtue. He was opposed to the force bill, designed to counteract that movement; but he thought it was claiming rather too much to say that the credit was due solely to any one State. He did not believe that her course on that occasion had been attended with such fortunate consequences as those which had been claimed as flowing from it. On the contrary, he must be allowed to express great doubts whether it had not, in a great degree, in the end, contributed to delay the reduction of the duties down to a revenue point.

The payment of the national debt, and the accumulation of a vast amount of surplus in the Treasury, had produced an almost universal conviction throughout the country that the revenue should be brought down to the legitimate wants of the Government. This opinion certainly prevailed at the last session of Congress, so far as he was able to judge. And what, he would inquire, was the reason, and almost the sole reason, for not doing it? Was it not asserted that the compromise act, which resulted from the movement of South Carolina, had imposed an obligation on Congress not to act while it was in force? This, certainly, was the main argument against legislation to reduce the duties. He believed but for that even the most enthusiastic advocates of high protecting duties would not have ventured to advocate the continuance of the law by which the present immense amount of surplus revenue was raised. He would repeat, then, that it might be well questioned whether the movement of South Carolina had not, in some degree, prejudiced Southern interests, from the effect of the compromise act, which had resulted from it, to delay the reduction of the tariff down to a revenue standard.

The Senator had warned those representing Southern States in this body not to vote for a reduction of the duties provided for by the bill then before them, because, in doing so, he thinks they will lose the favorable position at this time occupied by the South under the present system, and invite another attempt to increase the tariff. Mr. B. did not perceive any ground for the indulgence of such apprehensions. The national debt had been some time since paid off, and a large amount of surplus revenue was annually coming into the Treasury. He could not for a moment believe that any administration would ever venture so dangerous an experiment as to propose an increase of duties under such circumstances.

He had always entertained the opinion that the act of 1833 should not be touched for light or trifling causes. As a Senator from a Southern State, he would not have volunteered a proposition to act on this subject; but as it had been brought before them, and as very clear indications, in his opinion, had been given, from a large portion of the people of the North, that some reduction ought to be made, he considered the aspect of the question materially changed. The friends of reduction were not on that floor confined to those representing Southern States; but many gentlemen, from each of the great divisions of the Union, were found concurring in the opinion that it was necessary. When this sentiment had taken such strong hold of the public mind, as well in a large portion of the North as elsewhere, he could not see any impropriety in legislating with a view to lessen the public burdens, at this time so unnecessarily continued. As one of those representing a Southern State, he did not consider that he should discharge his duty if he were, under existing circumstances, to refuse his aid in voting to abolish the duty on salt; an article so essential to every class of citizens, and more especially to those engaged in agricultural pursuits.

If, however, (said Mr. B.,) this view of the subject is irreconcilable with a proper consideration of the compromise act, there was another obligation of still higher authority, and entitled to more sacred observance, than any which could possibly result from a mere legislative enactment, that challenged their respect. He alluded to the constitution of the United States, from which was derived our power to impose taxes, in the shape of duties or otherwise. He contended that Congress had no right to raise money by any species of taxation, except only for the purpose of carrying into effect the powers granted to the General Government by that instrument. They were annually raising a great deal more money than was required for those purposes. Was there not, then, a constitutional obligation resting on them to reduce the duties to the wants of the Government, which was paramount to any and to every other consideration? While, therefore, gentlemen were urging the claims of the compromise act to such sacred regard, he trusted that they would remember that the constitution of the United States deserved infinitely more their regard and respect, in guiding us in our deliberations here.

Mr B. expressed his regret that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had deemed it proper to make what was, in his opinion, such an uncalled for and unwarrantable denunciation against those of their Northern friends who had come forward as the advocates of a reduction of duties on this occasion. If some of these gentlemen had occupied the position in 1828, in relation to the tariff, which had been said and charged against them, the country had the gratification now to see and know that they, at least, had changed for the better, while some of those representing a portion of the South upon this floor, and who were now opposing some of the proposed reductions, had, in that respect, somewhat deteriorated.

The Senator from South Carolina, in his opinion, in opposing a reduction of duties, by so doing contributed to keep up the system, and, in that manner, indirectly supported the tariff principle. It would seem, therefore, that the relative positions of gentlemen had undergone some change in the progress of events.

[Mr. CALHOUN. Am I to understand the Senator to say that I have changed my sentiments in relation to the tariff?]

Mr. B. resumed. What he intended to say, and what he had distinctly said, was, that those who are now charged with having, in 1828, been friends of the tariff, at any rate had now given indications in favor of relaxing the present system of duties, while gentlemen who were hitherto opposed to the system were at present against a reduction of the duties. He could not exactly say what their sentiments were, but only what their course was here. Whether their sentiments had undergone any change, it was not for him to say; but he repeated that, so far as their actions were concerned, it seemed certain to him that the gentlemen were not as hostile to the system as they had been on some former occasions.

Mr. CALHOUN observed, in reply, that the mode in which the Senator from North Carolina reasoned went to hold up Mr. C. to the country as being opposed to the reduction of the tariff. Mr. C. protested against such an interpretation of his course. He was, and always had been, decidedly in favor of a reduction, and he voted against the present motions expressly from his utter aversion to the whole tariff system. He believed that the small reductions now proposed, by unsettling the compromise, would bring back the system in its whole extent; but he had not the slightest faith on earth that the party who had brought forward this bill ever intended to pass it. If they had really been in earnest in desiring that a bill of this character should become a law, why had these disputed items been put into the bill? The great body of the reductions in the bill were without dispute, and might have been passed in ten minutes; why, then, had these others been put in? Was not the design plain and palpable? Who expected that there would be any reduction in the revenue? And because he would not give a vote which, while it would tell on nothing at all, would go to commit his State to break the compromise, was he to be held up as opposed to the reduction of the tariff? The Senator from North Carolina himself could not but see that Mr. C.'s position showed and proved that he was as much opposed to the tariff as he had ever been. He had never retrograded a single inch.

Mr. BROWN said that he was not aware that he had at all misrepresented the Senator from South Carolina. In what he had said he had alluded to certain language in that gentleman's speech, which he thought was rather sharp towards those Southern Senators who had voted for this bill. Mr. B. had been called upon to give his reasons why he was in favor of the abolition of the duty on salt; and, in so doing, he had taken occasion to observe that the Senator from South Carolina had advocated the retention of the existing duties; that he had opposed any infraction of the compromise, and had advocated doctrines which, in Mr. B's opinion, went to perpetuate the tariff system; for he held that a vote against this bill was, to all intents and purposes, a tariff vote. The question put to every Senator was, whether he would reduce the duties or not; and no casuistry, no pitiful subterfuge, would ever induce him to believe that a Senator who voted in the negative did not, in effect, vote to perpetuate the tariff system. The constitution was imperative that Congress should raise no more revenue than the constitution itself gave them power to expend. They were at present raising a surplus revenue—a thing which, most evidently, the constitution never contemplated; and were they not then violating that instrument? Those who voted to perpetuate this system did, he insisted, vote to perpetuate the tariff. Let it offend whom it might, this was the honest truth. He cared not where it might light, the truth should be spoken. He knew that truth might sometimes be blamed, and that gentlemen might resort to harsh repartees, with a view to escape its force; but truth was not so to be escaped from. Mr. B. claimed to have no very exalted opinion of his own character, but he hoped he was free from the contemptible vanity and overweening egotism which was sometimes displayed on that floor. What little intelligence he did possess he should use without consulting any man, or inquiring whether his ideas quadrated or not with the notions of those who seemed to think themselves standards of political infallibility. He was not acquainted with any one who possessed this attribute, nor was this the place where he should seek for one of this description, and least of all should he look for it in that quarter.

Mr. CALHOUN observed, in reply, that the Senator from North Carolina had fully satisfied him of one thing. The Senator continued to assert that Mr. C. was in favor of the tariff, because he was opposed to taking off this duty on salt. All he could say was, that a gentleman who could think or say so, after the two distinct explanations and admonitions which Mr. C. had given, would not hereafter receive any notice from him. Mr. C. regretted that his appeal to the good sense of the Senator had not been met. He had expressly asked him whether he meant to affirm that Mr. C. was not opposed to the tariff. From the reply he had received, he had learned a lesson; and it was, not in future to respond to any remarks which might fall from that Senator.

Mr. BROWN rejoined, and observed that there were some individuals by whom not to be noticed would occasion him some mortification, but there were others by whom he had not the slightest desire to be noticed in any way. Their notice was a thing he had never desired or cared for, and to receive it had not always eventuated as a benefit. He had his standing on that floor not by efforts at high-sounding pretensions to the attributes of a gentleman and a man of honor. He felt himself on equal grounds with the Senator from South Carolina, or any other, and should be ready to vindicate his claims on all occasions. He had said that he was not to be deceived by the miserable subterfuges of such as, while they opposed every reduction of the tariff, claimed the credit of being against the tariff system. This was the head and front of his offending; and he would here take leave to say that, if the notice of the honorable Senator was to be withdrawn on this account, that Senator must pursue his own course; but Mr. B. should not hereafter notice his hallucinations and frantic denunciations of all the friends of the administration who might not happen to agree with him in opinion.

Mr. CALHOUN said he was not in the habit of noticing the Senator from North Carolina at any time. As to the term subterfuge, as applied to himself, he threw it back with indignation.

Mr. RIVES said that he wished to offer one or two remarks, in reply to a particular part of the speech of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.] He referred to the appeal addressed by him to all the representatives of Southern States, in which the Senator had contended that no Southern man could with propriety vote for a reduction of the tariff, in contravention of the compromise act. The Senator had based his argument on this ground—that if they of the South should once set the example of departing from that arrangement, they could afterwards with no plausibility pretend to hold gentlemen on the other side to its observance. The Senator had asked, if those of the South should set such an example, how they could dare to insist for a moment on the observance of the compromise by another portion of the Union? Mr. R. would ask that Senator what evidence he possessed that any other portion of the Union saw the least binding force in the compromise? The Senator himself did not pretend to say that there was the least legal or moral obligation on any one to observe it. Mr. R. had not heard a single observation which looked like recognising any binding obligation in that arrangement. Gentlemen talked to him about observing a bargain on his part, when he had no evidence whatever that the opposite side meant to observe it on theirs. Were Southern gentlemen to be scrupulous on this subject, while they possessed no guarantee whatever that their Northern brethren would not advocate an increase of the tariff the moment they had any chance of success? Mr. R. insisted that the South had no evidence on that subject. He called the attention of all Southern Senators to the very significant address delivered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] at the last session; to the emphatic and unequivocal declaration, when speaking on the subject of the surplus, that the compromise act never could or should be recognised as the prominent policy of the United States. That gentleman had protested in the strongest terms against any obligation to observe it, and had said expressly that it never could be recognised as a proper basis for the commercial policy of the United States. Mr. R. had not forgotten these words; and now, in the present debate, had the Senate heard from the other Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] a solitary argument which amounted to a recognition of the compromise as binding? Had that gentleman, in his able speech, opposed the abolition of the duty on salt as an infraction of that arrangement—as a violation of a bargain? Mr. R. had heard no language of that kind. Neither that gentleman nor his colleague had ever said that they meant to observe the bargain on their part, when their turn should come to make sacrifices for its observance. When that gentleman had opposed the proposition in the bill, he had done it, as he always did, in a manly and open manner; on grounds of strong practical sense, and not as being any violation of an ideal compromise, contained in an ordinary act of legislation. Mr. R. well recollected when the other Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] had appealed to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] who had introduced the compromise bill, and who supported it on this ground—that he was fully convinced that, unless some such expedient should be resorted to in order to arrest the then apparent policy of the administration, the manufacturing interest would soon be compelled to witness worse times; that the Senator from Massachusetts had observed that if the operation of the bill should in practice be found injurious in a high degree to any particular branch of manufacture, he hoped that by general consent so much of the bill would be withdrawn, and that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] did not deny that such was the intention. Mr. R. was confident that it would not be contended any where that there ever had been any distinct recognition of a binding force in the compromise bill. Yet the Senator from South Carolina insisted that every friend to Southern interests was bound to go on and submit to every sacrifice required by that law, in the vain expectation that at a future day the compromise would be respected by those who were interested in the protected branches of industry. Mr. R. cherished no such expectation. He did not believe that one of those interested in the protective system recognised any such bargain. They had acted wisely, with a sagacious regard to the interest of their constituents, cautiously abstaining from saying a single word which might imply that their hands were tied. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WENSTEN] had, on the contrary, with great consideration, with a grave and solemn manner, and with the utmost precision of language, protested, at the last session, as an advocate of the manufacturing interests, against the compromise. Mr. R. had closely watched, during the present debate, to see whether any of the Senators who opposed the reductions suggested by the Committee on Finance would say any thing that looked like recognising a solemn bargain, signed, sealed, and delivered, between the North and the South, which would be violated by a repeal of these duties, and he had not heard such a word uttered by any of them. They opposed the reduction exclusively upon the merits. Was Mr. R. then, as a practical representative of the South, to be told that he must go on, and observe the stipulations of the compromise, on the part of the South, when he saw, from the most unequivocal evidence, both positive and negative, that the North meant to do no such thing? He had had positive evidence of it in the solemn protest of the Senator from Massachusetts, and he had had the most abundant negative evidence in the fact to which he had just alluded, that not a man who opposed the bill had placed his opposition on the ground of the compromise. Under such circumstances, he must be excused if he refused to pursue such a one-sided course of policy; and he hoped that gentlemen who assumed to take the lead on Southern questions, and to speak in the name of the whole South, would not hold up him, and those who thought as he did, as faithless to their engagements, if they refused to follow such a lead.

One of the Senators from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] had said that he saw with the utmost clearness, from the indications around him, that the tariff interest was predominant in that body; that its opponents were the weaker party; and, therefore, that it would not be wise in them to open the question. Mr. R. would ask of that Senator, what were the indications to which he alluded? From the state of the vote, the fact was unquestionable that it was solely owing to the course pursued by that gentleman and his colleague that the tariff interest had the ascendancy on that floor. The question was tried in the attempt to repeal the duty on porcelain and stoneware, and the ayes and noes on that question showed that it had been lost by the votes of those two Senators alone; the vote stood 24 to 20. If those gentlemen had voted otherwise, it would have stood 22 to 22, and the motion to strike out porcelain and stoneware from the bill would have been lost by a tie.

[Mr. PRESTON here explained, and thought there must have been a mistake in recording the vote, as he had not been present when the yeas and nays were called. He expressed a doubt whether articles charged with a duty of 20 per cent. were included within the compromise. He was rather under the impression that they were not included. Whatever the compromise was, he was for preserving it.]

Mr. R. resumed. He had examined the journal, and found the names of both the Senators from South Carolina among the 24 who voted for striking out. But whether the record was correct or not, Mr. R. greatly doubted that the tariff interest was in the ascendant. He had seen it for years losing its influence every moment, and he, for one, was not afraid to leave the tariff question open. He did not want any imaginary sanctuary to protect him while giving his vote on this occasion. He was not going to protect himself by artificial defences of this kind against the people of the United States. He was aware that the people had once been in favor of the protective policy, but he did not believe that they were so at this time. In the meanwhile he felt himself called upon to do his duty to a man who had been greatly misrepresented. He did not believe there was a man, individually, more favorable to the interests of the South, or who would do more to protect those interests, than the person who had been so rudely assailed in this debate. Mr. R. did not believe that he ever had been a friend to the high protective policy. He had watched his course and looked at his actions; and what had been his conduct? It had been often thrown in his teeth that he had voted for the tariff of 1828, under instructions from his Legislature. Mr. R. cared not for all that had been or could be said on that subject. Every body had witnessed the progressive march of public opinion in that gentleman's own State, under his sagacious guidance. Let gentlemen look at his speech, delivered at Albany before the tariff of 1828 was passed; it would show that the whole bent of his mind was against a high tariff; and Mr. R. did not doubt that it had been the suspicions excited by the sentiments in that speech which had drawn forth from the Legislature the instructions under which Mr. Van Buren had afterwards voted. They were not in the dark as to the views and purposes of that individual, whatever might have been said about the degeneracy of poor old Virginia. They had had declarations, under sufficient guarantees, that he was opposed to this policy. He was not a man to run into abstractions, but was, in all his course of action, eminently wise and practical. His abstaining from mere abstract positions rendered his course of action effectual in bringing about good results. What was that individual doing at this time? Were not his personal and political friends acting at this moment in favor of Southern interests? The chairman of the Finance Committee, who had introduced the present bill, was well known to be on terms of intimacy with that gentleman. In fulfilment of the pledges he had given when here in his place, the individual in question was now proceeding in an effort to mitigate the pressure of the tariff system; and yet those who should have received him into their confidence, and hailed his course with thanks and praise, turned round and ungratefully repelled the proffered aid. It was "all talk." It was "mere New York tactics." Nothing was meant by it. Did the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] wish to be understood as so utterly and irreconcilably opposed to that individual, that whenever he was for a measure the Senator from South Carolina was to be against it? And when he was against a measure, and was using his efforts to effect a reform in their legislation, was the gentleman from South Carolina still to oppose him, even when he was giving the South the very thing they asked for? The Senator from New York had thus far acted for him in good faith, and had nobly redeemed his pledges to the South. Mr. R. anticipated with confidence that he would act out the course. He reposed on the pledges of that person, both as to our domestic and other interests; and if any observations had been made by him privately, and not in the hearing of the Senate, (as Mr. R. had heard some anecdotes respecting him,) he claimed that he should be judged by his acts. When that gentleman and his friends said they were against a high tariff, they gave to the country works to justify the assertion. Let others who impugn their sincerity follow the example. When others uttered high-sounding professions, which charmed the ear, let them follow out their words with works; but, as a plain practical man, Mr. R. saw nothing which would entice him to follow them. He should avail himself of every opportunity within his reach to get rid of the burden of which his constituents complained. The tariff question never had been closed; it was still open; and Mr. R. was willing, as a Southern man, to leave the protection of his rights with the American people. He did not believe that the tariff system had an ascendancy in the country, nor would it in the Senate, but for the votes of South Carolina.

Mr. R. believed the measure now proposed to be a wise one. He was not, indeed, the advocate of an indiscriminate warfare against manufactures; he was not going to act in the spirit of a crusader against them. He respected the people of the North, who were so deeply interested in these establishments, as he did his own constituents. But he was not to be deterred from what he considered to be his duty by having a piece of parchment held up before him, by being told that it was a compromise, and that he dare not ask the other party to observe it unless he observed it himself. The other party had expressly told him that they did not acknowledge the bargain; and why should he be held when they were not? At the same time, he was disposed to treat all the great interests of the country with caution and reverence, and, in legislating with regard to them, to tread as upon holy ground; not because he was in terror of a compromise, but because he held it wise not rashly to disturb existing interests. As an American patriot, he viewed with pride and exultation the wealth and prosperity of his brethren. He would not take an iota from it, if it could possibly be avoided. He was one, however, who believed that, notwithstanding the land bill, (should it become a law,) there would still be a surplus in the Treasury; and from stern necessity alone he was willing to reduce the revenue, though in so doing he could not wholly avoid affecting the interests of some of his fellow-citizens; and as he saw no means of lessening the national income so good and expedient as the prudent and catholic measures proposed by this bill, it should receive his support.

Mr. R., in conclusion, observed that he had said much more than he intended to say when he rose. The particular position he held there in reference to his own State rendered it his duty to be thus explicit, and he hoped would be received as his apology for so long detaining the Senate. As a representative of Virginia, he was willing to make a sacrifice of this salt tax in the name of his State. His constituents were largely interested in the manufacture of salt. He was aware that those of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, who were also largely engaged in this manufacture, were in a different situation from most others. The salt manufacture in New York, Virginia, and Ohio, was sufficiently protected by nature. If, by any act of legislation on this subject, an injury was to be inflicted on any portion of the people of Massachusetts, Mr. R. should sincerely regret it. But let those concerned reflect that theirs was but a minor interest, when compared with the whole amount of capital embarked in this manufacture: while that whole amount was not less than eight or ten millions, the capital of Massachusetts was only two millions. Mr. R. could not see, for one, that the continuance of this duty was so very important to their prosperity. The honorable Senator who so ably represented them had assured the Senate that, should the duty be repealed, his constituents would come here with no whining petitions and complaints. Mr. R. believed every word which had been said on that subject. He well knew the character of those people, and was assured that, under all circumstances, they would rather seek the up-building of their fortune from their own brawny arms and bold, untiring industry, than from the factitious aid of a precarious legislation. There was no duty which affected the community so widely, so universally, as a duty on salt; and while, in the process of reducing the revenue, the Senate were exploring the whole field of taxation, would they pitch upon a duty so intimately connected with the necessities of life? He conceived not.

Mr. WRIGHT said that he did not rise to prolong this debate, certainly not to follow the example of the two Senators from South Carolina, by leading off the debate into the discussion of incidental subjects of a personal and wholly irrelevant character. His state of health, too, admonished him not to speak more than was absolutely necessary; yet he was compelled, by the necessity of the case, to say a very few words in reply to the remarks of one of the Senators from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.]

In the first place, the Senate had heard the allegation of that Senator's strong suspicion that those who were in favor of this bill were not acting sincerely; and the remark seemed particularly aimed at the committee who had reported the bill. Mr. W. was sorry they stood so low in the Senator's opinion. But there was nothing to be done in the case. The Senator had a right not only to form his own opinion, but to promulgate it with a view to enlighten the Senate. Mr. W. had to deal only with facts; and what were the facts of this case? How came the committee with the subject? On the motion of that honorable Senator. And under what circumstances? With the utterance of a declaration about as charitable as some others in which he was in the habit of indulging—that the committee would make a mere demonstration, but would in fact do nothing. The Senator, however, was resolved that the committee should show what their intentions really were. The matter thus far was prophetic. He would now come to history. The Senator had done him the justice repeatedly to acknowledge that his personal exertions had not been wanting. The progress of the committee had been frankly communicated to that gentleman, so that they could not at least be accused of secrecy and disguise. Whether any unnecessary delay had occurred in reporting the bill was a matter for the judgment of the public.

For the truth of any allegations on this subject, he must refer to his humble credit here while he affirmed that the committee made what expedition they could. The bill was at length reported to the House as soon as it was prepared. But then the Senator asks, why was it not earlier taken up? Mr. W. said he knew it was unnecessary for him to answer that question before this Senate. What had been the declaration which he himself had made, on bringing this bill into the House? Did he not then remark that the land bill must be the chief reliance of the country for any very important reduction of the revenue, and that all that could be effected in respect to duties must bear a comparatively small proportion? And what bill had been before the Senate when the bill in question had been reported? Was it not the land bill? And to whom was it to be charged that the discussion of the land bill occupied the Senate for weeks? To the Committee on Finance? To any member of that committee? Let the Senate answer. And what had followed the land bill? Another bill of a public nature, and of a highly important character. On Thursday the Finance Committee had directed Mr. W. to ask for the printing of the tariff bill, and it was ordered by the Senate; but as the printing was not completed in time for it to be brought in on Friday, he had then given notice that he should call up the bill on the Monday following. In compliance with this promise, he had accordingly moved on Monday that the bill be taken up, but a large majority of the Senate refused to do so. Mr. W. called it up the day following; and he would now ask, had the committee since then been chargeable with delaying its progress? Whence had come the leading prominent opposition to the bill? From a source, he must in candor say, he had not anticipated. Those who made the opposition to it had of course perfect control as to the manner in which the opposition was to be conducted; but he had deemed it proper to make this answer to what he must consider a somewhat ungenerous imputation. The Senator from South Carolina had thought proper to present the Senate with a full-length portrait of his humble self. What effect this might have in furthering or preventing the repeal of the salt duty, it was not for him to say. It was a matter he had nothing to do with. The fact that he had been a member of the Committee on Manufactures in 1828, and that he had supported the tariff bill passed in that year, was, he believed, not new. But to a single cautious remark thrown out by the gentleman, he should take the liberty to reply. The honorable Senator intimated that somebody had been deceived on that occasion; and, by coupling himself and his friend, when speaking of that deception, he seemed to leave the inference that Mr. W. had been a party to it. Mr. W. had been well aware of the course the bill was likely to take in the House of Representatives. Whether the other gentleman alluded to was so or not, he did not know; but this he knew: that the shape given to the bill was that preferred by every member from the South. There had been a conflict as to principle between reporting a bill which should protect manufactures alone, and a bill which should extend the protection to the material which constituted the subject-matter of which the manufactured articles were composed, so as to extend the benefit to the agricultural interest also. An exceedingly amiable and worthy gentleman, since dead, [Mr. W. was understood as referring to the late Hon. Warren R. Davis, of South Carolina,] had been a member with himself of the committee who reported the bill, and that gentleman's name and his own would be found recorded together in the votes upon it. The gentleman alluded to had been utterly opposed to a tariff bill of any kind; but if any was to be reported, he had his choice between the alternatives, and preferred the insertion of protecting duties on the raw material. Mr. W. knew that that gentleman and all his associates were sanguine in the belief that if the bill should be thus framed, the New England members would vote against it, and it would consequently be lost. Mr. W. did all he could to undeceive them, but he could not succeed. The Eastern members did, in the course of debate, make use of expressions severe and harsh, almost beyond the limits of parliamentary rule; and this strengthened the Southern members in the belief that the bill could not pass. But he had told them repeatedly that the very men who thus denounced the bill would, on the final question, vote in its favor; and the event justified his prediction.

[Mr. DAVIS here interposed, and asked whether the Senator meant to say that he had voted for the bill.]

Mr. W. replied, that in his former remarks he had had no reference to that gentleman. There were insinuations here made which seemed to intimate a suspicion that some deception was intended by the authors of the present bill; but he thought, if the gentleman who had thrown them out would give the matter a little more reflection, he must himself become satisfied that the insinuation was unfounded. If not, however, it was but of little moment. As to what had transpired here, whether in public proceedings or private conversations, he had nothing to do with it. It was years since the transactions took place, and many of the agents concerned in them had since passed off the stage of life; for himself, he was satisfied with the judgment which the country had pronounced upon his own course. He impugned that of no other gentleman.

There was another point on which he must be indulged in a word or two. The Senator had represented him as having stated that this article of salt had been introduced into the bill as a test question, whether the compromise was or was not to be adhered to. The Senator, it was true, had afterwards become satisfied of his mistake, and had corrected himself. What was it that Mr. W. had said in relation to the compromise? He had stated that it had been the purpose of the committee, in framing the present bill, to seek as well among articles the duty on which was above 20 per cent., as among those under 20 per cent., for such as might be made free of duty, without disturbing any very important interest of the country. He had expressly said that he felt under no restraint whatever in going above 20 per cent. or below it, to find articles of this description, and had stated his opinion, that what was called the compromise act had the force of an ordinary law of Congress, and no more. He had made the same declaration at the time the compromise bill passed; and he believed the Senator from South Carolina had done the same. It was now his duty to show that there had been no magic about the introduction of this article of salt into the bill. He had run his eye cursorily over a table containing the long list of protected articles, and had found that the duty on those charged with 20 per cent. amounted to $1,325,000. Congress, by unanimous consent, had reduced the duty on wine one half since the compromise; yet wine before the reduction paid more than 20 per cent. Since then it paid less. The committee proposed a similar reduction in the duty on foreign spirit. That was now over twenty per cent. But if nothing must be touched but what was under twenty per cent., then there must be deducted from the bill $429,000 on this item. There had been already deducted $52,000 on worsted yarn, and $339,000 on earthenware; and now salt must go, and various other items would have to follow suit.

Mr. W. had not risen to argue the principle; on that every gentleman must satisfy his own mind. All he meant to say was, that if the Senate was to be guided by the rule which had been laid down, all hope of any reduction in the revenue was gone, and either there must be a surplus, and a consequent distribution till the year 1842, or the sale of the public lands must be stopped entirely.

He must be indulged in one more suggestion. The Senator from South Carolina had said that but for the compromise, the bill of 1832 would have produced an immense surplus. Mr. W. would ask the Senator whether, if the public lands had been retained, (as was then expected,) there would have been a surplus? None whatever. But Mr. W. had voted for the compromise. True. He hoped for that one vote, at least, the Senator would not blame him. That he had many faults he felt most deeply; but he should not now so far comply with some examples as to enter into a discussion of his own public or private conduct. He had voted for the compromise act for the sake of quieting the country. He had not then believed that there would be any troublesome amount of surplus in the Treasury, nor did he now believe that there would have been, but for the immense sales of the public lands, which was an event not anticipated by any body. He would now observe, in conclusion, that, as a member of the Finance Committee, he had presented to the Senate the best bill he could. He had, indeed, been fully aware that it must disturb some domestic interests; but he defied the gentlemen who so loudly complained, to frame any bill which would not do so. There were some articles below 20 per cent. which the committee did not insert, because they believed it inexpedient to touch them, while there were others above 20 per cent. which they did insert, for the sake of the object to be accomplished, viz: some reduction in the revenue.

Mr. STRANGE observed that the very deep reverence he entertained for this body always rendered it exceedingly painful to him to address it; and this reason alone had often restrained him from rising in his place, and disclaiming sentiments and opinions uttered by the Senator from South Carolina, in the name of the whole South, in which he differed with him loco loco. But on the present occasion he was compelled, both by duty and inclination, earnestly to protest against the practice into which that Senator had fallen—of assuming to speak for the whole South; in which general term the State he had the honor to represent was, of course, included. He was unwilling to see North Carolina tacked as a tail to any kite, or brought to act under any dictation. He was perfectly contented that South Carolina should be represented by the Senators she had herself chosen. They were signally able to represent her, and doubtless they fairly expressed her views upon this and all other subjects; but they had no right to speak in the name of the whole South; and, so far as North Carolina was concerned, he claimed for himself and his colleague the sole right of speaking for her upon that floor, as long as she herself thought proper to intrust them with that honor. He was not for making invidious comparisons, but he hazarded nothing in saying that, in all of which man has reason to be proud, North Carolina was behind no State in the Union. She would act in all matters according to her own sense of right, and would, on no occasion, be either led or bullied. Among the characteristics of her people were prudence and good sense; but it had been his lot to witness on this floor language of much rashness and indiscretion, as he conceived, uttered in the name of the South. He would instance particularly some remarks of the Senator, uttered the other day, upon the subject of abolition, which he disapproved at the time, but refrained from objecting to, for the reason before stated. He did not believe it either politic or proper, on every occasion of difference between us and our Northern brethren, to be throwing down the gauntlet of defiance, as had been done then. We assemble here from different portions of the Union, to confer together for the good of the whole. Far be it from him to advance the dangerous doctrine of the consolidationist, that each member of this body is the representative of the whole Union. No, no: each one is the peculiar representative of those who elect him; but in his representative capacity is governed, or rather should be, by the same laws of propriety, mutual concession, and common honesty, which govern individuals in their intercourse with each other. He was not so credulous as to believe that any mind can be altogether freed from the shackles of interest; but, with the high intellectual powers which in general characterize the members of the National Legislature, we may reasonably expect that sound and liberal views of public policy will control their deliberations. Instead, then, of arousing their passions by threatening denunciations, our appeals should be addressed to their reason, and to that sense of common interest which recognises the real good of the whole in the welfare of each and every part. These appeals would seldom be disregarded, while threats and defiance, if productive of no other evil, must tend to weaken the bonds of our Union.

But to come to the matter more immediately under consideration: the Senator from South Carolina had made most extraordinary appeals to those representing Southern States; and assumed over them a sort of dictatorial power to which he, for one, was not disposed to submit. In one particular he and the Senator from South Carolina agreed; and that was, in holding a tariff for protection to be unconstitutional. For the maintenance of this position, it was, if he rightly understood the matter, that South Carolina had placed herself in hostile attitude to the rest of the Union, and had nearly involved the country in the horrors of civil war. On one of the very few occasions on which he had heretofore addressed the Senate, he had remarked upon the great diversity of operation of human minds; by what various processes they arrive at the same conclusions, or wander into different results from the same premises; and of this the Senator from South Carolina and himself now presented an example. They agreed in the existence of an evil, but differed widely, very widely, as to the remedy. They were both opposed to a tariff for protection; but the Senator from South Carolina believed that the vote on the part of the Southern Senators to repeal the duty on salt would rivet the tariff upon them; while he, on his part, believed the object of removing the tariff most attainable by direct blows at each feature of the odious system.

He did not understand the Senator from South Carolina as objecting to present action upon any other ground than that of an act of Congress, which has been called in debate the compromise act; but, in relation to this, he solemnly warns the Southern Senators not to forfeit the vast advantages held under it by the South, for any benefit they may hope to derive from an immediate reduction of the tariff. But at the very moment the Senator speaks of a compact from which the South is deriving advantages, he disclaims being himself bound by it. If he is not bound by it, who is? By adhering to the terms of the act of 1833, he urges we will secure certain benefits to the South, while by disturbing it the manufacturing interests will be released from the pledges under which it places them. What pledges? If any pledge exists on their part, where is the evidence of it? Do any of the Northern gentlemen acknowledge themselves under any pledge? I have heard none; but I have listened with surprise to the Senator from South Carolina, insisting upon a compact binding on them, while on his own part he disavows any obligation. How can there be a compromise without parties? or how shall an obligation be effectual on one side, and have no corresponding force on the other? The concession of the Senator seems to me utterly to destroy the character of the act of 1833, as a compact or compromise. It does not upon its face profess to have any such character, but stands upon the statute book like any other act of Congress, subject to modification or repeal at the pleasure of the law-making power. If, from any circumstance not appearing upon its face, it is entitled to more sacred regard than other laws passed at the same or any other session of Congress, let the circumstance be pointed out, let us have the proof of its existence. He could easily perceive, from the delicate position in which South Carolina stood immediately preceding the passage of this act, it might be viewed by her with peculiar interest, and demand from her the most profound respect, and exercise over her actions a sort of magic control; but no reason had yet been shown why to any other State of the Union it should be held as any thing more than an ordinary act of Congress. Its binding efficacy as a compact or compromise was disavowed on one side of the House, and not avowed on the other. But, independent of any obligation to respect this act, the Senator from South Carolina seems to think that, in 1842, we of the South will stand in a much better situation by leaving the act of 1833 unaltered, than we shall do by any present modifications we can possibly make. This position is plausible enough, admitting the act of 1833 is in truth a compromise; but in denying that one party is bound by it, while he insists that the other is not, the Senator abandons every legal idea of a compromise; and that being done, he was altogether at a loss to perceive any other ground of advantage to be claimed from it.

But the Senator warns us against an insidious attempt to induce the unwary Southern Senators to abandon the strong ground they now occupy, by holding out to them fallacious hopes of an alteration of the tariff, advantageous to the South, with a view to open the whole subject, and ultimately to fix upon us a tariff more burdensome than that of 1828. He has given us a recital, in which he seeks to fix upon those who bring forward this measure flagrant falsehood and perfidy on a former occasion, and from thence very rationally argues that they are not to be trusted now. But we must be permitted to doubt the correctness of the representation he had made. He did not mean to say that the Senator had not represented things as they impressed themselves upon his mind; but we all know, when the passions and feelings are excited, we see each other and each other's conduct in false lights, and draw conclusions the most erroneous and unjust. The Senator was much excited at the period of which he speaks, and his fervid imagination led him to believe that a deception had been practised upon him, because matters had not resulted according to his wishes and expectations. The Senator's impressions, it seemed to him, were met by the most conclusive proof to the contrary. Among the parties to the fraud of which he speaks, the Senator has placed one now standing very high in the public confidence; one who, among those who are least disposed to do him justice, has had full credit for a remarkably keen sense of his own interests. To the honor of our country, it may be said that honesty, or at least the appearance of it, is essential to a man's long holding a place in public favor. Allowing, then, the distinguished individual alluded to as destitute of moral principle as his worst enemies affect to believe him, would he have been so short-sighted, so recklessly indifferent to his own interest, as to enmesh himself in promises there was no necessity for making, for the mere purpose of breaking them in a few hours, in the face of the whole world? Can greater fatuity than such a course would indicate be imagined; and can it for a moment be supposed of one whom his enemies have entitled the magician?

But let us suppose all this possible; would not the fact have been long since brought home to the personal knowledge of every individual in this wide-spread community? Those with whom the knowledge of the fact exists, if it exists at all, have not been wanting in motives to give it publicity and authenticity, if the thing were possible. Mr. S. said he was glad he had not yet been long enough in political life to have lost his own honesty, or his confidence in that of others. He was the representative of a people with whom nothing but truth and plain dealing could ever be practised or held in estimation; and he would far rather be the "deceived" than the "deceiver." The time might come when longer experience would convince him that in this body, as well as elsewhere, men are not always what they seem; but, for the present, he had just grounds for confiding in the sincerity of those who brought forward this measure. He believed it to be their honest purpose to carry it out in all its apparent fairness. He saw no compromise standing in the way of a vote to suppress the duty on salt. He perceived no advantages to be gained in futuro by declining to do so; he was satisfied that the present interests of those whom he represented would be promoted by its suppression; and he was certain they would not receive, as an apology from him, that the Senator from South Carolina had assured him their interests would be more certainly promoted by postponing a present and certain good, to one uncertain in itself in the distant future.

Mr. CALHOUN said he had heard so much of promise, and had seen so little of performance, since he came into public life, that the Senator from New York must really excuse him for not giving that implicit faith to all he heard, which he might, at an earlier period of life, have been disposed to yield. If any one looked at the indisposition of men in power to yield any portion of the power they held, he would readily become convinced that it was a most difficult task to get rid of existing duties. This was not the first time he had been led to make this remark. At the very outset of this session he had said that there would be no reduction of the revenue, and no deposit bill; nor had he uttered this prophecy from any peculiar trait of suspicion which belonged to his character, but from the teachings of experience. Why was the Senate not agreed on this measure? Here was a dominant majority held as closely bound by party ties as he had ever seen a set of men in his life; and yet they could not get along in a bill to reduce the revenue, without the votes of his colleague and himself. It was manifest that the reigning party were divided on the tariff, and equally obvious that that difference did not divide them politically. The tariff was one of those open questions on which men of both sides were left at liberty to vote as they pleased. The party would never get Northern Senators to vote for repealing the protective duties. Mr. C. did, therefore, want faith in the sincerity of the present effort. The Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] had disclaimed all unnecessary delay in reference to the present bill; but did not all know that it was not until two weeks after the land bill that this bill had been brought forward? What hindered its earlier consideration? Gentlemen had suffered the new fortification bill to be taken up, and then a bill to enlarge the army, and then an armory bill; all these consumed time; and, under such circumstances, he must doubt the zeal of gentlemen in pushing, as they might have done. And why was it discussed now, when there was not the remotest chance of its becoming a law? It might produce political agitation, but no reduction of the revenue. If gentlemen had been sincere and earnest in their anxiety to accomplish that object, why were not the items in this bill divided into two distinct classes, and reported in two different bills? In regard to many of them there was no dispute; and if these had been classed together, the bill containing them would have been passed at once by common consent. From the mixing up of these with other items which were sure to produce great controversy, Mr. C. was justified in believing, and time would show the correctness of the opinion, that they would have much talk and no action. Mr. C. was not opposed to those who in good faith desired to reduce the revenue. Those who professed to have this desire had the majority. Let that majority be brought together, and let the declaration be made in a certain quarter that all who oppose the measure would be considered as out of the true faith, and then Mr. C. would believe gentlemen to be in earnest; otherwise he could not. But the Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] had declared that, if there was any secret understanding in regard to the tariff of 1828, he knew nothing of it.

I was (said Mr. C.) consulted at the time, to know how the South would go, and whether the South would sustain the bill as it came from the Middle States? We did so sustain it, but refused to agree to such amendments as would suit the members from the Eastern States. The internal history of the bill shows what was our calculation. Can any man believe that Southern men would ever have voted for such a bill as the tariff of 1828, unless they believed that by so voting they would insure its ultimate defeat? Do not all the world know that we of the Southern States were for free trade, and looked upon all these protecting duties as neither more nor less than sheer oppression? We surely had an ordinary measure of common sense; and would we vote to resist all amendments to such a bill as was ultimately passed, unless we felt ourselves assured of a contingent advantage? And what was that advantage? We saw that the system might be pushed too far to suit New England; that it might be made to affect injuriously the interests of navigation and commerce; and that in that case they would go against the bill. Surely we must have had some assurance that in the final vote New England would join us. We took our hazard on this issue. We resisted all amendments, and kept the bill in such a shape that we were assured they never could vote for it. Our great inducement was a hope of being able to prostrate the administration, and aiding New England in the defeat of the bill; but the very men who had the most warmly denounced the bill suddenly wheeled round, and, on the final question, took ground against us. If, after all this, I am a little suspicious that gentlemen may be acting here a political part, with the intention of again bringing the whole industry of the country under the action of Congress, and thus gain for their party an unlimited control of its affairs, is it to be wondered at? Is it marvellous that I, who have seen and mingled with and been an actor in such a scene as passed here in 1828, should suspect the entire sincerity of the same gentlemen in 1837?

But the honorable Senator says that salt is not the only article selected by the Finance Committee as an object of reduction; but that others, on which the existing duty is over 20 per cent., have also been inserted in this bill. It is very true. But as the act of 1833 was an adjustment of the tariff, by way of compromise between the manufacturing and agricultural interests of the country, some duties included in it may be reduced by common consent of both parties. Thus, the duties on wines and vinous spirits may be lowered, without interfering with the tariff system, because they are in a manner open articles; but this cannot be said of this duty on salt. This is a test question, and the only article in the bill which presents a fair test, whether the compromise is to be respected or not. On that view of the subject I take my ground. The difference between reducing this salt duty all at once, and reducing it gradually, presents no temptation to me. I neither can nor will be caught in such a trap. In 1840 and 1841 the duties go off rapidly. I shall then claim the benefit of our side of the arrangement; and shall I not be stronger then if I concede now? I put it to all Southern men, whether, even allowing that the compromise has no absolutely binding force, it will not be our wisest policy to hold to it? Whether we shall not thereby render ourselves stronger in 1841 and 1842? Most certainly we shall. When Senators on the other side sit silent while we thus explain our understanding of the agreement, I hold it to be an acquiescence in our view; for surely it is a most unmanly course if they mean otherwise.

We are told that the President elect is most wonderfully attached to the Southern States and the advancement of Southern interests; and the evidence is the speech he delivered in New York previous to the vote he gave to fix the tariff upon us in 1828; and the vote is not permitted to explain the speech. He voted for the duty on wool and woollens, and for the whole bill of 1828—one of the most oppressive measures to the South that ever was devised; and yet gentlemen have faith in his deep attachment to Southern interests. I am much disposed to look back. Perhaps it is constitutional in my mind; but I feel a strong proneness to retrospection. I well remember the constitution of the first cabinet of General Jackson. There was Mr. Berrien, a stout anti-tariff man, and stoutly opposed to the tariff of 1828, (which was passed by the vote of Mr. Van Buren.) Then there was Mr. Branch, decidedly opposed to it. Mr. Ingham, who acted a manly, open part in that business. All these were General Jackson's warm friends. With them were Mr. Dickerson, of New Jersey, a most thorough tariff man, and Mr. Woodbury, of New Hampshire, who (to do him justice) acted not badly in 1828. At bottom, he was opposed to the bill. He acted a very different part from Mr. Van Buren. Mr. Van Buren, if we may judge by his vote, was most thoroughly tariff. Yet it seems extraordinary to the Senator from New York that, with that thoroughly tariff man for President, I should be unwilling to have the compromise disturbed! Let us have some proof that Mr. Van Buren is as hostile to the tariff as the Senator from North Carolina says he is. Until I have proof on that point, I, for one, can never consent to have the tariff question opened, because I am very sure, the moment it is, we in the minority are sure of being sacrificed. Whatever surplus may be left in the Treasury, it is infinitely safer to return it to the States, until a gradual reduction of the revenue shall have dried up the sources from which it is derived. I have determined, under present circumstances, not to call up the deposit bill. I am well persuaded, if the Government shall go on in future as extravagantly as it has lately done; there will soon be complaint heard about a surplus in the Treasury. I have no faith in the present state of the country. It is unsound. There is a plethoric, bloated state of apparent prosperity; but the slightest reverse will throw our whole money concerns into irretrievable confusion. The currency, both of Great Britain and America, was never before in so critical a condition.

Mr. C. concluded by reiterating the declaration that he had taken his stand upon the advantages to be derived to the South from an adherence to the compromise.

Mr. PRESTON next addressed the Senate. He commenced with a series of remarks intended to justify the course pursued by himself and his colleague [Mr. CLAY] in resisting the reduction of the duties proposed in the present bill. He thought that it would be hard for the friends of the administration who advocated the bill to show that they (himself and colleague) were tariff men, and Mr. Van Buren anti-tariff. As to the act of 1833, President Jackson had, in his message, expressly recognised it as a compromise, and recommended its observance. Little did he expect to be so soon contradicted on the floor of the Senate by such devoted friends. But he was now the setting sun—another luminary was rising in the political sky, and all eyes were now directed to the flaming east. It would do now to say that the act was no compromise, and that all arguments based on that supposition were futile. Yet the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] had pledged himself at the time, and still recognised the obligation, sacredly to observe it. The South had at least that guarantee; and, for himself, he preferred relying on that ground to trusting the guarantee of the chairman of the Committee on Finance. The Senator from Virginia, it seemed, considered Mr. Van Buren as pledged to the South; and this on some other ground of assurance besides his famous speech in New York, and his vote in direct contradiction of it. It gave Mr. P. unfeigned pleasure to hear such assurances, and he trusted in God that they would be carried out. He could tell that gentleman that in such a course he would not be opposed by South Carolina. They had had the prophecy, now let actions make it good. The honorable

[SENATE.]

Senator from Virginia was the priest upon the tripod just now; but how did the Senate, or how could the South, know but another priest might shortly mount another tripod, and deliver a different response? The Senator from Virginia spoke for the South; the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN,] who was now unfortunately absent, might perchance feel in his turn the influence of the god, and utter a vaticination calculated for a different meridian. Mr. P. said that he received with great respect whatever fell from the gentleman from Virginia; but, in this case, he must be pardoned for feeling some little distrust. It might be so, as the Senator supposed; but, for one, he should be glad to hear the Senator from Pennsylvania rise in his place, and make a declaration in consonance with that which had just been uttered by the Senator from Virginia. But the gentleman (said Mr. P.) qualified his position by a certain set of words, carefully selected and cautiously weighed. The new President, it seems, is practically opposed to an extravagant tariff—ay, practically. He is for none of your vague abstractions—oh, no. His is a practical operation; and we are told this by honorable gentlemen who hunted down a late administration because they were the friends of a “judicious tariff.” And now, sir, can the gentleman tell us what is a practical tariff? What the dominant party mean by no abstractions, I understand to be no constitutional objections; for the constitution is a mere abstraction—a mere bit of parchment. But we of the weaker interest have nothing to appeal to but papers and parchments; we have nothing to rely upon but these abstractions. I should have been glad to have heard from the honorable Senator what is to be the exact nature and extent of the practical opposition which we of the South may expect from the powers that are to be. The present President came into power as the friend of a practical judicious tariff; and what did that turn out to be? The tariff of 1828, followed by the tariff of 1832—a tariff which we of the South felt ourselves compelled to resist. But the honorable Senator informs us that we have reason to think the feeling in the country in favor of high protecting duties has been greatly weakened. But where is the proof of this? We all remember the history of this feeling heretofore. We all know that the tariff system went on by constantly increasing majorities; and the larger the tariff proposed, the more votes were brought up in its favor. And what is the state of the interests still concerned in the same system? What one State has changed its policy or its principles on this subject? Do we not see, to this very hour, that the moment those interests are touched their representatives act in disregard to all party ties? Will gentlemen, in a moment of triumph, because, with the aid of myself and my colleague, they find themselves able to break down the tariff of 1828 and 1832, sing the flattering song in our ears that the tariff feeling is dead, and the tariff interest changed? If so, why have they not struck at the whole system? Gentlemen talk about the fruit of taxes going into the pockets of the rich, while they are gathered from the labor of the poor; but what, I pray you, has been the movement of their whole party? Has it not been to make all those articles which are intended for the consumption of the rich free of duty, and only strike at salt and spirits? Why did they select China? Does not that belong almost exclusively to the rich? Look at the whole list proposed in the present bill, and how many of them are articles for the relief of the poor man? Yet we are taunted and twitted for favoring the rich against the poor, while they themselves are taking off the duty from the conveniences or luxuries of the rich alone. Why? With a view to favor the rich? I do not say that. But out of a half-way respect for the compromise of 1833. The Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] does not consider that act as a bargain, nor does he think either the North or the South pledged to its observance. Now, I do know that it was regarded as a bargain. I gave my pledge in behalf of those whom I represent. They consider themselves as bound in good faith; and if a compliance with it will take the last cent of my constituents out of their pockets, it shall be complied with, so far as depends on me, because I respect their honor above their property. I, for one, do not hold myself at liberty to disregard that act because it is only a bit of parchment. I am not at liberty to tear bits of parchment the moment they stand in the way of my pecuniary interest. But I will not argue the question. As to the surplus in the Treasury, I do not feel myself called upon to speak, at this time, about its disposition. The administration of General Jackson declared to the nation that there would be no surplus. I am glad now to hear that there will be one. I am happy in beholding the rising auspices of my country; and if the majority in power consider themselves free from any obligations to respect the act of 1833, and are sincere in their purpose to effect a reduction in the revenue, I hold myself ready to push with them at the tariff; but I fear that, instead of a dominant and triumphant majority, those who make that attempt in earnest will speedily find themselves in a lean and powerless minority.

Mr. WRIGHT stated that the rate of duty on common salt was a fraction over 82 per cent., (taking the year 1835 as the standard.) If the expression of sentiment was to prevail which had been given here in regard to articles over and under 20 per cent., it was of course useless to occupy any more time in the discussion of the present motion. He must, however, detain the Senate for a short time, in order to explain the motives of his own action in inserting this article of common salt in the bill, with a view to abolishing the tax now imposed upon it. He would first, however, offer one word in regard to the views which had been given of the compromise act, and of its limits. If he was right, the views which gentlemen had expressed on that subject were certainly wrong. It seemed to be assumed, by gentlemen of all political interests, that all duties at 20 per cent. were inviolable; because the compromise bill referred to all duties over 20 per cent., and Congress had acted on all under 20 per cent.; so that this particular point, while the duty was exactly 20 per cent., formed an exception from all human action for a certain term of years. It might be so; but he owed it to himself, as a member of that Congress which had passed the bill, that he had made up a record for himself, and he considered the compromise act as standing precisely on the same basis as any other law; and no matter what were the terms employed in it, he was just as much at liberty to act on that particular law as on any other passed by the Legislature. He would now explain what were the views he entertained in regard to that bill. All duties not affected by the action of the bill were equally subject to reservation; all over 20 per cent. were in a course of reduction, while those at and under 20 per cent. were not. He found, to-day, that in the views of gentlemen those articles alone might be rendered free of duty which were below 20 per cent. He would ask of all Senators who had been here when the compromise bill was passed, and still held a seat upon that floor, why the duties at 20 per cent. were to be held inviolable, while all above and below that point were subject to the action of Congress? He had thought that every duty left stationary by the compromise act itself was entirely open, if gentlemen chose to resort to that bill as an authority for legislation. But, for himself, he did not admit that it possessed any binding force beyond any other law.

Then, as to the important article of common salt; he stood, with his respected colleague, [Mr. TALLMANGE,] in a situation the most interested of any gentleman on the floor, so far as his constituents were concerned. There was no State in the Union which made as much salt, or any thing like as much, as New York. While he thanked the Senator from Missouri for the favorable opinion he had expressed with regard to his course on this subject, he must be permitted to say that he did not know whether he truly represented the wishes of his State when he urged that this article should be duty free. He believed he did; but he was not quite confident that such was the case. His conviction was, that the measure would be sustained; and why? He would tell gentlemen. It would, on examination, be found that what had been stated by the Senator from Missouri was perfectly correct; namely, that in the year 1835 the value of imported salt had been something over $600,000, while the duties paid upon it amounted to $537,000. What was the amount of the interest which New York desired to be protected? The factories in that State now manufactured two millions of bushels per annum—perhaps he erred, but he believed that it was at least that. The revenue imposed by the State, at 6 cents per bushel, had amounted the last year to over $100,000. This was a very important revenue to the State. A hundred thousand dollars a year derived from an excise! Was it then prudent, patriotic, or proper, in him, to contend that the country ought to pay a tax of $530,000 to protect his State in the reception of a revenue of $100,000? In reply to this question, he was compelled to say no. As to the interest of the manufacturers themselves, he presumed they would be willing to compromise, and let the protecting duty go, if the State will release them from its excise. The argument, therefore, came back to the principle, whether, while the money was not wanted, he should stand there in his place, and tax the nation half a million of dollars, in order that his own State might get a hundred thousand. He could not consider such to be his duty.

What, then, was the state of the manufacture? It was now as perfect as it ever could be; and here let him say, on his own knowledge, that it had been on nearly as large a scale as at present, with a price of only ten cents a bushel. It had been sold for even less than that. He spoke of that part of the price which went to the manufacturer, after deducting the State tax. The tax had been twelve and a half cents; it was now reduced to six and a quarter. On the same principle which had made him unwilling to vote for retaining a revenue of $340,000 for the sake of protecting a branch of manufacture in which $150,000 capital had been embarked, he was unable to vote to retain this duty on salt. With the exception of the State of New York, but few factories would be affected, to any extent, by making it a free article. There were a few on the Atlantic border which would be somewhat affected by it. He knew that there were factories, also, near the river St. Lawrence; but, for their protection, he was willing to rest on the difficulties and cost of bringing in the foreign article. He could not, also, forget that about one half of those he represented derived their supply of salt, not from the State factories, but from foreign importation; that they paid the same tax as the rest of the Union, and would be proportionally relieved by its removal. Thus situated, he had a very difficult duty to perform; but he had inclined, on the whole, to taking off the duty.

And here he must be permitted to say that a misunderstanding still existed as to the principles which had governed the committee in reporting this bill to the Senate. It seemed to be supposed that the committee had felt themselves restrained from touching any article the duty on which exceeded twenty per cent.; but the insertion of this article of salt was one fact which must effectually dispel that idea. He was just as willing, when seeking to reduce the revenue, to go into the examination of articles above twenty per cent. as under. He should not, indeed, touch any of the protected interests, when their protection held any reasonable proportion to the gain which would accrue to the country by taking off the tax. This article of salt was not the only item which the committee had touched, when the tax was over twenty per cent. They had laid their hand on some which enjoyed a protection over one hundred. The great interest of the country in a reduction of the revenue was paramount to the prosperity of some particular interests. As almost every article which they could reach was an article of luxury, and, therefore, a legitimate subject for taxation, it had given him pleasure to find in the long list at least one which was as necessary to human life as any thing which could be conceived, not excepting bread-stuffs themselves. He would not deny that this consideration had pressed with important weight upon his mind. On many other items in the bill he had acted with extreme reluctance; but it was with lively satisfaction that he found himself justified in proposing to abolish entirely the tax upon salt.

Mr. PRESTON next addressed the Senate. He said, if he had rightly understood the Senator from New York, he had maintained the position that, even adhering to the compromise act, this article of salt might be introduced into the bill. The Senator had further stated, that although he did not hold himself bound by the compromise, yet he was indisposed to touch important protected interests if it could be avoided. Mr. P. said that, for himself, he was disposed to reduce the duties whenever they ran counter to the law of 1833. He was a thoroughly anti-tariff politician, and ready and disposed, as such, to go all lengths, if he were not concluded by the law of 1833. He should vote to reduce any duty, when the reduction did not interfere with that act; but, whenever it did, he should steadily vote against it; for he was satisfied, from all the indications around him, that the anti-tariff interest in that chamber was the weaker interest, and that the only safety for them of the South was to adhere to the compromise. If once the tariff question were opened, and the existing provisions on that subject thrown afloat, Southern Senators would at once be reduced to an impotent minority, and would be compelled to sit by and see their rights, and their feelings too, sacrificed before their faces by interested combinations. The indications this day given had left no doubt on that subject. The compromise had been assented to by various sections of the country, for the sake of quieting the difficulties which agitated and threatened the Union; the larger interest yielding something to the weaker, and the weaker also consenting to relax something of their demands, lest their opponents should be driven to extremities. While the measure was under consideration, the inquiry had been put to himself, whether his State would be satisfied with such a measure. He had replied in the affirmative, and he therefore considered himself as personally identified with a part of the arrangement; for the Legislature of his own State had acted formally in this matter, expressly recognising the act of 1833 as a compromise. That act bound him, and bound her; and when South Carolina gave pledges, she abode by them. She had pledged herself to the compromise; and he, as her representative, should stand to it. No doubt, the compromise bill had no force as a constitutional arrangement; but all parties had agreed to it, and the country had gone on well under it. But, even if it were not for the interest of all to adhere to it, was it fit and becoming to open afresh all the wounds of the country, and bring back all the angry and violent emotions which had been excited by the tariff controversy? If it were for the sake of peace alone, he would not disturb the arrangement which had been made. Gentlemen might open the question again if they pleased; and, in that case, what would be his own position? He should be found on the extreme verge of the anti-tariff party. If the field was again thrown open, they must fight. Woollens, he supposed, would be the rallying point; and thus they would proceed from one article to another, fighting all their battles over again. If they must do this, they must; but he, for one, would gladly avoid it. Would Senators from the South permit the question to be opened? He addressed himself to the two flanks; and first to gentlemen in the opposition. Would they consent to throw a question of this kind open to an administration whose written principles were on one side of it, and their recorded votes upon the other? Would they again suffer the Executive to dandle them one against the other, and thus secure his own power, while he himself remained uncompromitted to one side or to the other? The Executive would bow to the one party, and assure them that if they would but give up their opposition, the tariff question should be their own; and then bow with equal grace on the other side, and give them a like assurance. But could this thing be done? Could such a double game be played? History showed that it could be done, and had been done; and that by a far less adroit manager than was soon to fill the executive chair. The present incumbent had played this game, and had played it up to South Carolina. The friends of the administration, speaking in its name, claimed to be with both parties—with one at the North, and with the other at the South; and by this very game General Jackson had got his power. And would gentlemen now permit an Executive who would not, and who could not, be compromised to any thing, thus to hold a rod over them? He, for one, was unwilling to produce such a state of things; and he was anxious, on political as well as on other considerations, to keep the question closed. He had said that the future Executive could not be compromised. Had the present incumbent been compromised, bold and decided as he was? Would any gentleman rise in his place and say that President Jackson was a tariff or an anti-tariff man? The friends of the tariff strongly believed that he was with them. The opponents of the tariff as strongly believed that he was with them. South Carolina went for him as being against the tariff, and Pennsylvania went for him with equal zeal as being decided for it. Mr. P. might offend those who worshipped the setting sun, if he should say that the rising luminary was brighter. This, however, he supposed, might very safely be affirmed—that the coming administration would not be bolder than that which had preceded it.

He would now address himself to the friends of the administration. A Senator from New York now called upon them to open the tariff question, when it had been New York that had fastened on the country the tariff of 1828. He repeated the assertion: it was New York which had done this suo vigore. It had been Martin Van Buren who gave the vote which fixed the tariff of 1828 upon the Southern States; and it was under this tariff President that New York again called upon them to open the question. For whose benefit? That of an anti-tariff President? Or of a tariff President? Of both. Which was he? Were they to believe his vote in 1828, or the anti-tariff movement of the present day?

He knew very well the principle which was adopted here, that any man who was elected President was to be understood, from that fact, as having the popular sanction for all he had done, be it what it might. Very well; admit the principle, and how would it apply to the President elect? He had sustained the tariff of 1828, and the people since elected him, and had, of course, sanctioned the tariff policy, and to oppose it would be treason. This was the position which might legitimately be taken.

The people had voted for a man who stood recorded on the records of the Senate (if the Senate had any permanent records) as a tariff man. Of course, the Legislature, in this state of things, must turn just as he turns. But Mr. P. thought this doctrine eminently wrong in principle, and he did not believe that any individual could derive great benefits from it. He considered it as neither wise nor proper, honorable or honest, for a Legislature which had built up manufactures by a protective policy, suddenly to change its course, and at one blow prostrate all the establishments which had grown up under their previous legislation. It might, indeed, be said that our citizens who were investing large amounts of capital in particular branches of industry were fully apprized that the Legislature possessed this power, and might at any time exercise it. This was true; but then the people believed that those whom they intrusted to make their laws were cautious and wise men; and that, having once deliberately embraced a course of policy, they would persevere in it, or would at least abstain from so great and sudden and ruinous changes as to prostrate the great interests of the country. In the most ardent period of Southern opposition to the American system, it had never been contended that all the manufactured articles which had for years been protected by the tariff were at once to be laid in the dust. When the angry feelings of the South were roused to their utmost point of excitement, he had never heard a man propose an immediate and sudden and violent change of policy, such as must crush and destroy these institutions. His colleague [Mr. CALHOUN] had never proposed a course of reduction short of seven years in completing its effect; and he was persuaded, if the question had been put to the nullifying convention itself, that body would not have advocated an immediate demolition of all the interests which depended on the tariff for their very being. The tariff law of 1828, which had been saddled on the Southern States by the vote of New York, would have now produced a revenue of fifty or sixty millions of dollars. Had not South Carolina come to the rescue, had she not refused to listen to the delusive promises which were sung in her ears, such would have inevitably been the result. Instead of a tariff of duties which brought nine millions into the Treasury, the country would have had a tariff which, at an average of 28 per cent. on the whole importation of the last season, would have given from fifty to sixty millions. The compromise had prevented such a state of things; and, having achieved that arrangement, Mr. P. was inclined for repose. He never could consent, as a Southern man, to trust a tariff administration with the open question of a protective system. What! were not Southern gentlemen aware that that Senate was not a whit less tariff in its composition at this hour than it had been in 1828? And though they might now repeal the duty on coal, and salt, and woollens, yet, whenever the great interests protected by the tariff should rally their strength, the same plundering association would again be formed, whose combination had carried the tariff laws of 1824 and 1828. He now warned his friends of the South that the tariff principle was in reality as dominant this day as it had ever been. The Executive might, indeed, present a double face to the different portions of the Union. To the South and West he might wear a gilded smile, which would induce them all to think that he was decidedly anti-tariff; decidedly a strict constructionist; decidedly a State rights man; decidedly an anti-abolitionist. While, at the same time, over the other shoulder, there might be another face, nodding to the North; and there all might be equally sure that the President was tariff, unquestionably tariff; a liberal constructionist; a friend of internal improvements, with a little touch of abolition. Under circumstances of this description, Mr. P. was utterly averse from having the compromise disturbed, and the question of the tariff again set afloat. He was well assured that if that question should now be opened, no Executive whatever would be strong enough to resist the tide of interest which would at once set in. Even the powerful man who now filled the executive chair had not resisted and dare not resist it; and dare, then, his successor? Whatever might be his disposition to do so, it was not in his power. Was it not plain? The Executive could not, for his life, make the vote on any one article in this bill a party vote. Gentlemen were still found voting according to the interests of their own constituents; and so they must continue to vote. Rather than trust executive pledges, whatever might be the executive kindness towards the South, he was for adhering to the compromise. The longer the country reposed under it, the stronger would be its bonds of security and peace. The public mind had now conformed itself to the arrangement. The community was satisfied, and the country, so far as this interest was concerned, was tranquil and prosperous. As a Southern man, he felt bound to adhere to a present and a certain good, in preference to trusting to an uncertain future gain. In the mean time he should be happy to hear the opinion of the chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. WARE] on these two points: first, whether he considered the Senate as bound by the compromise law; and, second, whether a leading gentleman from New York was tariff or anti-tariff.

In relation to this particular duty on salt, Mr. P. was in possession of sources of knowledge so intimate as would prevent him from voting on the question. The Senator from New York certainly could not have selected a stronger case to illustrate the impropriety of the tariff law than this very duty on salt. The whole duty was wrong in principle, and abominable in fact. In 1830 it enjoyed in the interior of the country a protection of two hundred per cent., besides all the natural protection arising from its weight and bulk. Yet he knew that even round about the establishment where the salt was made in immense quantities, this enormous duty was rendered popular by the wealth and influence of those who owned the manufactory; and there were no more decided partisans of the tariff system than the poor class of inhabitants in that region on whom this enormous duty was levied. The same influence was exerted in the halls of Congress; and never had he been so profoundly taught the danger of the tariff policy as he had by witnessing its results in relation to this tax upon salt. Salt was selling at a dollar a bushel; the duty upon it was 20 cents, and the poorest people were paying this duty, and petitioning Congress that it might not be taken off. It was a tax which had renewed the virtue (of course he meant politically) of the Senator from New York, and of the forty New York delegates in the other House. The General Government reduced the duty to 10 cents, and the patriotic State of New York to 6 cents, making the existing duty 16 cents per bushel. The liberality of the honorable Senator was most conspicuous in moving to abolish this duty. Mr. P. was not quite so sure of the magnanimity of the forty Representatives in the other House; it might turn out that twenty of them would be found on one side, and twenty on the other; and so New York might decide upon the tariff, unless her Senators were called to vote by a decision of their State Legislature. He believed that on a former occasion the Senators from New York amicably divided, and thus kept the State safe, when in 1832 their State spoke, and instructed them how to vote; and it was possible that the honorable Senator, who had proposed the abolition of this duty on salt, might, when the moment for voting arrived, pull out of his pocket the instructions of his Legislature, and, in the face of all his own speeches, might vote against his motion. The compromise act had found the tax upon salt in this predicament. The duty of 20 cents had been reduced to 15, and by a second reduction had come down to 10, and at that point it stood when the compromise bill was introduced. The operation of the compromise law itself had further reduced the duty about three tenths, so that at the present time salt paid a duty of 7 or 8 cents, and by the year 1842 this would be further diminished to 3 or 4 cents. Mr. P. stated these facts from an accurate knowledge of the details of the subject; but though he stated them for the information of the Senate, and, being personally interested, should not vote upon the question, he was decidedly opposed to touching the compromise.

Mr. DAVIS here stating it was his desire to submit a few remarks on this subject, but feeling unwilling to commence them at so late an hour, the Senate, on his motion, adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 24.

REDUCTION OF THE TARIFF.

The Senate having resumed the consideration of the bill to reduce the duties on certain imports--

Mr. DAVIS rose and addressed the Senate in substance as follows:

I feel it my duty, on this occasion, to say a few words in reply to some remarks which have fallen from gentlemen on the other side, and which seemed to me to be intended personally for myself and my colleague, as representing one of the Eastern States of this Union. My colleague is abundantly able to answer for himself, and will, no doubt, do so in due time. This discussion has taken a wide range, and it has been thought worth while to open the history of the tariff act of 1828. Many of us were witnesses of the transactions referred to; and I do not regret that some time has been occupied on that subject, as it may be a means of sending forth to the country a representation of some affairs not remarkably well understood. We of the North did not very well know how to account for it, when we saw you, sir, [Mr. KING, of Alabama, who was in the chair,] and other Southern gentlemen, voting to keep up heavy protecting duties, while at the same time you inveighed with so much severity against the whole protective policy. We were aware that there was some key to the apparent enigma, and now we have had the whole secret fully unfolded. We could not, indeed, be so stupid as not to comprehend the general tenor of the act of 1828. What was the origin of that act? In 1827, those who were engaged in the woollens interest felt themselves aggrieved that the protective privileges secured to them under the act of 1824 had been impaired by the legislation of Great Britain; and they came to Congress, asking the enactment of such a law as should restore them to the same footing as they had enjoyed under the act of 1824. No action was had at that time, but their application was renewed in 1828; and out of these circumstances grew the famous act which has not infrequently been denominated a bill of abominations. I do not know who first christened it by this name. I am not personally answerable, although I do not think the name was very much misapplied. The introduction of the bill occasioned a long discussion. Instead of giving the woollens interest a little aid, it was found that the Committee on Manufactures had introduced into the bill almost every thing. There was a heavy protecting duty on hemp, which nobody asked for; duties on duck, on iron, on spirits; although no petition had been presented calling for any one of them. These, and a number more, were gratuitously put into the bill; but when we come to look for what was done for the woollens interest, we find nothing at all. We asked for bread, and you gave us a stone. A high duty, it is true, was imposed on foreign woollens, but a proportional duty was laid upon wool, which completely annulled the benefit to the manufacturer. The bill was made to respond to other matters, entirely foreign from its professed object. We are not so ignorant as not to know that there were mixed considerations of policy, and various interests concerned, in a measure so complicated in its character. When we saw Southern members voting to keep up high duties on iron, and sail cloth, and hemp, we thought there was some hidden meaning which prompted such a course. Now, as I before observed, we have the full interpretation. The policy of the South has been avowed, and we find that the object was to make the bill so very bad as to drive those who had asked for protection to vote against it. But when it came to the final vote, many of those who had most vehemently opposed the bill suddenly turned about, and voted in its favor. This I could not do. So I, for one, followed exactly the course which, as it now appears, it was designed I should. I voted against the bill. It passed, however, to the obvious disappointment and surprise of many Southern gentlemen, who had calculated on the opposition of every New England representative. I have only adverted to this history, for the purpose of showing that we of the New England States, and especially the woollens interest, were selected as the scapegoat; that while the bill was constructed in such a way as to satisfy all the Middle and Western States, that interest which most needed protection, and which had earnestly petitioned for it, was entirely deserted.

Then came the bill of 1832, a bill of somewhat the same character with that which had preceded it. I deliberated long on the course which it was my duty to pursue; and, in conclusion, felt myself constrained to vote against that, as I had against the bill of 1828. When the period of my election came round, my opponents said that I had been found in bad company, and that I had stood side by side with Southern men in voting against a bill for protecting duties; and it was thence argued, by a similar course of reasoning to that which has been applied in the present debate, that I was an enemy to the tariff. A man, it was said, might be known by his company; and, as I had voted in the same way with avowed opponents of the whole tariff policy, I must be set down as agreeing with them in sentiment.

Then followed the bill of 1833. I was called to act upon that, also; and the journals of the Senate will show that I voted in the negative, as I had done on the two former occasions. I took occasion at that time fully to express my sentiments in regard to that measure. They are in print, and will speak for themselves. The bill, however, passed, and became the law of the land; and, for myself, I acquiesced in it, as all citizens should do; nor am I aware that my State has discovered any disposition to interfere with its provisions.

But something has been said here upon the subject of pledges. The Senator from Virginia, and some other members of the Senate, have observed that they have neither heard nor seen any recognition of pledges, on this side the House, to the observance of the act of 1833 as a compromise. I do not know that these remarks were intended to have a personal reference to myself; but yesterday the Senator from Virginia made the former remarks more pointed and personal, observing that he had carefully watched, throughout the debate, and had listened to hear whether any Northern Senator would acknowledge himself to be bound by the act as a bargain, and had heard no such word from any one of them. He had heard no pledges from this side of the House. Pledges to what? What pledges does he demand? What did he expect? Is he not in favor of this bill? He says that the compromise act is nothing more to him than any other piece of paper. He approves the present bill, and will vote for it. Well, sir, and how stands the matter with his friends? Who brought this bill forward? Was it on my motion, or on the motion of those with whom I am associated? It was not. The bill has been matured by his own friends; and the chairman of the committee who reported it [Mr. WRIGHT] said it is obvious that about one million of the proposed amount of reduction falls within the provisions of the compromise act. Was it not, then, the deliberate purpose of the committee to report a bill which did interfere with the compromise; and do not all who support the bill avow the determination, which has been so frankly avowed by the chairman and by the Senator from Virginia, to invade that act? If such is the fact, and if this measure is not a mere experiment, but has been seriously brought forward here, what am I obliged to infer? Am I not compelled to believe that those who have brought it, and those who support it, mean to declare that we are not bound by the act of 1833? That, to use the language of the gentleman from Virginia, it is no more to us than a bit of parchment? If such is the tenor and tendency of their own remarks, and such the doctrine they themselves avow, then where is the propriety in calling upon us for pledges? When they avow their disregard of the compromise, do they expect that we shall pledge ourselves to regard it? If that is their expectation, then the present measure is without sense or object, that I can see. What influence is our opinion to have? Suppose we rose in our place, and declared that we held that act to be binding, would the honorable Senator from Virginia change his course? If he would, then must he not admit that this bill is a mere experiment—a test? The chairman assures us it is brought here with a view to its being passed; and gentlemen say that they are willing their sincerity shall be judged by their votes. For what, then, do they want pledges from us? It would not alter their course if we should give them. Their course is wholly independent of any opinion of ours. I cannot, therefore, make any apology for their course on this ground. I do not like to be called upon for senseless and unmeaning pledges.

But I have another word to say about this matter of pledges. My opinions with regard to the compromise bill were freely given at the time it passed; but it became a law, and I acquiesced in it, as was my duty; nor have I given any proof of a disposition to disturb it. But I know that this matter has recently been brought before the Legislature of my State, and that there is a probability of legislative action in regard to it. I am not in possession of any authority to pledge my State to a course of future action; it would not become me; it does not belong to me. The utmost that could be demanded of me would be an expression of my own opinion. It is not for me to give pledges while the matter in hand is before my State Legislature. I can now state that the opinions of that body have arrived by the last mail; I shall lay the document before the Senate, and let it speak for itself. I thought it due to myself to say thus much on the subject of pledges; and, having done so, I will relieve the Senate, and resume my seat.

Mr. BENTON went into a lengthy reply, in which he quoted the journal to show that the present bill was more advanced in proportion to the date of the session than the compromise bill had been in 1833; from which he took occasion to vindicate the committee who reported it from the charge of delay. He denied the binding force of the compromise act, against which he spoke with some severity. He warmly commended the policy of regulating commerce by equivalents, and expressed a determination to commence a regular system of operations with a view to have that policy extensively pursued by this Government.

After a few remarks from Mr. NILES, the question was taken on striking out of the bill the words "common salt," and decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Kent, Knight, McKean, Nicholas, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Webster—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Brown, Cutlibert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Prentiss, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, White, Wright—28.

Mr. BENTON moved to amend the bill by inserting a particular kind of blankets, (specified in his amendment,) used principally by the Indians; which amendment was agreed to: Yeas 23, noes 14.

Mr. NILES offered the following amendment:

"That from and after the 30th day of September, 1837, the duty on fossil coal, culm coal screenings, and coke, imported into the United States, shall be one dollar per ton of two thousand two hundred and forty pounds; and that after the 30th day of September, 1838, the duty shall be sixty cents per ton."

Mr. NILES addressed the Senate at considerable length in support of his amendment, and upon the principles of the bill. He remarked that it was known to the Senate that the subject of the duty on coal had been brought under the consideration of the Committee on Manufactures, of which he was a member, and that, in pursuance of the instruction of said committee, he had reported a bill for the entire repeal of the duty on foreign coal; but as it was not his intention to call up that bill, he had offered this amendment to the bill under consideration, which related to the same general subject of the reduction of duties. The Committee on Manufactures had also made a report, containing somewhat at length their views of the subject, and their reasons for the reduction or repeal of the duty on coal; and did he suppose that Senators had examined that report, he would forbear any remarks in support of the amendment he offered; but from the great pressure on the time and attention of every Senator, and as the subject was not one of general interest, he had reason to believe that few gentlemen had given much attention to the report to which he had referred. He should, therefore, as briefly as he could, submit some general considerations in favor of the amendment. The present law imposes a duty of six cents per heaped bushel on coal, in general terms; and, from the vague and indefinite nature of the language, several questions have arisen, and prosecutions have been instituted to recover the duty in cases of doubt, under the present law. He believed a suit had been commenced in Pennsylvania in respect to coal screenings; and one had recently been decided in New York against the United States, the object of which was to recover the duty on imported coke. The jury decided that coke was not coal, and, therefore, not subject to duty by the existing law. Coke bears the same relation to fossil coal that charcoal does to wood. It is fossil coal charred, or burned, and loses fifty or sixty per cent. in weight by the process. The law is defective; and if the duty was to be maintained at its present rate, it ought to be amended. But his object was a reduction of the duty. A majority of the Committee on Manufactures had recommended a repeal, and he had concurred in that opinion; but being satisfied that a repeal of the duty could not be carried at this time, he now only sought to obtain a reduction. A ton of coal contained about twenty-seven or twenty-eight bushels; and, at the present rate of impost, pays a duty of about one dollar and seventy cents, or now something less, as by the operation of the act of 1833 the duty has been reduced from six cents to five and one third cents per bushel. The reduction proposed is about forty per cent. on the 30th of September next; and in one year from that period about seventy per cent. The rate of duty at that time, should the amendment be adopted, would be about the same as what it will be reduced to in 1842, under the provisions of the act of 1833; that is, about twenty per cent., but probably rather above that rate.

The duty on coal was imposed for revenue only, so far as respects all the former acts; and even as to the last act, that of 1824, it can hardly be claimed that the increase of duty was designed for protection. The act of 1789, which was the first imposing duties on imports, subjected coal to a duty of two cents per heaped bushel; the next year it was raised to three cents; in 1792, to four and a half cents; in 1816, when the whole system of revenue was revised at the close of the war, it was increased to five cents per bushel; and in 1824, to six cents. The act of 1824, which increased the duty one cent per bushel, is the only one that can be considered as having had any reference to protection; nor is it by any means clear that the addition to the duty made by that act had any reference to the protection of the domestic interest, for the country was then oppressed with debt from the war expenditures, and the rates of duty of many articles were increased for the purpose of revenue, and which were in no way connected with any domestic interest. But there is another and stronger reason tending to prove that the object of the increase of duty by the act of 1824 was not protection. The home coal trade then could hardly be said to exist, and it can scarcely be supposed that Congress intended a prospective protection of an interest not then in existence, or not of sufficient importance to demand attention. The preceding season, that of 1823, the whole amount of anthracite coal mined and brought to market was less than six thousand tons. The first anthracite coal which was introduced as an article of fuel was in 1820, when a few hundred tons only were used. It has been increasing since that time to the present. For some years the increase was very slow, but of late it has been very rapid; and since 1831, the anthracite coal which has been brought into the market from Pennsylvania alone has increased about one hundred thousand tons per annum. During the year 1836, nearly 700,000 tons were mined and brought to market. Fossil coal has now become a common article of fuel in all the cities and towns on the Atlantic border of the Union, and its use is extending into the country; and it is extensively used in factories. The primitive forests have been destroyed, and what remain are wanted for timber. It appears to be the natural order and course of things, that during the early stages of the settlement of every country, the forests are the natural resource for supplying the inhabitants with fuel; but, in the progress of time, this resource must fail; the forests disappear before the industry and enterprise of man, and the lands are brought under cultivation. As every country becomes older and more populous, a greater portion of the lands are required for tillage, to supply the wants of the inhabitants; but when the forests are destroyed, and the lands generally brought into cultivation, some other resource must be discovered to supply fuel, one of the most indispensable articles of life; and a beneficent Providence has provided almost every country with an inexhaustible supply of fuel in its mountains, which are not susceptible of cultivation. This is eminently true in the United States. No country on the globe is more abundantly provided with fossil coal, or with better natural facilities of transporting it to the places where it may be wanted. West of the mountains coal abounds almost every where; east it is not so generally prevalent, yet there are large districts containing a supply for all time to come, most of which are in the State of Pennsylvania.

In the older portions of the United States, we have just arrived at a period when the inhabitants must depend on fossil coal for fuel, instead of the forests which have hitherto supplied their wants. The transition from one description of fuel to the other has been astonishingly rapid within the last five or six years. If the increase in the consumption of coal continues for ten years at the same ratio it has for the last five years, there will, at that time, be one million seven hundred thousand tons consumed yearly from the mines of Pennsylvania alone. This quantity, at four dollars per ton, delivered at tide water, would amount to nearly seven millions of dollars. Pennsylvania had been highly favored; in addition to a fertile soil, she possesses treasures of wealth in her mountains of coal, of which the imagination could not well conceive. Unless fossil coal which may come into competition with her trade shall be discovered elsewhere, the time was not remote when she would receive twenty millions of dollars annually as the proceeds of her coal trade. All the Middle and Eastern States will be tributary to her for one of the first and most important necessities of life. Mr. N. said that he did not envy Pennsylvania these advantages; he rejoiced that she possessed them; it would always afford him pleasure to witness her advance in that career of wealth and greatness which seemed open to her. All that he desired was, that she should exhibit a just moderation in her prosperity; that she should be satisfied with reasonable profits on her immense coal trade. But he was not willing that, by means of an onerous duty of fifty per cent. on the foreign article, she should be enabled to obtain nearly two dollars per ton for her coal more than the fair minimum price.

From the facts he had stated, it was, he thought, apparent that the question of the coal duty had now become one of great magnitude and importance, both to those engaged in the domestic coal trade and to the country generally. When the last act was passed, in 1824, the question was of but trifling consequence, and there was no reason to suppose that it had received much consideration. Even if he were to admit that the increase of the duty by the act of 1824 was designed to favor the domestic coal interest, the question then was of so little importance, it cannot reasonably be believed that the subject was then fully examined or discussed. But the time has now arrived when Congress is called on to decide whether it is just and proper to continue an onerous duty of nearly fifty per cent. on one of the first necessities of life, which was originally imposed and has been maintained for revenue only.

Why shall this duty be continued? Is it wanted for revenue? This is not claimed. It is our purpose to reduce the revenue, and the bill before us has been introduced for that object. It reduces the revenue nearly two and a half millions. The duty on coal in 1835 was nearly one hundred and thirty thousand dollars; and, should this amendment prevail, it would reduce the duty about forty thousand dollars the first year, and something like eighty thousand afterwards. So far as the revenue was concerned, the measure was desirable, as our object is to reduce the revenue—to avoid a surplus, which is distracting Congress and the country.

But the Committee on Manufactures had not recommended the repeal of the coal duty as a financial measure. The general subject of the reduction of duties had been intrusted to another committee, no doubt much more competent to so arduous a task. They had proposed the repeal of the coal duty, as a measure of relief to the country from what they believed to be an unnecessary and burdensome tax, which bore particularly hard on the poor; but, so far as the measure would have any effect on the finances, it was favorable; but that was altogether a secondary object.

Is the present high rate of duty on imported coal necessary to protect the home coal trade? This, it must be admitted, is the only ground on which the duty can be justified. He did not, however, believe that so high a rate of duty was necessary for that purpose; nor could he be satisfied, if it was, that it would be reasonable and just to continue it.

Mr. N. said he doubted whether any duty was required to protect the domestic coal interest, and was quite sure that so high a rate of duty could not be demanded. He did not intend to go into a full discussion of this question, but would barely allude to some considerations which had led him to believe that the coal trade was not an interest requiring protection. Fossil coal is a raw material, a mineral existing in the bowels of the earth in a pure state, and fit for use. It did not have to be separated from other and grosser materials; it underwent no process of refining, or any preparation whatever, to fit it for use. It was not the product of human skill, art, or industry, of any kind; it was a valuable deposit in nature's storehouse, provided by a kind Providence, to supply the wants and administer to the comforts of man. All that remained to be done was for him to put forth his hand and remove it from its bed, where it had been deposited for his use. It was one of those indispensable necessities of life which God had provided in a state fit for use, leaving nothing for man to do. The coal trade was wholly unlike those manufacturing interests that require a high degree of skill and experience, which can only be acquired by a long course of practice, aided by mechanical power and by a knowledge of the construction and use of complicated machinery. The protection to manufactures is defended mainly on the ground that they cannot, in their infancy, stand against foreign competition, and that protection is necessary during the period which is required to enable the home manufacturer to acquire that skill and experience which exists in other countries. This argument, which is the strongest in support of the protection of manufactures, has no application to the coal trade. Another argument, scarcely less weighty in favor of protecting manufactures, is the necessity of guarding them against the depressions and fluctuations of foreign markets; which, were it not for protective duties, would at such periods glut our markets with foreign goods—imported, perhaps, at a sacrifice—and which would be ruinous to our own manufactures. This evil could never be experienced in the coal trade, as the value of foreign coal in our market depends principally on the freight and charges of importation.

There is another cogent reason why the home coal trade cannot require protection against foreign competition; which is, that it is sufficiently protected by the bulk and weight of the article, the almost entire value of which arises from the labor and expense of mining and getting it to market. In a business of this description, it was manifest that the home dealer must possess advantages over the foreign trader, who must be compelled to pay much larger freights, insurance, and charges. Coal is worth, in Liverpool, about thirteen cents per bushel, or between three and four dollars per ton, being nearly as high as the price at which American coal ought to be sold at tide water. Some years since, coal was sold at Philadelphia at $4 75 per ton, and he had no doubt that it could be sold at $4, and afford a fair remuneration for the labor and capital. It is valued at fifty cents in the pit, and it costs fifty cents more to mine it, leaving three dollars for transporting it to tide water and for profits. If the importer has to pay for coal nearly as much in Liverpool as it is worth in Philadelphia, how is it possible that any thing is to be feared from foreign competition? The expenses of importing so heavy and bulky an article as coal must be an ample protection to the home trade. It is estimated that the expense of the importation of goods, including freight, commissions, insurance, and all charges, together with the difference in exchange, amounts to at least twenty per cent.; and the expenses of the importation of iron are said to be thirty per cent. It can hardly be supposed, therefore, that coal can be imported at less than fifty per cent.; and he believed that one hundred would probably be found nearer the truth. Without going into other considerations, Mr. N. said he thought it was clear that the domestic coal trade was not exposed to suffer from foreign competition, even if the entire duty were repealed. And if this were the case, then the only effect of the duty was to raise the price of the American coal something like two dollars per ton above its minimum value. This must be the effect of the duty on foreign coal, unless there is sufficient domestic competition to keep down the price, without the aid of the foreign trade, which he did not believe was the case.

Mr. N. said that he had thrown out some suggestions, intended to show that the coal duty was not required for the protection of the home trade; but, even if he was incorrect in this, he believed that there were objections to this duty so serious and weighty that, in any view which can be taken of the subject, a high rate of duty could not be defended as consistent with the principles of justice or humanity. He would barely allude to some of these objections:

The duty on foreign coal is necessarily a partial tax; and, as it operates unequally and partially, it is unjust. The duty on foreign coal tends to raise the price of the domestic article, so far as they come in competition with each other, and no farther. This competition is wholly confined to the cities and towns on the Atlantic border. Imported coal never has been, and never can be, conveyed west of the mountains, or any considerable distance into the interior. That section of the Union has an inexhaustible supply of native coal, abounding in all directions, so that foreign coal, if there were no duty, could never interfere. It is only the inhabitants on the seaboard who have any interest in this question; and the tax, both on the foreign and domestic article, is paid by them alone. This tax, therefore, is too limited and partial in its operation to be just.

Another and more serious objection to the coal duty is, that it is a tax on one of the prime necessities for upholding life, and is extremely burdensome and oppressive to the poor. In a country where the winters are so long and severe as in a considerable portion of the United States, fuel is one of the first necessities of life. During the last year, not less than nine months a fire was required for comfort, and at all times is indispensable for cooking and family purposes. Coal is the cheapest kind of fuel; and a tax on it is peculiarly burdensome to the poorer classes, especially in our cities. Next to rent, fuel is one of the most expensive articles; the very poorest families cannot get along with less than three tons of coal yearly. Considering the tax as two dollars per ton, it will amount to six dollars per annum to the poorest families. This would be a heavy tax; but it is not all nor the worst of the case. They are subjected to a still more oppressive tax, by the second-hand holders and regraters, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] called them the other day, in speaking against the salt duty. He exposed the foul practices and oppressions of the regraters, in relation to the article of common salt, in the most eloquent and forcible manner.

Mr. N. said that he really wished he could have the benefit of the talents and influence of that Senator on this question. In his speech against the salt tax, it appeared to him the gentleman was actually inspired; his eloquence was too fervid and sublime to be confined to the sober style of prose; it broke directly into the more elevated and pathetic strains of poetry. He (Mr. N.)

concurred in most that the Senator said on that question; yet still he believed that most of his remarks would apply with more force, justice, and truth, to the onerous tax on fuel. Salt, it is true, is one of the first necessities of life, more universal in its use than coal or fuel of any kind, as it is required for the subsistence of beasts as well as man. But the amount of the tax, especially that paid by the poorer classes, was trifling compared with the tax they pay upon fuel. The class of families to whom he had referred as consuming three tons of coal would not use probably three bushels of salt a year; so that they would pay a salt tax of thirty cents, and a fuel tax of six dollars.

What the honorable Senator had said of the practices of the regraters in the salt trade would apply with more force to the regraters in the coal trade. And how far these practices were sustained and kept up by the duty, might be a question; but he verily believed that if the duty was repealed, and foreign competition let in, the extortionary and oppressive measures of the regraters would be at an end, or their enormity very much diminished. The selfishness and rapacity of second-hand dealers and regraters in the coal business were greatly favored by the condition of the trade: anthracite coal, which was the kind used in the Northern cities, came almost entirely from Philadelphia, an inland port, which was closed nearly three months in the year, and during that period when the demand for fuel was most pressing; the duty excluded foreign coal, and the ice shut out any additional supply from Philadelphia at the setting in of winter. This gave the holders the control of the market, who have nothing more to do but to combine, to enable them to regulate the price at their pleasure. This they have done the last three years, in all the cities north of Philadelphia. During the last long and severe winter, these merciless regraters in New York, as he was credibly informed, held their regular meetings, at which they consulted the thermometer, and the capacity of the citizens to endure freezing. As the cold increased, and the sufferings of the poor became more intense, they raised the price of coal from week to week, and even from day to day. So complete was this system of oppression, that the price of fuel formed a scale to determine the continuance and degree of the cold. The result of this system was, that coal which was probably worth seven dollars per ton when the navigation closed, was raised to sixteen dollars per ton. The sufferings of the poor, under such a state of things, might be conceived, but could not be described.

But (said Mr. N.) he would by no means assert that these regraters in coal were sinners above all other men: the evil, great as it was, ought to be ascribed to the condition of the coal trade. The retail dealers had only done what nearly all men will do; they had only taken advantage of circumstances to obtain the highest price for their commodity. This, however unjust and oppressive in many cases, is what the cupidity of the human heart will lead most men to do. It is the embarrassed state of the trade, the obstruction of the home trade, and the exclusion of foreign competition, which has occasioned these results—which has led to practices so oppressive, cruel, and inhuman to the poor. Who can contemplate evils like these, and sufferings such as he had feebly attempted to describe, and believing that they are in any degree the result of our legislation, without feeling an emotion of indignation springing up in his heart?

There is (said Mr. N.) another cause that has contributed to the evils in the coal trade, which he had attempted to point out, and which, in his opinion, was a sufficient reason against continuing a high rate of duty on foreign coal, were there no other. He alluded to the fact that the coal trade was in the hands of a few large companies, and to all intents and purposes was a monopoly in fact. Whether a monopoly is created by legal enactments, or arises from other causes, it is not the less a monopoly, nor the less subject to the evils which attend all monopolies. It is a well-known fact that the coal business is in the hands of a very few large companies, who manage it in their own way, and, as they believe, for their own interest. One variety of coal (that called Lackawana) was got to market by one company only. How many companies were concerned in all he could not say, but there were but few. The coal lands had been bought up by these monopolizing companies, who had constructed canals and railroads into the coal region, of which they had an exclusive control; and by these means they had obtained a complete and entire monopoly of the business. They have attempted to regulate the supply according to their estimate of the demand, and with a view to keep up the price. It will be found, by examining the statements in the remonstrance they have sent here, that when an unusual quantity of coal, brought to market, has remained over the year unsold, there has been a corresponding reduction in the supply got to market the following year. This fact alone proves that the coal business is in so few hands, that those who supply the market can regulate the quantity according to their pleasure and their estimate of the demand. It is also a remarkable fact, and inconsistent with what is found to be true in almost every kind of business, that whilst the demand for coal has been rapidly increasing, the price for several years has been advancing. This shows that there is something wrong; for an increased demand, which is calculated to give stability and activity to business, is usually and naturally attended with a reduction of prices. It has been so in every department of the manufacturing business. The price of coal in Philadelphia, from 1820 to 1828, was from $7 to $8 a ton; from 1828 to 1832, it was $6 to $6 50 per ton; during the years 1834 and 1835, it was from $4 75 to $5 25 per ton; and during the year 1836, and the present year, coal has sold in Philadelphia at from $6 to $9 50 per ton. For two years, those of 1834 and 1835, the price of coal was reduced; but even then the regraters managed to raise the price enormously high, during the winter, in the cities north of Philadelphia.

Sir, said Mr. N., it deserves our serious consideration whether there is not something wrong, radically wrong, in our whole revenue system. On what articles and on what portion of our population is the burden of taxes thrown? Look into your statute book, and see the long list of free articles! You will find among them tea, coffee, fruits, silks, linens, worsted stuff goods, and many others, which, if not, strictly speaking, luxuries, are articles most of which are consumed by the more wealthy classes. The bill now before us reduces the duty on wine to a mere nominal rate, the highest duty being but twelve and a half cents per gallon, and the lowest only three fourths of a cent. Is it the policy of this Government to throw the whole burden of taxation on the necessities of life? If it is, and if this is a consequence of the protective principle, it deserves very serious consideration how far that principle, in its application, requires to be modified and restricted. He could not approve of that policy which throws the whole burden of taxation on the necessities of life. It is unsound in theory, unjust and oppressive in practice. The wisdom and justice of all laws must be determined by their practical operation. Is there not great injustice in the operation of our revenue laws? Let any one during the late severe winter have visited one of our large cities, say New York; let him have entered the mansions of some of the wealthy citizens, the bankers and brokers of Wall street, who amass their thousands and ten thousands in a day, and live in the magnificent style of princes; let him have witnessed their splendid rooms, their superb and costly furniture, perhaps imported from London or Paris—sofas, ottomans, mirrors, carpets, all of the most expensive kind—and if he dined with them he would have seen the “purple and fine linen” in which their families are arrayed, the plate and rich furniture of their tables, and have tasted of their sherry and champagne. After witnessing all this, let him have inquired what was the amount of taxes which this wealthy citizen paid to his Government for all the princely exhibition of magnificence he had seen, designed to display his wealth or gratify his pride. He would find that the taxes on all he had seen were nothing, or next to nothing.

But let the same individual, on leaving these scenes of luxury, visit the cellars and garrets of the poor, see their half-clothed and half-fed families, shivering around an old stove, warmed by a handful of coals, which have been purchased at a price one hundred per cent. higher than that paid by the wealthy citizen, and on which he has paid a tax of fifty per cent., and whatever else he found in these wretched abodes of the poor, he will learn that it has all been heavily taxed, because it belongs to the necessities of life. Such is the operation of our revenue laws.

Mr. N. said he was aware that the proposed reduction of the duty on coal was inconsistent with the provisions of the act of 1833, commonly called the compromise act. It might, therefore, be proper for him to say a few words on that subject; and he was the more inclined to do so, from the remarks of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] who declared, that if gentlemen from the manufacturing States remained silent, after the explanation he had given of his own course in relation to that act, he should consider them as bound to respect it, and to adhere to and carry out its provisions in good faith. Several gentlemen had expressed their opinions of the act of 1833, and he did not exactly concur with any of them; his own opinion was of no importance, except to his own constituents; yet, as representing a manufacturing State, and as a member of the Committee on Manufactures, it might be proper for him to express his sentiments in relation to that law. His State was as extensively interested in manufactures as any in the Union, with perhaps two exceptions, and he was not sure that it was behind Massachusetts or Rhode Island. It had no large manufacturing towns, no Wares or Lowells, for the reason, he supposed, that it had no Boston, no large commercial town, where the great capitals accumulated from commerce had sought employment in manufactures. He would not say that he rejoiced that his State had neither Lowells nor Bostons, but he would say that he preferred the manufacturing interests as they existed in his own State, consisting of small establishments, with moderate capitals, carried on by private companies and individual enterprise, spread all over the State, in almost every town and village, and embracing every department of manufacturing industry, and every description of mechanical employment. He much preferred this state of business to large establishments in the hands of wealthy corporations, which erected and owned entire villages. It was individual interests and personal rights which he regarded as the highest duty of Government to cherish and sustain.

In respect to the act of 1833, the Senator from Kentucky and some others considered it as a compromise of the interests of the tariff and anti-tariff States; and that it possessed the binding force of an actual compact, the national faith being pledged to maintain it. Other Senators considered that law as having no higher character, and as entitled to no more respect, than any ordinary act of legislation.

Mr. N. said he did not concur in either of these opinions. Considering the circumstances under which that act was passed, the pledges upon the face of it, the acquiescence of the nation in it, and the impression which has prevailed very extensively, although by no means universally, that it had adjusted and settled the tariff question for ten years, he did not think it would be just or reasonable to regard that act as entitled to no more respect than an ordinary law of Congress. If the law itself was entitled to no more regard, something at least was due to public opinion, which had assigned to it a higher character. So far as that act has been considered as having settled the tariff question for ten years, to the same extent individual interests may have been influenced and regulated by it, as a supposed compromise which was not to be disturbed.

Mr. N. said that he would respect and maintain the object and the general principles of that act, but he could go no further. He could not regard it in the light of a compact, which was binding on Congress or the country, according to its precise terms, and in the same sense that a contract is binding. Are gentlemen aware of the consequences of assuming the position that the act of 1833 is to have the binding force of a contract? The provisions of the act are not limited in their operation to the year 1842; but some of them are to take effect after that time only, and are unlimited. If they cannot be disturbed or interfered with, then a law of Congress will have all the operation and effect of an amendment of the constitution, circumscribing within narrow limits the powers of this Government, on one of the most important subjects of legislation; one which, perhaps more than any other, will require the frequent action of the legislative authority.

By the provisions of that act, after 1842, no higher rate of duties than 20 per cent. can be imposed on imports, under any circumstances; it also provides that all credits are to be abolished, and all duties to be paid in cash, and the valuation is to be according to the price at the port of entry. The act also specifies a list of articles which are to be imported free of duty, after 1842; and which, according to the terms of the law, can never be subject to a duty. These are important principles, which take away a large share of the power of Congress over the subject of raising a revenue by duties on imports. Some of these principles may be found inconsistent with the interests of the country or those of his own constituents; and if so, he should not consider himself bound by them. And it would not be consistent with his ideas of justice to take the advantages of the act, so far as it operates to keep on the high rates of duties, and deny its force afterwards. He could not regard the act as a compact above the reach of legislation for ten years, and then deny its binding force afterwards. But he would respect the general object of the law, and the leading principles of it, intended to secure that object. What was the great object of that act, and the general principle of the adjustment of the tariff controversy? It was, that the high rates of duties were to be gradually reduced down to a certain point. This was the substance of the adjustment, and the rest is matter of detail, and of minor importance. To reduce the high duties at once, or very rapidly, would be a violation of the general principle of that act; but to increase the scale of reduction, or to reduce or repeal the duty on particular articles, which may not need protection, and where the duties operate unjustly or oppressively, would only interfere with its details. This he believed to be the case of the duty on coal and other necessities. His own opinion was, that the better course would have been to have increased the reduction of all the high duties, upon some general and uniform principle. Under the act of 1833, only one tenth of the excess above twenty per cent. is to be taken off biennially; which was a very slow reduction, amounting to hardly one million of dollars on the whole revenue every second year, or half a million annually. A much more rapid reduction than this might be made without injury to any interest. He could not believe that there was any manufacturing interest, or any other interest, that required the protection of a duty of fifty or sixty per cent. at this time, which could be sustained by a duty of twenty per cent. after the year 1842. The duty was either higher than was required now, or it would be found insufficient then. He was in favor of a reduction now, it being an object to avoid a surplus revenue; and should it be found in 1842 that twenty per cent. duty was not sufficient to sustain the woollen, or any other important manufacturing interest, he should not feel himself restrained by the act of 1833 from advocating a higher rate of duty. He regarded it as one of the highest obligations of the Government to sustain and protect all the important interests of the country, so far as it could be done by a wise and discreet adjustment of the revenue, and a proper discrimination, calculated to favor the interests and industry of our own country.

Mr. N. said that, should the amendment be adopted, he felt confident it would not affect injuriously the coal trade of Pennsylvania; its only tendency would be to reduce the price of coal to something nearer its fair minimum value at tide water, and in some degree to check and counteract the evil practices of the monopolizers and regraters in our cities.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he would not impose upon himself the task of following the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. NILES] throughout his argument. If he were to pursue this course, we should not close our contest even at the rising of the stars, which was the time appointed for the termination of the ancient trials by battle. He should therefore content himself with some general observations on the subject.

Mr. B. congratulated the Senator from Connecticut upon his rapid advance towards the true doctrine upon this question. Some weeks ago that Senator, as chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, had reported a bill to repeal altogether the duties upon the importation of foreign coal. After reflection, he now merely proposed to hasten, by a few years, the operation of the compromise act in relation to this article, by reducing the duty to one dollar per ton after September next, and to sixty cents per ton after September, 1838. Judging from this rapid change in his opinion, Mr. B. had good reason to hope that if the Senator could have a few weeks longer for further reflection, he would acknowledge himself to be wrong, and permit the reduction of this duty to keep pace with the reduction of duties upon other protected articles. It was now, under his proposed amendment, only a question of two or three years, sooner or later; but it was one involving the important principle whether this great staple of Pennsylvania was entitled to the same protection with other articles of domestic production.

Mr. B. said he would undertake to demonstrate that coal was an article as clearly embraced, both by the letter and the spirit of the compromise act of 1833, as the woollen manufactures of Connecticut, or any other domestic fabric. Here he would take occasion to make some general suggestions in relation to this act. He had stated, on a former occasion, that when this bill had passed he was in a foreign land. When he received the information of its passage, and that it had caused all the angry elements of political strife to subside, and produced peace and tranquillity at home, he hailed the news with more heartfelt joy than any other political event which he had ever heard. He did not then wait to examine its provisions. He was surrounded by persons who were predicting that our Union was on the point of dissolution. The tone of our public papers, as well as the debates in Congress at that period, had led those to believe, who did not understand the recuperative energies of our constitution, that we were on the very eve of separation. The passage of the compromise bill dissipated this illusion throughout Europe. Upon subsequent reflection, he could not say whether, balancing the difficulties which surrounded the question, he would or he would not have voted for this measure, had he then been a member of the Senate.

But this bill had received the sanction of all the competent authorities of the country. It was now the law of the land. It was the price which we had paid for domestic peace and tranquillity. It was the act which restored harmony to the Union. Under these circumstances, he could not consider it as a mere ordinary act of legislation. It is true we might repeal it; yet he thought there was a moral obligation imposed upon us to give it a fair trial. From the recent debates and proceedings in the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and from his own knowledge of the sentiments of the people of that State, he believed that, in expressing this opinion, he was speaking the voice of a large majority upon that subject, notwithstanding many might suppose that this act would not yield sufficient protection to some branches of our manufactures.

What was the nature of this compromise? He would state it briefly. It provided for a gradual reduction of the then existing duties on protected articles, until they should sink to twenty per cent., on the 30th June, 1842; and after that period this amount of protection would be secured to the agricultural, manufacturing, and mining productions of the country. The credits for duties, which were now extended to importers, would then be abolished, and they must be paid in ready money. This would be an important advantage to our domestic industry; as it was notorious that, at the present time, importers of foreign merchandise converted the credits which they received from the Government into so much active capital, to be employed in making further importations. Besides, the compromise law provides that, after June, 1842, the duties shall be assessed on the value of the goods at the port of entry in this country, and not, as at present, on their value at the foreign port from whence they are exported. It also enacts that a number of articles essential to our manufactures, and which cannot come into competition with any of them, shall then be admitted free of duty.

Mr. B. would feel more confidence that this duty of twenty per cent., with the other advantages secured to our domestic industry by this act, would be sufficient to sustain our manufactures after the year 1842, if it were not for one counteracting cause. He referred to the rapidly increasing amount of our paper currency. Should it become much more depreciated than it was at present, our manufactures would be in great danger. It was impossible that the manufactures of any country, where the currency was greatly depreciated, could sustain a competition with those of another country possessing any thing like equal advantages, where the currency was in a sound and healthy condition, without an amount of protection which the American people would never sanction. It was fortunate for us that, at the present moment, the currency of England was not in a better condition than our own. For his own part, he should give no vote at the present time which might tend to disturb this compromise. In this respect he would follow what he believed to be public opinion in the State which he had in part the honor to represent.

Was coal a protected article which had been embraced by the compromise act? The whole argument contained in the Senator's report from the Committee on Manufactures rests upon the principle that it was not. He alleges that the duty collected upon its importation had always been merely for the purpose of revenue; and he assumes the fact that although the tariff of May, 1824, had raised this duty from 5 to 6 cents per heaped bushel, there was no intention, by this increase, to afford protection to the domestic article. For this reason, he contends that it is not within the spirit and meaning of the compromise act; that it is not one of the great interests intended to be protected by it; and that the question is left as entirely open as if we were now, for the first time, about to determine whether we should impose a duty on the importation of foreign coal. This was the scope of the argument contained in the report.

Mr. B. must be permitted to say that the Senator had entirely mistaken the fact upon which his whole argument was founded. He believed he personally knew as much concerning the origin and progress of the tariff of 1824 as any man living, the Senator from Kentucky himself [Mr. CLAY] not excepted. "All which he saw, and part of which he was." The gentleman who reported and carried that measure through the House, the late Judge Tod, was his colleague from Pennsylvania, with whom, during the whole progress of the bill, he had been in constant and daily habits of intimacy. That gentleman would have been faithless to his high trust if, in the general protection afforded to all the great interests of the country by that bill, he had neglected an interest which was then attracting great attention in the State of Pennsylvania, and enlisting public feeling strongly in its favor. His memory was not justly liable to any such imputation. Mr. B. knew the fact.

It was true that in 1823, the year previous to the passage of this law, only six thousand tons of coal had been carried to market in Philadelphia; but the coal region had been explored, and it had been ascertained that a large portion of our mountainous territory was filled with this precious mineral. Without protection, there could not have been sufficient capital invested to extract it from the bowels of the earth, and transport it to market. A duty of six cents per bushel was therefore inserted in the original draught of the bill; and, according to his best recollection, no voice had been raised against this provision. What, then, had become of the cornerstone of the Senator's argument?

The Senator says this was a mere revenue duty. How had he attempted to prove his position? Only by contending that such ought to have been the case. On the same principle, and by arguments equally conclusive, he might withdraw the protection now afforded by our laws from any other article of domestic production. In the whole range of these articles, there was scarcely one better entitled to the fostering care of the Government, upon the acknowledged principles of the tariff policy, than the article of coal.

In selecting objects supereminently entitled to protection, two questions had always been asked: Were they necessities of life? And if so, was there a fair prospect that, by affording protection to them for a limited period, they would afterwards be able to protect themselves without burdening the community? Let us test the article of coal by these principles. It would be vain to waste arguments for the purpose of proving that coal is one of the necessities of life. Our forests are rapidly disappearing with the progress of improvement. This is the only article of fuel with which the Eastern cities and the Eastern portion of our Union can now be supplied. Without it, our people would be exposed to the greatest suffering, and many of our manufactories must cease to exist. Was it then wise, was it politic, to be dependent upon a foreign nation for such an article? If we were, a war with England would at once cut off our supply. Fuel is of such indispensable necessity to human existence, in our climate, that we must be greatly dependent upon any country from whence it is derived.

But again. Although the bounty of Providence had furnished us with coal in the greatest profusion, yet a certain fixed protection was required to bring the native article into common use. Those who framed the tariff of 1824 believed that, with such a protection for a few years, the supply could be rendered abundant, and that the people would enjoy this article at a moderate price. The rapid progress of the coal trade in Pennsylvania and abundantly justified their prudent foresight.

We then well knew that coal was to be found every where in abundance, throughout long and wide ranges of our mountains. But how were we to approach them? How were we to transport it to the commercial frontier of the country, where the chief demand for it existed? Only by penetrating these mountains by canals and railroads. The enterprise and the capital of the State and of our people, under the protection which Congress had afforded, have already, to a great extent, accomplished this purpose. The six thousand tons of 1823 had in 1836 increased to nearly seven hundred thousand tons. Was there any example on record of an interest which had grown so rapidly? He should not undertake to estimate the amount of capital which had been invested in this business. In the memorial which he had presented to the Senate some days since, it was stated to be not less than forty millions of dollars. He believed that this statement did not exceed the truth, and the amount was still rapidly increasing. At the present moment, some of our enterprising citizens were engaged in constructing a difficult and an expensive canal from Columbia, on the Susquehanna, to the tide waters of the Chesapeake, which would open a vast coal region, and furnish an immense additional supply of this necessary article. This canal alone would cost not less than two millions of dollars.

And yet this is the interest the protection of which the Senator from Connecticut thinks he may consider as a question entirely open. According to him, all the vast amount of capital expended upon it, under the faith of your laws, entitles it to no favorable consideration from Congress. Mr. B. said that with the very same or perhaps greater propriety, he might propose to violate the compromise, and reduce the duty on woollen or cotton goods, notwithstanding the amount which had been expended in the erection of woollen and cotton manufactories. He should be sorry to make any such proposition. The persons interested in the coal trade had only asked to remain on the same footing with the other great interests of the country. They know that before the year 1842 they will be able to protect themselves. Nay, more: they have expressed their entire willingness to share the same fate with other interests, in case Congress should deem it necessary to reduce the duties on protected articles generally to the standard of twenty per cent. more rapidly than the compromise act requires. Fair play is all they demand; and fair play, so far as he was concerned, they should have.

The Senator says that the coal trade of Pennsylvania is a monopoly in the hands of a few corporations; and, therefore, it is necessary, in order to keep the price within reasonable limit, that there should be foreign competition. But the gentleman had been as much mistaken in this as in other particulars. Mr. B. could not conceive how such an idea had suggested itself to the Senator, unless it might have been from the statement in the memorial to which he had referred, that this coal was brought to the Philadelphia market on three canals which belonged to incorporated companies; and hence, without other information, he should infer that all the coal lands were owned by these companies. It is true this would not be a very logical deduction; but he could conceive of no other reason for the Senator's statement that the coal trade was a monopoly.

What was the true statement of the case? The coal region in Pennsylvania, if not boundless, was sufficiently extensive to be far beyond the reach of monopoly. It had been the subject of immense speculation. It was now held by a very great number of proprietors, all of whom had it in their power to send this article to market. The supply was so bountiful as to place monopoly at defiance. The domestic competition, from the very nature of things, must reduce the price to the lowest point at which the article could be extracted from the bowels of the earth and transported to market, making a reasonable allowance for interest on the capital employed. The Legislature of Pennsylvania had fixed the tolls upon the canals and railroads which penetrate the coal region at reasonable rates; and the Senator himself might, if he thought proper, purchase coal land to almost any extent he pleased, and embark in this business, which he seems to consider so profitable. The value of the coal in the mines most accessible has not been estimated at more than from twenty-five to fifty cents per ton.

The canal between Columbia and the Chesapeake, to which Mr. B. had referred, would be completed in less than two years. This would open a more extensive region of coal lands upon the Susquehanna than all which had yet been brought into use in other parts of the State, and would greatly increase the domestic competition, and the consequent supply in the Eastern markets.

What, then, had raised the present clamor on the subject of coal? He would state the cause. The spring of 1836 was uncommonly backward. The canals continued to be frozen for several weeks later than usual; whilst the winter of that year commenced two weeks earlier. From four to six weeks' business was thus lost, averaging at the rate of 20,000 tons per week. Hence, although the quantity brought to market during the last year was about 140,000 tons more than that of the preceding year, yet it was less by at least 100,000 tons than what it would have been had not these adverse circumstances occurred. This has been the cause of the scarcity, and the consequent high price of the article. This price had been rendered still more extravagant by the opportunity for speculation which this state of things presented, and which had been eagerly embraced. But would it not be a miserable policy for statesmen to pursue, if they should, on account of this accidental deficiency in a particular year, rashly pass a general law to provide for a case which had never occurred before, and he should venture to predict would not occur again? During all the previous years, since this article had been brought into common use, with a single exception, large supplies had remained unsold at the close of the season. In the years 1834 and 1835, the price of coal in Philadelphia ranged between $4 75 and $6 per ton, according to the quality; and if it had now risen greatly beyond that price, the causes have been peculiar and transient. It was confidently expected, from the preparations already made, that more than 900,000 tons would be brought to market during the present year; and if the demand should justify it, this would be increased to 1,200,000 tons in the year 1838.

It would seem that this blow had been aimed exclusively at Pennsylvania; and thus it would be understood by her citizens, notwithstanding any disclaimer which might be made to the contrary. Let such an attempt proceed from what quarter it might, he should be unworthy of a seat there if he did not resist it with all his power. We had frequently been flattered by being told of the patriotism of Pennsylvania, and of her devotion to the Union; but when questions arose affecting her essential interests, we had too often discovered that these compliments were words, mere idle words. An attempt was now made to exclude her most important interest from the benefits of the compromise act, whilst all other domestic interests should remain protected; and we would now discover, from the vote on this amendment, who were her real and who were her professing friends. And here he would tender his thanks to the Committee on Finance, whose bill now before the Senate did not embrace a reduction or repeal of the duties on this article.

Mr. B. deplored the condition of the poor in our large cities, at this inclement season of the year. He sympathized with them in their sufferings, and would gladly afford them relief, if it were in his power. But would the amendment accomplish this object? Before it could possibly become a law, and any supply of foreign coal be received, even from Nova Scotia, our canals would be again open, domestic coal would pour in upon them, and the price would be reduced, never again, he trusted, to rise beyond its fair value. If he believed the present high price would continue, he might himself be strongly inclined to vote for a reduction of the duty.

Whilst from his heart he regretted the sufferings of the poor in our commercial cities, it was his duty not to forget the interests of the same class who are engaged in the interior in conducting the coal trade. The coal in the mine was not worth more than from twenty-five to fifty cents per ton. All the additional value of the article arose from the wages of labor, from the price of freight and commissions, and from the tolls upon our canals and railroads. The number of laborers employed in this business was very great, and increasing every year. Their rights ought to be protected, as well as those of other citizens. To throw them out of employment for the benefit of foreign labor would be both cruel and unjust.

There was another view of this subject, well worthy of our consideration. The coasting trade in coal, of which our countrymen enjoyed the monopoly, promised in a few years to become almost as great a nursery of seamen for our navy and commercial marine as the same trade now was in Great Britain. Already, during the last year, there had sailed from New York and Philadelphia five thousand vessels laden with this article, whose freight amounted to more than a million of dollars. This trade would soon be able to protect itself, unless you arrest its progress by rash and imprudent legislation. All we ask is, that you shall let us alone. In that event, you will protect your marine, and raise up sailors who will carry your flag in triumph over the world.

Mr. NILES said that he had but a word to say in reply to the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, having already detained the Senate longer than he intended. He did not perceive that the Senator had denied his facts or answered his arguments. He was mistaken in the assertion that the whole argument in the report of the Committee on Manufactures rested on the assumption that the duty on coal had not been imposed for the protection of the domestic coal trade; that point was only incidentally touched upon in the report, and formed no essential part of its argument. The basis of the argument in the report was, that the coal interest had no need of protection; that it was sufficiently protected by the nature of the business, and that it was unjust to impose a high rate of duty on one of the first necessities of life, for the purpose of protection.

Another important argument in the report was, that the coal trade was a monopoly in fact, and that it was unjust and dangerous to take away foreign competition from a business which was in the hands of a few large companies, and protected from all competition at home. The Senator had denied that the coal business is a monopoly, yet he had stated no facts to prove the assertion, unless it was the general one, that the coal region extended over a large district of country, and that it was impossible it could be monopolized by a few companies. But he (Mr. N.) did not say that the whole coal region was monopolized by a few companies, but only that the coal business was in the hands of a few wealthy corporations, who managed to control the supply and the price. The Senator had stated that these companies had expended thirty or forty millions of dollars in canals and railroads; which proved that, however extensive the coal district might be, the business could not be carried on without an outlay which could only be encountered by wealthy companies. Instead of proving that this business was not monopolized and controlled by a few corporations, the facts stated by the honorable Senator tended to show that it was; they were in confirmation of what he (Mr. N.) had maintained.

Mr. WEBSTER observed that it had been very truly stated that coal was, in this country, a necessary of life; and an argument had thence been drawn which was capable of producing a very erroneous impression in the community, to wit, that the interest of the poor required the interposition of Congress to remove the duty now levied on its importation. Mr. W. said that, considering what had been the former course of Congress on this subject, it was as clear a proposition as could be stated, that the interest of the poor required the continuance of the tax. If he were not convinced of this, he certainly should not be in favor of retaining it. Whether we looked to the debates of the convention, or to the earliest acts of the Federal Government, we should perceive that it was admitted to be proper and necessary to levy a duty on imported coal. One of the very first articles enumerated in the first revenue law was foreign coal. The protection of the domestic article was warmly advocated, at that time, by the Virginia delegation, as an obvious duty of the new Government; for, although all duties had had revenue as their main object, yet, ever since 1824, many of them had been continued for other purposes, and, among the rest, this duty on coal. Mr. W. had voted against retaining it; but, from that time to this, the duty had retained its place in the law, on a presumed pledge of protection to such of our own citizens as were engaged in furnishing coal from the mines of our own country. A large amount of capital had been invested in machinery and wages, and also in the construction of canals and railroads, leading from the mines towards places of deposit or shipment. An examination would show that the sum thus invested was not less than forty millions of dollars. What, then, was the proper course to be pursued, with a view to bring down the price of coal? American coal was not the only fuel of this kind in market. It stood alongside of the imported article, and there was a fair competition between them. Was there anything so effectual in reducing the price as a fair and free competition? Here the skill and industry of our own and of foreign nations competed for the market; and if any thing was likely to reduce the price of this necessary of life, and thus to benefit the poor, it was this. That taking off the duty would reduce the price was perfect nonsense. The effect would be just the reverse.

Mr. W. observed that it was this continual bringing forward of propositions to alter the most settled features of our policy which was, in practice, so injurious to American industry and enterprise. In illustration of this remark, Mr. W. observed that it was not long since a very curious debate had taken place in London, at a meeting of the creditors of the late Duke of York. Among other items of his property was a great coal mine in Nova Scotia. Certain trustees of the estate had been directed to work it. The question with the creditors was, whether the working of this mine should still be prosecuted, or what should be done with it. On inquiring of the trustees, those gentlemen stated that the mine was now not very productive, but that the policy of the American Government, in relations to duties, was vacillating and uncertain; that very soon the protecting duty on foreign coal would probably be taken off, and then they would have the entire American market. The proposition of the honorable Senator from Connecticut was calculated to hasten this state of things, and to justify the calculation of these British trustees. So it seemed that the motion of the creditors of the Duke of York was to aid the poor of the United States! The effect would be found directly the reverse. The repeal of the duty would be immediately followed by an increase of the price of the article.

The speech of the honorable Senator seemed to proceed on the assumption that Pennsylvania alone was to be affected by the measure proposed; but such was by no means the fact. It was very true that Pennsylvania was largely interested. She possessed extensive coal mines, and large amounts of capital had been invested by her citizens in this branch of enterprise. But the mountains of Maryland were as rich in bituminous coal as those of Pennsylvania were in the anthracite. Why had the Government subscribed so largely to aid in the construction of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal? Was it not expressly with a view to reaching the extensive coal beds near Cumberland? That canal, when completed, would be possessed of great facilities, and, in some respects, would have the advantage over the canals of Pennsylvania, because it would not be frozen so early in the season. Congress had done this partly with a view to securing their own supply. It was said, indeed, that the freight on coal was very large; but every body knew that, while our exports were cumbrous, coal was brought back partly as ballast. Vessels which took out cargoes of cotton brought coal, as they brought salt, on their return voyage, and at very low rates, so there was no great protection to our own miners in that respect.

Mr. W. said he objected to this breaking in upon a course of long-established and settled policy. This item of coal presented one of the clearest cases in the whole list of protected articles. It stood on as firm ground as woollens themselves, because the business of supplying it to the home market could not be carried on without great investment of capital. That investment had been actually made. The enterprise was in a course of successful operation, and the ultimate effect must be the supply of this important article of fuel at the cheapest practicable rate. The fears of monopoly were groundless; the canals were open to all—so was the mountain property; and it was abundant in Pennsylvania, in Virginia, and in the States on both sides of the great mountain range. And, if any reliance was to be placed on information received, the article could be furnished in abundance, with a reasonable profit, and at a cheap rate. Under these circumstances, would it be wise in Government to interfere? No complaint had been heard till within one season past; and because there was, at this time, a temporary pressure, was it worth while to raise the cry of the poor against the rich, and thus to destroy a branch of industry which was itself, and in its consequences, an invaluable boon to the poor? Was this a long-sighted policy? He thought not; and it was evident the Committee on Finance had thought not, for they had not inserted this item in the bill. Mr. W. said this protecting duty on coal stood upon a just foundation; it was subject to the gradual operation of the act of 1833; and ought not to be meddled with. This was no case in which the abuses of "regulators," "foresters," &c., called for the interposition of the law. The trade was free and open to all; coal lands were cheap, and in market every where, but it required the outlay of some capital to turn them to account. If this perpetual cry against every thing which required capital, and this crusade against all who possessed it, was to be indulged, how could the internal improvement of the country ever go on? The nation, while surrounded by all manner of natural advantages, must sit down content to be poor. Was it not manifest, where few were very rich, that any thing which carried on the work of supply must be accomplished by combination and the collection of capital? If the Government were resolved not to leave the enterprises of our citizens to the effect of fair competition, but would perpetually interpose, under the false notion of protecting the poor, great results could never be produced. The Pennsylvania canals have been decried as a monopoly. They were not a monopoly. Some of them belonged to the State, and, with a wise and liberal policy, she had thrown them open to all. Since the Government had, by its own acts, invited this investment, would they not consent to let well enough alone? He was not willing to turn accidents, or mere transient and temporary difficulties, into the grounds of continuous usage. He wished to see other avenues opened to the mountains as well as those of Pennsylvania. He held that the true interest of the community in relation to this supply of coal, and in consideration of the present state of things, was to let those who had embarked in the business go on, till competition between them should, by its natural operation, bring down the price to its minimum. To that point it was fast hastening; and when that had been reached, it would be time enough to consider whether any other and further legislation upon the subject was necessary. Mr. W. was opposed to the amendment.

Mr. NILES remarked that he was surprised to hear it asserted that the poor had no interest in this question; he thought they had a deep interest. [Here Mr. WENSEN made some explanation.] The gentleman says not much interest; that does not essentially vary the assertion. He thought they had an important interest—more than that of any other class. He (Mr. N.) had supposed that it was their true interest to have the price of fuel low; but it would seem that the honorable Senator thought that their interests would be promoted by keeping up the price. Are high prices of the necessities of life to benefit the poor? Mr. N. could not understand this, nor the reasoning by which such a proposition was sustained. It seemed that the poor have not been able to take this enlightened view of their own interests; and he wished to remind the honorable Senator that the attention of the Committee on Manufactures had been called to this subject by a memorial signed by one or two thousand of the Senator's own constituents, comprising, he presumed, a large portion of the laboring class and poor of Boston, who probably do not understand their own interest as well as their representative here, or they would not have petitioned for a repeal of the duty on coal. They doubtless supposed that their interest lay on the side of reduction; but it seems they were mistaken, and that their true interest consists in keeping up the duty. The Senator has informed us that the coal duty was proposed by a gentleman from Virginia, and was at first five cents per bushel. He is entirely mistaken in one of his facts, as he would have learned had he read the report, or attended to what he (Mr. N.) had stated; and whether he was equally accurate in his other fact, Mr. N. could not say. The coal duty, instead of having been at first five cents, was but two cents the bushel; the next year it was raised to three; afterwards to four and a half cents; then to five, and finally to six cents. It might be true that the duty on coal had been first proposed by a gentleman from Virginia; but, from whatever quarter it may have come, it was perfectly clear it was a duty for revenue only, down to the year 1824. It might be true, but it appeared a strange statement to him, that a duty for protection had originated from Virginia; he had always supposed that State had been decidedly opposed to the tariff principle, at all times and in all its forms.

Reduction of the Tariff.

[SENATE.]

Mr. N. said that he repudiated the doctrine that taxes on the necessities of life ever were, or ever could be, beneficial to the laboring classes or to the poor. On the contrary, he believed them to be unreasonable; and, when high, to be unjust and oppressive. This was the case of the present high duty on fuel, which, in its operation upon the poor in our cities, was oppressive, cruel, and inhuman. Taxes on necessities must raise the price of labor, as the laborer is worthy of his hire, and must at least have a living; if he is starved, he cannot work. The true policy of wise legislation is to lighten the burdens of labor, instead of taking from it the "bread it has earned." In all legislation affecting the great interests of the country, whether in Congress or the State Legislatures, there has been a tendency to favor capital rather than labor; to benefit the few rather than the many. It is not difficult to discover the causes of this. It is the few controlling capital who exercise an influence over both the national and State Legislatures. They have leisure, money, and intelligence, which, combined, enable them to exert an influence that they are not entitled to from their numbers. Capital is, in itself, an active element of political power, which is constantly exerting a potent influence over the legislation of the country, and is ever vigilant to obtain advantages. But labor, although the real source of wealth, and that which alone gives to capital its value, never seeks aid from legislation. Who ever knew the laboring portion of the community to come before Congress or the State Legislatures, asking for laws to be passed to benefit them? They are content with protection, and ask only for just and equal laws. In any question between capital and population, (Mr. N. said,) he should go for population. Not that he would injure capital, or impair any of the rights which naturally and properly belonged to it; but he would endeavor to counteract its constant efforts to endow itself with factitious advantages, through the aid of partial and unjust legislation.

Mr. N. said that these were his general views on this subject; yet he presumed that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts knew the interests of his constituents much better than he did, and he was therefore bound to believe that the poor and laboring classes of Boston were interested in keeping up the high rate of duty on coal, notwithstanding a large portion of them had petitioned for its reduction.

Mr. PRESTON heartily commended the zeal of the honorable Senator from Connecticut. His own feelings had been greatly touched, on taking his seat at this session, by the strong representations presented here of the condition of the poor in our great cities, many of whom, it was said, were actually perishing with cold. So strong was his sympathy with these unhappy sufferers, that, were his hands untied, he would move an amendment to the amendment, making foreign coal wholly free from duty. He had been much amused in observing the course of four different chairmen of committees in regard to the tariff. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, were all dissonant from each other on that subject. Yet the political horoscope had been gladdened all over by the announcement that the tariff party was down, and that a different party, advocating a different policy, had now come into power.

The great question with those of the South was, what is the future to be? And in pondering that question, was the present debate very well calculated to show that this Government in future was to be anti-tariff? Or did it not, on the contrary, very clearly show that each man would seek his own? The industry of Connecticut was diffused through all the branches of manufacture. Pennsylvania had a deep interest in coal. Virginia, too, had some special interest in the coal trade, yet was anti-tariff. Pennsylvania, though she had long been, and ever would be, thoroughly tariff, sustained the powers that were. The Senator from Virginia had risen, and warmly vindicated the course and character of the future President; and the Senator from Connecticut was a zealous friend of the administration, yet the latter now avowed himself to be thoroughly tariff at the very moment he was proclaiming that the party in the ascendant was anti-tariff in its policy. What Mr. P. had heard to-day went still farther to increase his distrust of the future as to this matter of the tariff. All the gentlemen were in favor of reducing the revenue, and they all agreed that half a dozen protected articles ought to be stricken out; but then the honorable Senator from Connecticut was altogether unwilling that this reduction should be made on the manufactures of Connecticut. He went for reducing the protection on the products of Pennsylvania. So the Senator from New York proposed a reduction on articles made in Massachusetts. The Senator from Virginia was willing it should be made any where, until you came to the tobacco of Virginia. Thus it appeared that the South must still pay black mail to some one or other of them for protection against the rest. They still shifted the burden upon each other, and passed the threat around—if you attack our interests, we will attack yours; if you go against the coal of Pennsylvania, we will tear down the woollens of Massachusetts; but if you touch the woollens, we will turn upon the tobacco. Thus it seemed to be a losing game all around; in the mean while, the South stood smiling by, hoping it might prove a Kilkenny fight. At length, these combatants take wit in their anger, and compromise the matter. They discover that it is very wrong to touch coal; it must not be done. And it is equally wrong to attack woollens; so that must not be done. And thus, by degrees, they all become friends, and leave the South to pay the piper.

Mr. P. regretted that the position in which he stood would not permit him to vote for the present amendment. The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania represented a great manufacturing interest. His was a great State, which, when united with Virginia, was good for a President. She had in turn put one out and kept another in. Now, Pennsylvania was irreclaimably tariff, and Virginia as decidedly anti-tariff. Accordingly, they had agreed to put in a President who should stand, like a great Colossus, with one foot on tariff Pennsylvania, and the other on anti-tariff Virginia, while the little States might crawl about betwixt his huge legs, and seek them out dishonorable graves. Mr. P. well knew that these States would not change their policy. The administration could not advance one inch towards a reform of the tariff, without touching the vital interests of Pennsylvania. But if Pennsylvania would stand out of the way, then indeed the new President was pledged for a final reformation in the system. The moment Mr. P. should have a satisfactory assurance that it was the general understanding that South Carolina was not bound by the compromise, he was then prepared to exert his strength to the very uttermost in battering down the protective policy, piece, by piece, till the whole system was laid prostrate.

Mr. WEBSTER now rose, and, not without some warmth of manner, observed that he should not have entered further into the present debate, if the member from Connecticut had not (as unfortunately he too often did) both misunderstood and misrepresented it. The member had represented him as saying the reverse of what he did say. That gentleman had quoted him as asserting that the poor had no interest in the reduction of the price of coal, whereas he had said exactly the reverse.

SENATE.]

Reduction of the Tariff.

The honorable member seemed to be in the habit of framing remarks for others, and then commenting upon them. Mr. W. had expressly declared that if he thought the interest of the poor would be promoted by reducing this tax, he would vote for its reduction; and that he was opposed to it only because he believed that the true interest of that class and of every other class in the community required that the Government should keep its hands off from the subject entirely. Mr. W. had again and again declared that he did not mean to advocate the cause of the rich in opposing this reduction, because he believed that keeping on the tax would eventually bring down the price of the article to the poor. The member did not meet this argument. He did not contradict it, but stalked around it while he talked about monopolies, and the influence of rich men on the legislation of Congress. Mr. W. did not doubt that the object at which the Senator meant to aim was to make coal cheap; and did he not understand that this too was the aim of Mr. W.? And how, then, could he impute to him the design to protect the capitalist, in derogation of the laborer; to advance wealth and disregard numbers? He hoped they should all in future endeavor to state each other's arguments with at least some degree of fairness. Coal was a necessary of life to all; to the poor as well as to the rich. The object to be attained was to get it as cheap as possible. The existing state of things had grown up under laws passed fifteen years ago; and the question was, whether, under that state of things, the proposition of the member from Connecticut would, in its practical result, lower the market price of this species of fuel. The member thought it would. Mr. W. thought otherwise, and had given reasons for this opinion, which he hoped were not altogether contemptible, and such as did not rightfully expose him to the charge of advocating the interests of wealth against labor. His argument had been briefly this: Here was a large capital actually invested in roads, canals, and machinery, the effect of which would, in a short time, make coal abundant, and thereby make it cheap; while, in the meanwhile, the foreign supply was not wholly excluded, and enough would be imported by competition to keep down the price. The honorable member thought that Congress, by taking off this tax, would give the exclusive power of keeping up the price to American producers. Mr. W. differed in opinion. He thought that, by taking off this tax, they would give that power to British producers, and make our citizens the victims of their extortions. Did not rich men as well as poor make use of coal as fuel? Was it not their interest to have fuel cheap as well as the interest of every body else? Ah, but the member was for the protection of labor. Very true. And Mr. W. insisted that the protective policy of the United States was aimed point blank at the protection of labor. Did not the poor of our cities warm themselves over coal fires? What glowing pictures, or rather what shivering pictures of suffering had been presented to the Senate in the eloquent descriptions (if he thought them eloquent) of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina. But was not the laboring class in our cities the very first who received the protection of this Government? The first demand of a constitution was for their protection. It had been the operatives spread along the Atlantic coast whose voices brought the constitution into being. It was not the voices of Hancock, of Adams, but of Paul Revier and his artisans, which most efficiently advocated the movement for independence. It was the pouring in of a flood of foreign manufactures that gave the first impulse toward the adoption of a constitution for our own protection; and had not the labor of our whole country been protected under it to this day? Had not the laboring classes of the United States their life, and breath, and being, under that instrument? Take off the protection which it extended to the hatters, and the shoemakers, and the whole class of mechanics who worked in leather, and see what would be the result. Go to the gentleman's own State, and take off the duty on tin ware, and he might possibly hear the tinkling of that argument. Three cents on every coffee pot! What would the member say to that?

But it became enlightened legislators to take a different view of this subject. The true way to protect the poor was to protect their labor. Give them work to protect their earnings; that was the way to benefit the poor. Our artisans, he repeated it, were the first to be protected by the constitution. The protection extended under our laws to capital was as nothing to that which was given to labor; and so it should be. Since, in the year 1824, I stood upon this ground, I have retained the same position, and there I mean to stand. The free labor of the United States deserves to be protected; and, so far as any efforts of mine can go, it shall be. The gentleman from Connecticut tells us that coal is a bounty of Providence; that our mountains are full of it; that we have only to take hold of what God has given us. Well, sir, I am for protecting the man who does take hold of it; who bores the rock; who penetrates the mountain; who excavates the mine, and, by his assiduous labor, puts us into the practical possession of this bounty of Providence. It is not wealth while it lies in the mountain; it is human labor which brings it out and makes it wealth. I am for protecting that poor laborer whose brawny arms thus enrich the State. I am for providing him with cheap fuel, that he may warm himself and his wife and children.

I observe that the very next item in the bill is one connected with the woollen factories in Connecticut. Will the honorable member go against all protecting principles? Will he talk to us on that item as he has done on this? Does not the poor man wear a cloth coat? Does he not want a great coat in cold weather? And is not that cloth taxed, and taxed for the benefit of Connecticut, and for the capitalists of Connecticut? Is cloth no necessary of life? Will the member draw us as fine a picture of the poor man shivering for want of a great coat of Connecticut cloth, as for want of a fire of Pennsylvania coal? Sir, the man who catches hold of a little idea here and a little idea there, and holds these out to us to show that a great line of national policy is unjust, takes a view, in my apprehension, too little comprehensive. We must not tax the fuel with which the poor man warms himself, because it is a necessary of life; and pray what will the honorable member do with bread? Is not that a necessary of life? and will any man here rise in his place, and move to take off the duty on wheat? Are not thousands of bushels imported from Europe? Does not the poor man pay the tax on it? And again I ask, will the honorable member bring in a bill to take off the duty on wheat? There is a duty on brown sugar. Will he move to repeal that? If he will comprehend all the items included under the same principle of economy, it will show at least some consistency. But to select this article of coal, and have us make it free because it is a necessary of life, while he advocates a tax on other things equally necessary, is to act with no consistency at all. I know very well that many of the citizens of Boston have applied to have this tax diminished; and if I thought it could with propriety be done, I would cheerfully do it. Some petitions, too, have been presented from one of our fishing towns; but they ought to remember that all bounties on the fisheries, as well as this duty on coal, rest upon one great basis of mutual concession for the protection of labor, and for the benefit especially of the operative classes of society. And whoever says that this is a system which goes for capital against the poor, misrepresents its advocates, and perverts the whole matter, from A to Z.

There are many other views which belong to the subject, but I will not now prosecute the argument. My object is to make coal cheap—permanently cheap; cheap to the poor man as well as the rich man; and to that end we shall arrive, if the laws are suffered to take their course. But to meddle with them, in the existing state of things, is the very worst thing that can be done either for poor or rich.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had not intended to add another word; indeed, after what had fallen from the Senator from Massachusetts, it would be labor lost. But he did not choose that his remarks should be misrepresented; that they would be misrepresented by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] he did not for a moment imagine. He had made no professions of being either a "high" or a "low" tariff man; nor had he said that he was "irreclaimably tariff."

[Mr. PRESTON explained. He had not stated that the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania had said so; that was merely the statement of Mr. P's own apprehension of the fact.]

The Senator had further said that Mr. B. was "permitted" to get up here and state the principles he held in relation to the tariff. Permitted! Permitted by whom?

[Mr. PRESTON again rose to explain. He had, as he supposed, fully explained in what sense he meant to be understood. There were certain questions on which those who belonged to the same political party were permitted, by a general understanding and concert of that party, to hold different and even opposite sentiments, without thereby forfeiting their connexion with the party, or good standing in it. He meant nothing more than this. He understood the tariff to present one of these open questions. The phrase was common in parliamentary usage, and well understood. He had used it in no personal or offensive sense.]

Mr. BUCHANAN resumed. He had not understood the honorable Senator to mean to apply it in a sense personally offensive. Yet it was very grating to the ear to hear the Senator from South Carolina rise in his place and declare that Senators from Virginia, New York, and Pennsylvania, were permitted to advocate contrary doctrines on the subject of the protective policy of the country. Mr. B. was "permitted" by no man to utter his sentiments on that floor. He asked the "permission" of no party or individual to advocate the interests of his State on the floor of the Senate. He knew of no such party trammels. The party to which he belonged were not so drilled. He pursued his own course, according to the dictates of his own judgment. The Senator from South Carolina occupied a singular position. He rose up and attacked the duty on imported coal, and persuaded all others to vote against it; and yet held it his duty, while looking one way, to row another. (Of what did the honorable Senator complain in this matter? Was there any attempt to disturb the compromise? Was this item of coal in the bill reported by the Committee on Finance? So far as that bill went, was it not a boon to the South? If Northern Senators chose to reduce the taxes, what cause of offence was this to gentlemen from the South? When the attempt should be made to violate the compromise, then it would be time enough for them to complain. What he had said was this: That, from the debates in the Legislature of Pennsylvania, they seemed disposed, in good faith, to try the effect of a compliance with the compromise of 1833. They would not, at all events, be the first to interfere with it. Many of them did believe that a duty of twenty per cent., when taken in connexion with cash payments and the system of valuation at our own ports, would, in practice, prove a sufficient protection to the manufacturing interest. However, he should not now launch into a tariff discussion. This was not the proper time or the fit occasion for doing so. When the time did arrive, he would, with all the frankness for which he hoped he had some credit with the Senate, state what were his views on that subject. He had intended to have added some other remarks, but it was growing late, and he would forbear.

Mr. PRESTON followed, in fuller explanation of what he had before said as to the tariff being an open question, and in regard to the obligation imposed by the compromise act.

Mr. NILES repelled the charge made against him by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WENSTER,] of having misrepresented him. He said that the honorable Senator had taken the liberty to charge him with having misstated his remarks; and he had made the charge in such a manner as to show that he considered he had been intentionally misrepresented. The gentleman had said that he (Mr. N.) was in the habit of misrepresenting the remarks of others. He would not stop to inquire whether a charge like this was parliamentary or decorous, as it was his intention to repel it as unjust and untrue. He wished that Senator to understand, once for all, that he (Mr. N.) was not in the habit of misstating or misrepresenting his remarks, or those of any other member of the body; neither had he been complained of in this respect by any one but the Senator himself. He was as liable to misunderstand what was said by others as any one; but he was incapable of intentionally misstating their remarks. It seemed that he misunderstood the Senator on this occasion, although he had listened very attentively to his remarks, and could not be justly charged even with inattention. He understood the Senator to say that the poor had no interest in this question; and when he rose to explain, he understood him to say that they had not much interest; but it appears he was mistaken in both instances. He did not perceive, however, that the mistake was of much consequence; for whether the Senator considered that the poor and laboring classes had much interest or no interest in the subject, his remarks went to prove that their interest consisted in maintaining the present high rate of duty. The gentleman and himself were directly opposed on this point, as he believed that the whole community were interested in the reduction of the duty on coal, and especially the laboring classes, who were less able to bear the burdens of the present exorbitant prices of fuel. If the poor have a deep interest in this question, how is their interest to be promoted by a tax of fifty per cent. on fuel? Is that calculated to bring down the price? Or does their interest consist in keeping up the price? He did not understand this matter, and could not learn from the Senator's remarks how he proposes to advance the interests of the poor.

If, as the Senator asserts, all our tariff laws have had a direct tendency to benefit labor, he rejoiced at it; but if such was the case, it did not prove that those laws had been passed for that purpose; and we all know that it was not those interested in labor who had petitioned for them; it was not from their influence, or a regard to their rights, that the tariff system had been adopted. No, sir; it was the interests of capitalists and capital which had originated and sustained the tariff system; and if labor had been benefited, it was only an incidental consequence. Who are they (said Mr. N.) that hang around the halls of legislation, seeking its aid, asking for special and partial laws? Who are they that apply for acts of incorporation, conferring special privileges, to favor particular interests—privileges calculated to give to capital artificial and factitious advantages? Are they not those who control capital?

By whose influence was it that a law was forced through Congress, soon after the close of the last war, refunding to importers the double duties which had been imposed to carry on the war, when it was well known that those duties had been charged upon the goods, and the whole amount, with large profits besides, had been received in their sales? Was it not the capitalists, the wealthy importers? This partial and unjust law of Congress legislated fortunes into the pockets of hundreds; he knew of some who had been made independent by it. Sir, (said Mr. N.,) it is in vain to deny that all the legislation of Congress, from the foundation of the Government to this day, which has affected the interests of the country, whether commercial or manufacturing, has been influenced by those who control the capital of the country.

Mr. N. said he did not claim to be the special advocate of the interests of the poor and the laboring class; he claimed no more sympathy with the poor than any other Senator felt or ought to feel, not excepting the Senator from Massachusetts. He had no motive, no design, in connecting himself with their interests. He had not dragged them into this debate; he had spoken of them no further than they were directly involved in the question. He had referred to facts, because they belonged to the subject. It was a truth which had not been and could not be controverted, that the coal duty, so far as it operated to keep up the price of fuel, bore with double severity upon the poor, who were compelled for three winters past to purchase fuel at a price one hundred per cent. higher than the wealthy citizens, who were able to lay in a supply in the summer, when the price was down.

Mr. N. said that, being up, he had a word to say to the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON.] That Senator, whose own situation in relation to the bill before the Senate appeared to be not a little embarrassing or perplexed, had assumed upon himself the task of assigning to several of the friends of the administration, including himself, their positions in relation to the tariff and the Executive; and having given each of us such a position as suited himself, he affects to discover something wonderfully strange and marvellous in the matter. The Senator said that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. BUCHANAN] was an open, ultra, uncompromising tariff man, and believed in the binding force of the compromise of 1833; that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. RIVES] was an avowed, irreclaimable anti-tariff man, willing to disregard the compromise; that the chairman of the Committee on Finance, [Mr. WRIGHT], who had reported the present bill, although representing a manufacturing State, and the one which contributed to fix on the country that act of abominations, the tariff of 1828, seemed willing to violate the compromise, and to open the tariff question, for the purpose, as he believed, to use it for political purposes; whilst the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, (Mr. N.,) whom the Senator declared to be an ardent supporter of the dominant party, was the friend of a moderate and judicious tariff, although prepared to vote for the present bill, which violated the compromise. The Senator professed not to understand how those who differed so much on the subject of the tariff could act in harmony and concert in support of the administration. He appeared to think that there was a great mystery in the matter, and that there must have been some understanding; and that the friends of the administration were permitted to disagree on that question, and each one to pursue a course the best calculated to aid the common cause. Mr. N. said that he thought the honorable Senator might have spared the expression of surprise at the want of harmony in the sentiments of the friends of the administration regarding the tariff; for, if he would look to his own side of the House, he would there find the disagreement greater and more inexplicable; he would discover not only ultra tariff men and ultra anti-tariff men belonging to the same party, but he would find them standing side by side in opposition to this bill, and speaking and voting against it; the ultra tariff men opposing the bill as being hostile to the manufacturing interests, and the ultra anti-tariff men—those who brought the Union into jeopardy by their violent opposition to that system—opposing the bill, on the ground that, in its consequences, it would be hostile to the anti-tariff States. In the eyes of the honorable Senator, it appeared to be very consistent for tariff and anti-tariff men to unite in opposing the administration, but very inconsistent for those who differ regarding the tariff to unite in its support.

The Senator says that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations is for adhering to the compromise, and therefore he [Mr. BUCHANAN] is an ultra tariff man; but the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] is himself for adhering to the compromise; and therefore, according to his own reasoning, he must also be an ultra tariff man. Or are we to understand that an adherence to the compromise proves one member to be an ultra tariff man, and another an ultra anti-tariff man? It was a strange kind of logic which, from the same premises, should lead to opposite conclusions. There must be a cabalistical potency in the compromise act, which can convert nullifying anti-tariffites into ultra tariff men.

Mr. N. said, in regard to what the Senator had said of himself and several of his friends, one of the gentlemen [Mr. BUCHANAN] had already put himself right; and the other two [Mr. RIVES and Mr. WRIGHT] were abundantly able to defend themselves, and had no occasion for his assistance; and in relation to himself, he had no particular reason to complain of the position which the Senator had assigned to him. He was a moderate tariff man, decidedly opposed to a high tariff, yet a firm friend of the policy of protecting all the important interests of the country, so far as it could be done by a wise and discreet discrimination in the adjustment of the duties which were required for the purposes of revenue. But what he did object to, and what had surprised him much, was, that he and his friends should have their positions assigned to them in regard to the tariff, by a gentleman who himself occupied so equivocal a position, and who evidently did not know what his own position was.

Mr. N. said he had listened with attention to the eloquent speech which the Senator had made on this bill the other day, and had anxiously sought to discover on which side of the question he was, and to what conclusion, after all his wandering, he would finally come; but he had been unable to satisfy himself. The Senator reminded him much of a blind man, who was feeling his way in the dark, and who, notwithstanding all his efforts, was unable to advance in any direction, but remained in a state of "progressive retrograde, or standing still." The Senator had labored hard to give a party character to this bill, and, in his eloquent appeals, appeared to be attempting to arouse the spirit of some dead party, the life of which had long since departed, leaving only the dead carcass and the name. In a speech on another subject, the Senator had informed us that he considered the constitution as long since dead, but remarked that he would endeavor to call up its ghost, with which he hoped to frighten the Senators into a respect for its principles. Mr. N. said that on the present occasion the Senator, by his eloquent incantations, appeared to him to be endeavoring to call forth the ghost of nullification to aid him in his perplexity; and, if he had succeeded, perhaps that frightful apparition might have scared him from the position he had taken—side by side with the ultra friends of the tariff. During this debate

[SENATE.]

(said Mr. N.) the honorable Senator, embarrassed and perplexed, and groping his way in the dark, has shifted, twisted, and turned, and wandered about from point to point, and from position to position. He had been at all points in the compass, and now seemed to be at a point not in the compass; and there he would leave him.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, here moved to adjourn. The motion was lost: Yeas 10, nays 33.

The question was then taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. NILES, for a gradual reduction of the duty on foreign coal, coal screenings, and coke, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Lyon, Niles, Page, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tipton, Walker—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Crittenden, Davis, Kent, Knight, Linn, McKean, Nicholas, Norvell, Parker, Prentiss, Robinson, Southard, Tallmadge, Wall, Webster, White, Wright—20.

Mr. KENT moved to strike out the article of fancy and other soaps, Windsor soap, and washball; but the amendment did not prevail.

Mr. NILES made a similar effort in regard to common tinned and japanned saddlery; but the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KNIGHT moved to strike out palm-leaf brooms. Here was an article made by the poor, almost exclusively; and if gentlemen wanted to benefit the poor, here was an opportunity.

Mr. PRESTON inquired what duty that article paid.

Mr. WRIGHT replied 15 per cent.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KNIGHT moved to strike out the article of button moulds. The motion was negatived: Ayes 16, noes 19.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved to strike out "all spirits, made of vinous materials, imported into the United States."

Mr. WRIGHT explained that the object of the committee had been to reduce the revenue as far as they could with safety; and, as this article bore a protecting duty of from 53 to 85 cents, they supposed it might be reduced one half, and still be sufficiently high to protect the domestic article made from grain; in which case, without injuring any one, the revenue might be reduced a half million of dollars. He demanded the yeas and nays; which being taken, stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Crittenden, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, White—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Wright—21.

Mr. KENT moved to strike out the article of wines.

After some remarks by Messrs. NORVELL and SOUTHARD, the question was taken by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Crittenden, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Morris, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Webster, White, Wright—26.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and all the amendments agreed to, with the exception of the following:

1. Duty on China and porcelain, earthen and stone ware.

Mr. WRIGHT suggested that, as the Senate was now very thin, although it might happen that a different vote would be obtained from what had been given in committee when the Senate was full, yet it would be better to adhere to the former vote, to avoid a reconsideration or other difficulty when the seats should be full again tomorrow.

To this it was replied, that one Senator [Mr. KNIGHT] had avowedly changed his vote, and another was present now who had not been in committee.

The question on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in the amendment which struck out these articles from the bill (thereby retaining the protecting duty upon them) was decided, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Crittenden, Davis, Hendricks, Kent, Linn, Nicholas, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, White—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Lyon, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Walker—19.

So China and earthenware were retained in the bill, as free of duty.

2. Blankets chiefly used among the Indians.

On this Mr. DAVIS demanded the yeas and nays. He objected to the amendment, as injurious to the interests of several manufactories of blankets established within the United States.

Mr. BENTON, Mr. LINN, and Mr. NORVELL, explained the great difference between Indian blankets and those of a domestic manufacture, and the very decided preference which the Indians expressed for the one over the other, and which precluded all competition from our factories, with what were usually known among them as Mackinac blankets. They were thick, finely woven, and of the finest wool, and impervious to the rain.

After some desultory conversation, the amendment was concurred in by the Senate: Yeas 23, nays 14.

So Indian blankets were inserted in the bill, as free of duty.

3. On striking out cigars. Amendment agreed to: Yeas 18, nays 16.

Mr. DAVIS renewed in the Senate the motion he had made in Committee of the Whole, to strike from the bill olive oil, and demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. WEBSTER advocated the amendment to take off the duty on this article. While it would afford but a very trifling relief in point of revenue, it went to interfere with the great whaling interest, which it was so important to cherish.

Mr. NORVELL also supported the motion; and the question being taken, it was carried, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Crittenden, Davis, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Linn, Nicholas, Norvell, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, White—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Lyon, Niles, Page, Parker, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Walker, Wall—17.

Mr. KENT moved to strike out sulphate of quinine and calomel, but the amendment was rejected; when the question was at length obtained, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for its third reading by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, White, Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Crittenden, Davis, Hendricks, Kent, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Wall—11.

And then the Senate adjourned.

SENATE.]

Land Laws and Decisions—Reduction of the Tariff.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25.

Mr. TALLMAGE presented the credentials of the Hon. SILAS WRIGHT, re-elected a Senator of the United States, from the State of New York, for six years from and after the 3d of March next.

LAND LAWS AND DECISIONS.

The following resolutions were offered by Mr. WEBSTER:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury cause to be prepared a collection of the instructions which have been issued from time to time, either by the Secretary of the Treasury or the Commissioner of the Land Office, excepting only such as refer exclusively, both in principle and application, to particular or individual cases, together with the official opinions of the Attorney General on questions arising under the land laws.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate cause the general public acts of Congress respecting the sale and disposition of the public lands, together with the instructions and opinions mentioned in the foregoing resolution, to be printed for the use of the Senate.

In offering these resolutions, Mr. WEBSTER said it was his object that the general acts, the instructions given under them, and the official opinions of the Attorney General on questions arising in the administration of these laws, should be collected and published, and made available to all. These instructions and opinions are in manuscript. They are only known at the Land Office, and may govern questions arising there without any means, on the part of those interested, to possess themselves fully of their character and contents. The laws, although contained in the two volumes commonly called the volumes of the Land Laws, were yet mixed up with such a mass of treaties, ordinances, and private acts, that it is not always easy to bring them together, or to get a connected view of their provisions.

The subject was getting to be very important. Interfering claims were constantly arising, especially under pre-emption acts; and it was understood that an appeal, in these cases, lay to the Commissioner or to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Land Office was thus becoming an important judicature; and it was essential that its course and its rules of proceeding should be known. Interesting rights were decided by it, and it became Congress to look into its proceedings, and to see that the laws were openly, fairly, and ably executed. The first step to reach this end was to make public, in some accessible form, the instructions and opinions under which the land officers acted. Any further provisions to insure a proper administration could then be adopted, which Congress should judge necessary, if, indeed, any should be thought necessary.

The resolutions were agreed to.

REDUCTION OF THE TARIFF.

The bill to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports (for reducing the duties) came up on its third reading and final passage.

Mr. SOUTHARD, having called for the yeas and nays on the question, proceeded at some length in opposition to the bill, and especially those portions of it which affected the arrangement of the compromise act of 1833, urging that the duty on sugar ought as much to be repealed as the duty on salt; that the bill would favor the rich far more than the poor; and that the faith of the country, as well as high individual interests, required that the provisions of the compromise tariff act (so called) of 1833 should not be violated.

Mr. CLAY addressed the Senate nearly as follows:

I wish, before the passage of this bill, to submit a few, and only a few, remarks to the Senate. It has been my desire to have taken a more active part than I have done in the discussions it has occasioned; but, feeling myself worn down by perpetual sitting, and being affected, besides, by the prevailing influenza, which disables me from attending at night, on account of the state of atmosphere produced by the multitude of lights in the chamber, I have been constrained to sit silent until now. The question I understand to be on the passage of the bill. In regard to many, and, indeed, to most of the articles it enumerates, I have no objection to the repeal of duties proposed; and had it contemplated the action of the Senate on those articles only, it would have received as hearty a concurrence from me as from any of its most zealous supporters. But, beside the items of this description, it has been deemed proper to insert various others, which cannot be touched without a violation of the compromise law of 1833. If the question turned on this bill alone, much as I regret the probability of its passage, my regret would be less but for the declarations which have been openly made by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, [Mr. WRIGHT,] who has told the Senate that he considers himself as much at liberty to look into the list of articles protected by a duty above 20 per cent. as among those below that rate, to find proper objects for the reduction of the revenue. He feels on this subject no restraint, no obligation whatever, from what is supposed to be the pledged faith of the country to the compromise act. A declaration like this, coming from so high a source, has great weight. But, whatever may be its intrinsic importance, it does not stand alone. Another Senator, the chairman of one of the standing committees of the Senate, whose absence at this moment I regret, because I wish to report his words correctly, a gentleman than whom none is more favorable to Southern interests, and whose sagacity and influence have produced a great effect within his own State, has avowed it as his settled aim, not suddenly, but gradually and surely, to eradicate every vestige of the protective system from our national code. From another quarter, (to which I am compelled to refer,) we find an analogous declaration—nay, one which goes still further; for the Senator proclaimed that he never had felt, does not now feel, and never will feel himself bound, in the slightest degree, by the act of 1833; but, on the contrary, is at entire and perfect liberty to reduce or augment the duties of our tariff, as he may judge expedient. When I see a measure like that before us, accompanied by such declarations from members of unbounded influence on this floor, I cannot doubt that it is the purpose of the administration to strike every vestige of the protective system from the statute book.

The present signal prosperity of our country is attributable to two causes: the success of the cotton interest at the South, and of manufactures in the Northern and Middle States. These interests are intimately blended. If the manufacturing interest at the North could be annihilated, there would be a destruction of the demand for three hundred and fifty thousand bales of the cotton of the South; and if that quantity were thrown upon the foreign market, the inevitable effect would be a ruinous reduction in the price of that staple. As to the policy which has produced this state of prosperity, my convictions have been long since formed, and still remain unshaken. When I look at the diversified interests and pursuits of our people, and the impossibility of the largest portion of them supplying themselves with foreign articles of manufacture, for want of those necessary exchanges which alone can bring them into the country, it has always appeared to me, and still does appear, necessary to protect the industry of our own country. But the best friends of the protective policy never intended that that policy should be perpetual, though the acts establishing it were unlimited in point of time. All who advocated the system went upon the ground that, after a certain time, (the precise period they did not attempt to fix,) our domestic manufactures would become so thoroughly fixed and permanently established that they would bear the competition of rival products from abroad.

When this administration came into power, it made warm professions of friendship to those who were the advocates of this policy; while, at the same time, it held out hopes to those on the other side of a complete subversion of the system. In regard to those professions, I do not wish, on so solemn an occasion as I apprehend this to be, to say a word which may injure the feelings of any gentleman. I must be permitted, however, to observe that I felt some distrust of their sincerity. I thought I saw a course marked out which must lead to the utter and entire destruction of the protective system. The great question so long agitated between different portions of the Union has not been whether, in laying a bill for revenue, the Government may not levy a duty which gives incidental protection to the industry of our own citizens, for this none will deny; but whether such protection is, in itself, a proper and legitimate object for which taxes may be laid. The friends of the protective policy have always maintained the latter proposition. But if the present bill is to pass, and the principles avowed by its advocates are to be carried out, the consequence will necessarily be, that the whole grounds on which the protective policy rests must be abandoned, and the country given over to that vacillating course which leaves to industry and enterprise nothing sure and stable—nothing on which the public can calculate with the least security.

Entertaining these views in regard to the administration, I saw, in 1832, that a great crisis had arisen. I saw, on one hand, that we were menaced with a speedy destruction of the entire protective system; while, on the other, I beheld one member of the confederacy then on the very verge of civil war, and felt persuaded that, if that war should once be commenced, all the other Southern States would infallibly be drawn into it. For the double purpose, then, of saving the protective policy from destruction, and saving this Union from the horrors of civil war, I deemed it necessary to bring forward that healing and tranquillizing measure, in regard to which there has been so much misconception and misstatement in the course of the present debate. That measure, whatever of value or of error it may possess, originated entirely with the individual who is now addressing the Senate. At the time of its conception he was not in the city, but in Philadelphia, whither he had retired for three weeks. While there, he was called upon by a committee of manufacturers, who disclosed to him their apprehensions of the imminent danger to which the tariff system was exposed, and who asked, with anxiety, what was to be done; whether no measure could be devised to save the manufacturing interests from the ruin with which they were threatened. It was to these individuals, and not to his friends in Congress, that he first applied to know whether, in their apprehension, a long lease of the protective policy, even though on a lower scale, would not be better than the uncertain state with regard to it in which they then were. To this question not a single man (and he put it to the most intelligent individuals) hesitated for a moment to reply in the affirmative. He afterwards conferred with other manufacturers, and found that they concurred in the same view. He then communicated with his friends in both Houses of Congress; and among these he found a diversity of sentiment. Some assented to the position; but, in a consultation which was held, it was not generally agreed to. Fortified, however, as he was by the opinions of practical manufacturers, and knowing that the great evil which they had most cause to dread was vacillation, and that what they most wanted was certainty and security, and finding so great a division of sentiment among his friends in Congress, he acted (as he always had done) on his own independent and settled conviction of what was right, and accordingly introduced the bill. I never (said Mr. C.) had any interview or conference with any Southern Senator prior to its introduction. Afterwards, indeed, those conversations took place, which naturally resulted from the effort on my part to bring other gentlemen to my way of thinking, and, on their part, to do the same with respect to me. The result was, that, in almost every instance, gentlemen from the South were induced to come up to the support of the measure, with but very slight variations. On one very important feature of the plan, however, (I refer to the home valuation as a standard of taxation, instead of the valuation in foreign ports,) I ascertained that there would be a determined opposition on the part of the South; and so unyielding did I apprehend that opposition to be, that I came to the House at eleven o'clock, under a full conviction that Southern gentlemen would not give way, and that the bill would, in consequence, be lost. But the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] who considered himself, on that occasion, as representing the great Southern interest, (for a Senator from Virginia had declared in committee that whatever would satisfy South Carolina would satisfy Virginia,) rose, in a manner very agreeable to me, and stated that he would waive his objection to the bill, accompanying that statement, however, with a declaration that he did not hold himself bound by the proposed compromise so as to preclude him from the free exercise of his judgment on a future occasion.

This (said Mr. C.) is the history of that bill. All that has been said about its having been concocted by the joint efforts of the Senator from South Carolina and myself is absolutely without one particle of truth. My first communication, as I have stated, was with the manufacturers; I then submitted the plan to the late Mr. Johnston, of Louisiana, and to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER.] The former, on consideration, gave his assent to it; the latter never did; but I was so supported by those who thought themselves well acquainted with the wishes and the interests of the manufacturers, that I felt it my duty to bring forward the measure, notwithstanding his dissatisfaction, openly expressed.

Such having been the origin of the bill, let me ask for a moment what were its provisions? The first and great purpose I proposed to myself (a purpose which must be effectually destroyed if the present bill shall become a law) was to withdraw the protection of the manufacturing industry of the country from all connexion with politics, and let it flourish unaffected by the vacillations of political contest. The bill then provided a biennial reduction, at the rate of 10 per cent., on all duties over 20 per cent., till the 1st of December, 1841; in June following, one half of the remaining excess of duties over 20 per cent., and soon after the residue. To this bill it was objected that the manufacturing interest could never live under it. But what has been the fact? The law has now been in operation for four years, and have you heard any complaints from that interest? Can any period of four years be pointed out in which it has enjoyed greater prosperity? But it was urged, that although the manufacturers might get along till 1842, yet, when that time should arrive, they could no longer exist under the remnant of protection which would then be left them; that is, with a duty of 20 per cent., the home valuation, and the cash payment. In reply to this I said then, and I say now, that no man can tell beforehand whether this protection will be found sufficient or not. For myself, I do believe that the leading manufacturing interests of the country can subsist under it; but, as I said then, I now say, that if it shall be found, on trial, that there are one or two particular branches which cannot proceed without a greater protection, they will but form an exception to the general rule; and I entertain no doubt, judging from the good disposition which has been manifested towards the plan, that the requisite protection may be so far extended by general consent as to cover these, without the general rule being thereby practically violated. At all events, I ask, is it not right at least to make the experiment?

It has been said that the compromise bill is not so binding in its authority but that you have power to touch it whenever circumstances shall appear to require its modification. And who denies this? It was admitted at the time that Congress might modify the bill if it became necessary. This none will deny. But do not the circumstances under which the bill was passed, do not the great and conflicting interests it was intended to settle, and, above all, do not the tranquillizing effects which have pervaded the country since its enactment, and the numerous important arrangements which have been entered into on the calculation of its continuance, although they may not stamp the act as inviolable without a breach of faith, yet combine to show that it would be exceedingly indiscreet in Congress to disturb an arrangement of this character? Have not other great interests of this Union been permanently compromised by acts which are equally within the power of Congress with the law of 1833? I allude, as one striking example, to the settlement of the much-agitated Missouri question, by which the latitude of 36 deg. 30 min. has been established as the extreme boundary for the existence of slavery within that State. Has not Congress a right to repeal that law? But what would those Southern gentlemen, who now so strenuously urge us to a violation of our implied faith in regard to the act of 1833, say to this House if it should attempt a measure like that? Should we not hear remonstrances, in the loudest tone and most earnest language, throughout the entire land? Yet, what propriety is there in lending ourselves to a violation of another compromise, while we hold fast to this, which is so dear to them?

It has been said, and with some emphasis, that the Senate has heard no pledges given by members on this side of the House. That is not exactly true; for several gentlemen have expressly said that they do feel themselves bound to observe the provisions of the compromise law. I, for one, have always felt myself held in honor, and by every principle which ought to regulate the conduct of a public man, to such an observance. But of what avail are individual pledges? And who is it that asks for them? Has there been any attempt on the part of the North to disturb this arrangement? None whatever. It is the party which calls thus for pledges that is the moving, the threatening, the acting party, (with the honorable exceptions of the two Senators from South Carolina, the two from Tennessee, and one of the Senators from Mississippi,) and who, while giving themselves no pledges at all, are proposing measures which, on the contrary, go to set aside the compromise entirely. The North had sat by in silent acquiescence. It has made no movement whatever in opposition to the law; while the opposite party, who alone threaten to disturb the compromise, call on us for pledges to its observance. But are there, in fact, no such pledges given? What is the language of the paper which has been read to us this morning, containing resolutions on this subject, passed by a vast majority of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts? And what is the language which has been forwarded to us from the great central State of Pennsylvania? Is not she, too, possessed with the conviction that the compromise is to be held sacred? And what is the language held by the less but still highly respectable State of Rhode Island? Is it not of the same tenor? Does it not express the same sentiment? If it could have been believed that a serious design was entertained of disturbing that arrangement at this session of Congress, you would have heard not only from these States, but from Ohio, from Kentucky, and from every other State of this Union at all interested in the protective policy. They all would have concurred in declaring, with one voice, that they held the act of 1833 as of binding authority, by general agreement. These are pledges worth infinitely more than any which could have been given by individuals on this floor. If you want further evidence of what has been the general understanding on this subject, look at the universal burst of acclamation which followed the passage of the act, wherever it was heard of. Look at the universal peace and quietness which has prevailed throughout the country on this subject ever since; look at the public official language of all the several branches of this Government—of the President, of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives. Do you find here no evidence that it has been the understanding of the American people that that law was to be respected, and was to be held inviolate? But what is the language we have heard on this floor during the present debate? Did not the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] distinctly say that he felt great respect for the compromise law, and should not be willing lightly to invade it? Yet, the other day, the same gentleman spoke of that law as no more than a common act of legislation, and as presenting no impediment whatever to the adoption of any part of the present bill. The chairman of the Committee on Finance, too, talked of its not being precisely a common act of legislation, yet he said, in substance, that it was to be respected, and not respected. He would respect it in so far as he liked, and he would disregard it whenever it suited his views of policy. I do not consider the act as possessing this flexible character; and although I should have no objection to a reduction of duty on one or two articles in the bill, which are now over 20 per cent., yet I cannot consent, for the sake of reaching this object, to hazard the whole arrangement.

The protective system is an entire system. All its parts are to be regarded in their mutual connexion and dependence. The moment you touch one of them, although with the utmost possible caution, there is no saying when or where you will stop. You begin, today, with the duty on salt and on spirits; but, as you have not adjusted the revenue question yet, to-morrow you may come to some other article on which it will be convenient to make a reduction; there then will be a change of the dramatis personæ; and thus you will be called upon, from time to time, to destroy the system piecemeal. Is this (said Mr. C.) the contemplated course of the new administration? If it is, then I tell all who are interested in the protective policy; I tell Louisiana, whose brown sugar is now so amply protected; I tell the woollen manufacturers of New Hampshire and Massachusetts; the cotton manufacturers of Connecticut and Rhode Island; and the iron-masters of Pennsylvania, that if they consent to set the example by repealing the duties on coal, on salt, or on spirits, they will expose themselves, sooner or later, to inevitable destruction. Whenever a majority can be found to accomplish the object, the process, which now affects others, will be made to reach their own most favored and cherished interests. I say to all, the system is one. It is a system of mutual reciprocity. It partakes, in its nature, of the genius of the Government under which it has grown up. As such it must be maintained, if maintained it is to be.

What would that portion of the Southern delegation who are in favor of this bill have thought, if the condition of the two interests concerned in the compromise were reversed? If, instead of acquiescing in the act of 1833, and conforming their arrangements to it; instead of confiding in the sacred character of that agreement, and proceeding in their business accordingly, the men of the North had come here, and pressed the Senate for the enactment of highly increased duties for protection? What would then have been heard in all parts of this city? How quickly should we have heard the resounding voices of the Southern delegation in ardent and loud remonstrance. Every where throughout the South, writers and orators would have been invoking the North to have respect to its engagements. Every where they would be declaiming against opening the wounds of the country afresh, and again plunging the nation into the danger of a civil war. And do not our friends from the South recollect that men have the same feelings in all parts of our country? Do they think they can pass a bill like this without wounding the sensibilities of that great interest which is concerned in the protective system? Is it right to do so, admitting that they possess an accidental majority? The Senator from Virginia consoled himself and his Southern friends by an assurance that the protective policy has not now an ascendancy in this nation. Where the ascendancy is in this ill-governed country, God only knows; but, be it where it may, I conjure gentlemen to let this subject alone. Is it not enough that they have tampered with the currency? Is our domestic industry also to be made the subject of experiment? Are men to go to bed at night, thriving laborers and prospering capitalists, and not know what they are to be when they awake in the morning? Are all the great interests of the country to be dragged into the service of mere party politics?

I adjure the Senate to rise to the greatness of American statesmen, and to atone, in some measure, for the injuries which have heretofore been inflicted on a bleeding country. There are some things too dear to be dragged into the vortex of political contest, and made the objects of party calculation. Let the protective policy remain where it has happily flourished for these four years past. There are yet but four years more, till we shall reach the expiration of the term limited by the compromise bill; and all parts of the country will acquiesce in its provisions, if they shall not now be rashly disturbed. But if this bill shall become a law, from that moment I shall hold myself absolved from all obligation to observe that compromise, and shall be ready, according as my sense of the public wishes shall point out my duty, to augment the rate of protection to any point which they may require. And, let me ask, are gentlemen quite sure that they shall retain, for years to come, the ascendancy which they imagine themselves now to enjoy against this policy? Where are the elements of that great mass which supported and enforced the American system? Scattered by party—broken into fragments. But it still exists in Pennsylvania, in the Western States, in New England, in New York itself; and it is not improbable that a new combination may arise, far stronger than any you have yet seen. Should the man whom you of the South have contributed to place at the head of the Government recommend in his next message to Congress a revival of the protective policy, would he not find majorities in both Houses to support him? Does any man doubt it? And are gentlemen of the South prepared to see their whole security suspended on the will of one man? I trust not.

But such is the state of my health, that I do not feel myself able to add much more. I shall conclude my remarks by a motion, the object of which is to test the opinion of this body as to the obligation of the compromise act of 1833. That motion will be to recommit this bill to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to strike from it all those articles on which there is now levied a duty of 20 per cent. or over. I do this for no purpose of embarrassment. It is not my habit to embarrass the proceedings of any legislative body. I have been both in the opposition and in the majority; and I do not approve and have never practised on the plan of wearying each other out by propositions merely intended to perplex and thwart the course of an opposing party. The manly, the becoming course is fairly to bring up mind to mind—patriotism on one side to patriotism on the other; and, when the intellectual struggle is over, to yield as promptly as we have contended vigorously. The majority must ever govern.

We have had a succession of motions in relation to particular articles comprised in this bill; and as it may often happen that a gentleman will feel himself bound to vote in relation to some particular interest in a manner different from those with whom he ordinarily acts, it has come to pass that the majorities on these different portions of the bill have considerably varied. I now wish to test the Senate in a group, so that there may be no escape on the ground of individual situation, in order that the country may know whether Congress regards its faith as pledged or not to an observance of the act of 1833. I am also moved by the consideration that there are one or two articles in this bill, with respect to which my own State feels a particular interest; an interest, however, which is not confined to her, but which extends to western New York, to western Pennsylvania, and all the grain-growing States west of the Alleghanies. The article to which I more particularly refer is, with the exception of cotton bagging, the only one which gives us any personal concern in the protective policy. I allude to foreign spirits, on which it is now proposed to reduce the duty to thirty-three and a third cents—a sum exceeding the average price of the American article which is the rival of the foreign. And under what circumstances is this reduction proposed? There is not now a civilized nation in the world whose system of duties does not amount to an absolute prohibition of the introduction of foreign liquors. Holland, liberal as her general policy is, has, for the purpose of protecting her own production, excluded all foreign liquors whatever. England excludes a large majority of them. France does the same thing; and yet, at this moment, while we are thus excluded from the markets of all the world, it is proposed to reduce the protecting duty of our own citizens on this article one half. And when and how is this to be done? Of all foreign nations, England and France will be most benefited by such a reduction. Now, it is well known that, at this moment, our tobacco interest has to struggle against the rigor of their laws, which, in effect, are almost exclusive of this American product. Yet, instead of leaving in the hands of our negotiators the article of brandies, to be balanced against that of tobacco, it is proposed, without any equivalent, to reduce the duty on foreign spirits from 66½ cents to 33½ cents.

I shall conclude by submitting the motion which I have already named; and when the Senate brings to remembrance the good feeling which the compromise has thus far produced, the tranquillity which an acquiescence in it by both sides has given to the whole country; and when they consider, especially, what our condition is in reference to another interest, very dear to the South, and on which the North is now assailing them, will they deem it wise to loose these bonds of peace, in order that the South may in turn assail the North? Is this right? Is it wise? Does it become us as American statesmen? Is it not better that we submit to that which, after all, is but a conjectural evil—I mean the inconveniences of an excessive revenue—than at once to break down all those barriers which have guarded us against evils more than imaginary? Shall we reopen again this source of eternal contention—the tariff question? I adjure gentlemen not to throw into the political caldron, already too likely to overflow, this new element of dispute and heart-burning. I trust that, under these considerations, the majority will concur in the motion now submitted, and that we shall thus have a bill containing those items only on which there is no dispute.

Reduction of the Tariff.

Mr. CLAY's motion to recommit the bill was negatived, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, McKean, Moore, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Wright—25.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. PRESTON and BLACK.

Mr. CALHOUN said he was fully apprized of the impatience of the Senate, and regretted to detain them at so late an hour; but he could not avoid saying a few words before the question should be put upon the passage of this bill. It now appears (said Mr. C.) that the administration party did not intend to respect the provisions of the compromise law. The people of the North seem, with but little exception, to be disposed to adhere to it. The question then arises, what course ought to be pursued by me, and by those who act with me, on this subject? The course, as I apprehend, is an obvious one. So far as the manufacturing interests are concerned, they concur in the arrangement; not a petition has been presented, not an effort has in any shape been made, to disturb it. The present is the first attempt which we have witnessed in any wise to interfere with it. And this attempt is not made by manufacturers, but by politicians; and by politicians from the manufacturing region of the Union. I regret exceedingly that the South, which has so deep a stake in the observance of the compromise, should give any countenance to such a design. This bill does not violate our share of that arrangement; not an article of it; the violation is of that part of the bargain which belongs to the North. It rests, therefore, with the Northern interest to say whether they will sustain their public men in such an attempt or not. I leave it to them to settle the question.

As to myself, I care not how many duties are taken off, provided it be done by gentlemen from that section of the Union; but, in the mean time, I shall do my duty. We of the South, it is always to be remembered, are the weaker interest; in this sort of contest it is we who are to be the sufferers. I therefore, for one, will not vote to disturb the compromise of 1833.

I am not, however, much surprised that the friends of the administration from the Southern States should be tempted to give their votes for this bill. We have long warred against the tariff; and when a proposition is made for repealing any portion of it, it is not wonderful that they should seize upon it with avidity. But let me tell them to beware. Will you, for the trifling benefit now held out to you, establish the principle that the act of 1833 is to be disregarded? You may now make a small reduction in violation of its provisions; but do you forget that, if that act remains inviolate, in 1842 six tenths of the whole protective duties will go off? Let me tell my Southern friends that I know the men with whom we have to deal. Abandon the compromise, and they will be among the first to resist all future reduction. We see the bait, but we do not perceive the hook that lies under it. We see a proposition to repeal the duty on salt; the motion, coming from a New York Senator, has the appearance of great magnanimity; but we did not remember, till we were reminded of it, that New York has laid a State tax of six cents a bushel on all salt ascending her canals. This salt duty is the bait; and for the sake of this small gain we are invited to disturb the arrangements of the compromise. But I can tell these fishers, they shall not catch me. I was caught once by following the same lead. I am not to be caught a second time. Wait till 1842, and you will find that which I say is true.

We have been told that the Senators in the opposition have given no pledges to observe the compromise law; but I ask, have either the chairman of the Committee on Finance, or other gentlemen of the same party, given any pledge that they will not violate that compromise when the year 1842 comes? They are now for reducing duties; but will they not then be for arresting the reduction provided by that act? Rely upon it, that is the very thing that they have in view. Their professed object is to get rid of the surplus, and they talk of making war upon the protective system, and even of its entire overthrow.

When men make professions, I am called upon to judge of their sincerity; I am in the habit of looking at the measures they pursue, and whether these measures are the fit and appropriate means toward the end they profess to have in view; and if I perceive that they are not, I hold it proper to be on my guard. I admit that these gentlemen are opposed to having a surplus in the Treasury, and I perceive that they have given a pledge to the South that they mean to make war upon the protective system. Such being their aim, what is the mode which they ought to take to attain it? Is not that mode obvious? Should they pick out the article of salt, to accelerate the reduction proposed by the compromise of 1833? It was one defect of that arrangement that the reduction proposed by it was to be too rapid towards the close, and too slow in the beginning. The obvious rule of proceeding would rather have been to make it swift at first, and slow afterwards. It would have been perfectly easy to say that the amount of all protective duties should have been reduced one fifth on the 1st of January, in every year, for the five years. That would have reduced a greater amount than the whole of what is proposed by this bill, and would have given a sure pledge to the South that gentlemen were sincere in their professions and promises. I should then have believed them. But when I see them proceed to select articles not made in the States where they have the majority, and see them opposing the reduction on articles made in States where they have not, I am naturally led to predict that, in 1842, they will come here and tell us that the reduction proposed by the compromise act is too rapid.

Our friends of the South (I speak now of such as are friends of the administration, who are all deeply interested in the articles of cotton and tobacco, and who, in relation to those articles, move all together, and must be sincere) found their course on the declaration of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] who comes forward here as the personal friend and political organ of the President elect. That Senator tells us that Mr. Van Buren is a "practical politician." And when he is asked what Mr. Van Buren proposes to do, his reply is, that he intends to reduce the tariff in such a manner as that it shall not be injurious to any great interest of the country. And what, I pray you, is this but the old song which has been sung in our ears a thousand times? It is neither more nor less than the old story of a "judicious tariff." The Senator from Kentucky, the Senator from Massachusetts, and all the friends of the protective policy, are for a tariff which shall not be injurious to any of the great interests of the country. They have never asked for anything else, if you take their account of it; and yet for this vague declaration, made at second-hand by the Senator from Virginia, we of the South are asked to surrender the immense advantages secured to us by the act of 1833—an act which explicitly provides that the duties shall come off at a certain specified rate until the whole are gone. Sir, this word practical is a very important word. We call a man a practical man who is a man of business, who is practical in his business. Mr. Van Buren is a politician. That is his business, and we are told that he is a practical politician. Now, sir, what sort of an animal is a practical politician? I will endeavor to describe it. It is a man who considers the terms justice, right, patriotism, &c., as all being so many abstractions, mere vague phrases, which it is very well to use, but which are to be shaped wholly by circumstances. It is a man who acts in each peculiar juncture as expediency may require; who studies the men about him with great care, with a view to a given end; who studies especially their assailable points, and who uses them as instruments for the accomplishment of his own purposes. If, for example, there be near him a Chief Magistrate distinguished by strong passions, a very determined will, and a good deal of personal vanity, he will touch that vanity, and, by skillfully playing upon it, will get hold of the mind and will of its possessor; and having once obtained a firm hold upon the Chief Magistrate, he will employ the power and influence of such an individual to an object eminently practical, viz: the attainment of his own political ends. The same thing he does with all other men around him. He uses them all, he turns them all to practical use, for he is himself "practical." He looks at particulars, and considers all propositions of a general nature as mere abstractions, with which a wise man will not too much concern himself. A practical politician judges of all actions by the event. If they are successful, he is in favor of them; if not, not. He adopts precisely the policy that was pursued in the Italian republics, and weighs every principle of morals and patriotism by the degree in which it will conduce to a certain given purpose which is to be gained. This is a practical politician. And now I will tell you how such a politician is likely to act in regard to the tariff question. He sees in the opening of that question again the means and prospect of a great increase of power; by rightly managing the different States, and displaying them off in a skillful manner against each other, and standing ready to make the most of every result, he will hope to get into his hands an entire control. By putting all things afloat, he calculates to bring them all under the Government to be managed; and this, let that management result as it may to them, must be promotive of his interest. Now, the South, as we all know, has an interest in the principles of free trade. What is likely to be her fate under such a system of things it is easy to tell. She brings him the least weight, and her interest will therefore be the soonest disposed of, in whatever way it can be made the most of.

Entertaining these views, I cannot consent to change my position. I am for adhering to the compromise. I think that the act holds out to us of the South great advantages, while, at the same time, the manufactures of the country flourish under it; (and whatever may have been said or thought, I am no enemy to the manufacturing interest, nor ever have been.) I think they will go through the reduction uninjured, provided we can but have a sound currency; for nothing can be so injurious to the protective principle as a currency that is unsound. We all desire that the manufacturers may get through the descent safely; and with a sound currency they may do it. Calculating on the same rate of importation as now exists, the amount of duties in 1842 will not exceed ten millions. I say, therefore, let the country remain quiet; disturb not this long-vexed question.

He who shall deliberately disturb it will give evidence either that he disregards the public interest, or that he misunderstands it. I regret that a single article has been inserted in this bill going to disturb the arrangements of the compromise. I am sorry that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] did not succeed in his motion to recommit the bill with instructions. Had these disputed articles been stricken from it, the bill would have passed the House of Representatives almost unanimously. It is now late in the session, and it is exceedingly doubtful whether the bill in its present shape can pass that body. I hope that some gentleman who voted with the majority will yet move a reconsideration, and let us have the bill in such a shape that we can pass it unanimously.

Mr. TIPTON said that as he expected, on the vote now about to be taken, to separate from most of the political friends with whom he was in the habit of acting, and with whom he still intended to act, whenever he could do so without injury to his own immediate constituents or to the country at large, he would claim the indulgence of the Senate while he briefly stated some of the reasons which would govern his vote on the present motion to recommit the bill.

He considered it wise in an American statesman, when legislating in regard to the duties to be imposed on foreign goods imported into this country, to have a regard not merely to the raising of revenue, but also to the protection of American industry. It was this opinion which had governed his course in regard to the famous compromise bill of 1833, as well as all other laws connected with the tariff, which had passed the Senate since he had had the honor of a seat on that floor, and which would continue to do so in future. He did not consider it wise or necessary to agitate the tariff question at the present short session of Congress. No such measure had been called for by any expression of the will of the people. It had been forced upon the consideration of the Senate by a spontaneous movement on the part of those who had brought it forward. Certain Senators had entertained the body by giving to the Senate a history of the passage of the tariff bill of 1828, particularly as connected with the business of President-making, and, in so doing, it appeared to him that some of those gentlemen did not look to the future. As for himself, he had had no concern in the passing of that law, nor was he willing again to move the tariff question, or to commence President-making at this time. The session was so far advanced that there did not remain time sufficient for that mature consideration which a subject of so much importance justly demanded. There were but five more business days now remaining, and he therefore thought it would be far better to postpone the subject to the next session of Congress.

But if the bill must pass, Mr. T. should vote for its recommitment, in order that it might be so amended as to continue the protection on China, porcelain, earthen and stone ware, also on foreign spirits and wines of every description, and on blankets and woollen goods. Should the bill become a law in its present shape, it would most injuriously affect a portion of his own constituents; and he felt it his duty to make an effort to have it amended. An opinion had long prevailed in this country, that the particular species of clay used in the manufacture of China and porcelain was nowhere to be found in North America; but recent examination had convinced those who were practically acquainted with the business, and therefore fully competent to judge, that clay of this description existed in the State of Indiana, and that of so superior a quality that ware might be manufactured from it equal to any now imported from England. An English gentleman, who had been extensively engaged in this manufacture in his own country, had recently made a large investment in the State of Indiana, and was about to commence the business on an extensive scale in that State. Besides this establishment, Mr. T. believed that there was but one other of the kind in the United States, and that was situated at Jersey city, immediately opposite New York. The establishment in Philadelphia was confined to China ware alone. At these two porcelain establishments, American citizens had invested their property, and were making laudable exertions to compete, in this branch of industry, with British skill and British capital; and it surely was incumbent upon a wise Government to extend to enterprising individuals of this description its protection and encouragement. The amount of the foreign article imported into this country during the last year was $1,697,682, on which a duty was paid of $339,536. This duty afforded a sufficient protection; but if it should be abolished, the most serious inconvenience and injury, and not improbably total ruin, would result to the establishments at Jersey city and in Indiana.

The same remarks would apply to the proposed reduction of the duty on blankets used in the Indian trade. The Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] who advocated this measure, did so on information furnished to him by John Jacob Astor, a merchant, long and extensively connected with the American Fur Company. It was very true that blankets suited to our trade with the Northwestern Indians had never been manufactured in the United States. Those referred to in Mr. Astor's letter, which had been read to the Senate, were manufactured in England especially for that trade. They had been introduced many years ago by the English Northwest or Hudson's Bay Company, through their trading posts on Hudson's bay, or by the way of Montreal and Mackinac, and distributed as presents from the British Government, or sold by the fur traders, to the Indians; from which circumstance they were familiarly known all over the Northwest by the name of Mackinac blankets. Every trader who went into the Indian country found it necessary, to satisfy the Indians, that the blankets he offered them were of this description. The confessedly superior quality of this species of blanket was owing, perhaps, chiefly to the superior quality of the wool which entered into the fabric, as well as to the closeness and solidity with which it was woven. Under the fostering care and wise and paternal policy of Great Britain toward all her manufactures, this branch of industry had attained a perfection with which we were at present unable to compete; but, that we might do so in future, Mr. T. was of opinion that it would be wisdom on our part to profit by the experience of our great rival, and to pursue the same course which had established her manufactures upon so firm and immoveable a basis.

A few years ago an effort had been made by a woolen manufacturer in Indiana to make this description of blanket, and a sample had been sent to one of our military posts, for presentation to the Indians. The article was well made, the web was close and compact, as much so perhaps as the British blanket; but the wool was not so fine, nor of so long a staple, as that of the Mackinac blanket; in consequence of which, the Indians despised and rejected them. Mr. T. thought it would be good policy in this Government to extend such protection to the article, that our farmers might be encouraged in improving the breed of sheep and the quality of our wool. Could this be supplied, we might then enter into successful competition for the Indian trade with our rivals abroad. The question, in fact, now presented, was one between the American Fur Company, at the head of which stood that worthy and most enterprising citizen, John Jacob Astor, and the British Hudson's Bay Company. It was very true that the American fur trader could not buy British blankets; and pay the duty, and yet sell at the same price, and make as large a profit on the article as the British trader. But it would in either case be a rare thing, indeed, to see a blanket sold low to an Indian, no matter at what price it had been bought. The price usually paid by the Indians amounted, in most cases, to the full value of his winter's hunt, and he remained more or less indebted to the traders when the hunt was over. The American Fur Company, as Mr. Astor informed the Senate in his letter, wielded a capital of a million of dollars. With a capital of this extent, that company could much better compete with its British rival than our infant manufacturers could possibly do with those of England. We should never forget the lesson taught us on this subject by the late war with Great Britain. Previous to that event, but little attention had been paid to the manufacture of woollen goods in the United States. And who that was acquainted in the least degree with the history of that contest could ever forget the sufferings of the soldiers of the left wing of the Northwest army, who operated on the Maumee river in the winter of 1812. The men were destitute of blankets not only, but of woollen clothes to shield them from the severity of that bitter season; and he would ask, was the country now any better provided? Should war be declared against Great Britain to-day, and the supply of British blankets of course cut off, were our factories in a condition to supply either our army or our Indians with blankets for the first winter's campaign? So indispensable was a good blanket in the eyes of an Indian, that it had been stated, in the letter read to the Senate, from Mr. Stewart, an intelligent and highly respectable member of the American Fur Company, that they would travel many hundreds of miles to procure one. It had been through British blankets, mainly, that the British talks had succeeded hitherto in wounding the Northwest Indians against us; and this would continue to be the case unless this Government should change its policy, and come into the Indian market with an article equal to that provided for them by him whom they called their British father. The Indians called the English blanket by a name which signified both coat and house. The question, therefore, now presented to the Senate was, whether, by keeping up, for the present, the high rate of duties on foreign blankets, Congress would enable our own citizens, who possessed but a small capital of but a few hundred dollars, to grow wool and manufacture that description of goods to supply our demand; or, by abolishing the duty, enable the American Fur Company, with its millions, to compete more successfully with the British Fur Company—thereby prostrating our own infant manufactures at the feet of British skill and British capital. To so fatal a policy he would never give his sanction.

He also objected to that provision of the bill which contemplated the reduction of the duty on foreign distilled spirits and on wines, and regretted that the motion of the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] to strike it out had not prevailed. These articles, as imported, competed with those of domestic manufacture. They were not necessities of life; they were mere luxuries, used chiefly by the rich, who were well able to pay a high price for them. If our wealthy citizens were determined to persevere in the use of them, let them do so; but let us not, to accommodate them, injure our own country. The same remarks would apply to embroidery, precious stones, perfumeries, and fancy and perfumed soaps, which it was proposed to relieve from duty. The high rates of duty which had been established for the purpose of paying the debts contracted by the revolutionary and the late war had left the country with an overflowing Treasury; and the Government had but one alternative—either to reduce these duties or to divide a surplus. Between these, he should choose a reduction; but he would have it to take place at the next session of Congress, when there would be more time to mature so important a measure. In reduction, however, he would not lose sight of sufficient protection to our infant manufactures. He should be in favor of first abolishing the duties on such articles as were of prime necessity with the poorer class of our population. Among these, salt held a prominent place, and it had been with great pleasure that he had voted to strike out the duty with which it was burdened. In that respect, the bill was highly acceptable to him.

Mr. T. concluded by observing that he should vote for the recommitment of the bill, with a view to having it amended in the manner he had now briefly explained. If he failed in that effort, he should then vote against the passage of the bill, in the hope that the subject would be resumed at the next session, when it might be arranged with that deliberation and calmness which its great importance so eminently demanded.

Mr. KNIGHT moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to strike out common salt, stone and porcelain ware, palm-leaf brooms, button moulds, tinned and japanned saddlery, and spirits made from vinous materials; which motion was negatived, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Knight, McKean, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster—20.

The bill was then passed, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Wright—27.

After transacting some other business,

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; after which,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 27.

Mr. KENT presented the credentials of the Hon. JOHN S. SPENCE, re-elected a United States Senator, by the Legislature of Maryland, for six years from and after the 3d of March next.

Mr. FULTON presented the credentials of the Hon. AMBROSE H. SEVIER, appointed a Senator, by the Governor of Arkansas, to fill the vacancy that will occur on the 4th of March next, for the term of six years.

Mr. WEBSTER expressed his doubts as to the constitutionality of making an appointment, no vacancy having occurred.

Mr. FULTON remarked that he and his colleague were aware of this difficulty; but he, (Mr. F.,) supposing that it would be a matter for the next Senate to act upon, presented the credentials under that impression.

The CHAIR said that it was not for the Senate to consider the qualifications of Senators elected to the next Congress. That Congress must act on this subject.

Mr. SEVIER said that he had very great doubt of the legality of the appointment, and did not at all doubt the patriotic motives which influenced the Senator from Massachusetts in expressing himself as he had done. Mr. S. cared not how the matter should be decided, one way or the other.

Mr. WEBSTER was sure that the honorable Senator was very indifferent as to how the question might be decided, and would give him credit as to his motives in intimating that there might be some irregularity in the proceeding.

Mr. SEVIER expressed himself quite satisfied with the course pursued by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts.

[No action was had on the subject.]

UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to take up the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the subject of our relations with Mexico.

Mr. WALKER hoped that the resolution submitted by him for the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas, more than two months ago, and which had been so often postponed to make way for other matters, would have the precedence.

After some remarks from Messrs. PRESTON, CALHOUN, BUCHANAN, and WALKER,

The CHAIR said that the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations had come up in its regular order, and must be first considered, unless postponed by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. PRESTON moved to postpone the resolution, for the purpose of taking up the resolution on the subject of the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas; which motion was negatived: Yeas 9, nays not counted.

Mr. CLAY rose and said that he supposed the only question which would be presented to the Senate would be upon the resolution. He had risen merely to say that he concurred with the other gentlemen who composed the committee, upon the subject under consideration. He agreed with the rest of his colleagues, that the controversy with Mexico had made out no case justifying a resort to war or for the issuing of reprisals; and he thought that renewed efforts should be made to obtain redress, before it should become necessary to declare war against Mexico to vindicate the honor and interests of the country. He felt himself bound to say, that whilst he concurred with the committee, which he believed was unanimous in adopting the resolution, he did not agree entirely with the body of the report. He thought the case was made out rather stronger against Mexico than the correspondence of the Government with that country justified. And he must say, in all candor and truth, that the departure of our representative from Mexico, under the circumstances, was harsh, abrupt, and unnecessary. A long letter had been addressed, in pursuance of instructions from the Department of State, by the American chargé d'affaires, to the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in Mexico, and which bore date some time in December last, and embraced a great variety of claims in respect to which information was to be procured, and procured, too, from remote parts of Mexico. Some delay, in consequence, took place, on the part of the Mexican minister, in sending his reply to our chargé d'affaires. When we came to examine the reply with candor and fairness, in respect to which some of our claims were admitted, and concerning others more information was required, the Senate would think, he presumed, that there had been more precipitation than was necessary, on the part of our minister. Well, it was in this state of things that he shortly after demanded his passports and came home.

Now, he (Mr. C.) thought that such were the circumstances then existing, that our chargé might have waited further instructions; and, if he had delayed his departure, the Mexican Government would probably have been able to furnish him with further information. He would have heard what they thought of the letter from our Secretary of State, relative to the final disposition of our Government in regard to the occupation of the Mexican territory near the Sabine, and which had occasioned so much unpleasantness. While up, Mr. C. would take the opportunity of saying that he did not concur in all the reasonings of the committee as to the publication of a pamphlet by Mr. Gorostiza, the Mexican envoy extraordinary. He, (Mr. C.,) however, would say that it was a great diplomatic irregularity; but he did not think it made out a case for war, or for any serious disturbance. It was not an unusual case. He recollected an instance which occurred while the American commissioners were at Ghent, in 1814, at a most critical state of the negotiation—when it hung, as it were, on a balance, and when it was extremely doubtful whether there would not be a rupture. Mr. C. here related that while he was at Ghent, treating with Lord Gambier and the other British commissioners, a publication from the United States, containing the correspondence between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, found its way there. Lord Gambier, having seen it, expressed his surprise to Mr. C. that his Government should have given publicity to this correspondence, and said he could not see how they could justify the act. The other commissioners were equally displeased at the occurrence. Mr. C. then explained to them that the course which had been adopted was one growing out of the peculiar structure of this Government, and which the people here demanded of their servants. He (Mr. C.) mentioned this to show that what Mr. Gorostiza had done was a thing not unexampled. It would be recollected that but the other day, Mr. Pageot, just before embarking for France from New York, published the letter of the Duc de Broglie. Mr. Pageot had since returned to this country, and been received frankly, and without any intimation of dissatisfaction on the part of our Government. And he (Mr. C.) had no more doubt of the fact than of his standing on that floor at that moment, that there had been information conveyed through some channel, official or unofficial, to France, that Mr. Pageot's return to the United States would be welcomed, without any displeasure being shown towards him in regard to his having published the letter of the Duc de Broglie; otherwise, the French Government would not have sent him to this country. Had Mr. Gorostiza not known the fact of this publication, he probably would not have pursued the example set him.

Mr. C. admitted that Mr. Gorostiza's conduct, in publishing the pamphlet he did, was decidedly wrong, and highly reprehensible; but, as he had before said, it was not, in his opinion, an offence justifying war. The pamphlet had produced no impression, and had done no mischief; and he thought the Secretary of State had acted highly wrong to make it a subject of communication to the Mexican Government. Whilst, however, Mr. C. disagreed with the committee as to some parts of the report, he concurred entirely with them in regard to the resolution, and hoped it would obtain the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had but a few remarks to make upon this subject, in addition to those contained in the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations. He felt gratified that the Senator from Kentucky had concurred with the other members of the committee in a large portion of their report, and that he would sustain the resolution with which it concluded. The justice of the Senator's remarks in regard to the withdrawal of Mr. Ellis from Mexico would be palpable, if no demand had ever been made upon the Mexican Government for the redress of our grievances previous to his letter of September, 1836, to Mr. Monasterio. But the case was far different. This demand was not then made for the first time. On the contrary, year after year, time after time, whenever we sustained injuries, we had asked for redress; but our reclamations, in almost every instance, had been evaded, and redress had been withheld. Mr. Ellis's letter of the 26th September was, therefore, but a mere summing up of our causes of complaint—an enumeration of demands which had been previously made against the Mexican Government. That Government ought to have been prepared to yield us prompt redress, or at least to have expressed their willingness to do so, as soon as they possibly could. He thought Mr. Ellis, in withdrawing from Mexico, had obeyed his instructions, both in the spirit and in the letter. His opinion upon this point was very decided. He should not have said another word upon the subject, but for a commentary on the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, which had appeared in a morning paper. This article proceeded from a source which seemed to render a passing notice of it necessary.

The President, in his message, after expressing his opinion of the aggravated wrongs which we had suffered from Mexico, in which the committee entirely concurred, recommended that an act should be passed authorizing reprisals, if, after making another demand, the Mexican Government should refuse to come to an amicable adjustment of the matters in controversy. He expressed his entire willingness, however, to co-operate with Congress in any other course which should be deemed honorable and proper. Under any circumstances, it was a matter of extreme delicacy for Congress to confer upon the Executive the power of making reprisals, upon a future contingency. He would not say that cases might not occur which would justify such a proceeding. These, if they should ever happen, would establish a rule for themselves. Unless an immediate and overruling necessity existed, which could brook no delay, it was always safer and more constitutional to take the opinion of Congress upon events after they had happened, than to intrust a power so important to the President alone.

The committee, under all the circumstances, did not believe that our existing relations with Mexico presented such a case. They knew that General Santa Anna, whose life had been justly forfeited, but which had been restored to him by the magnanimity of the Government of Texas, had recently arrived at Washington; that he had been sent home in a Government vessel of the United States; and that there was every reason to believe his arrival would be hailed by the Mexicans with joy, and that he would shortly be restored to the presidency of the Republic. Under such circumstances, it was but reasonable to hope that he would feel disposed to render to this country the justice which was our due; and that, therefore, it was neither expedient nor necessary, at the present moment, to authorize any decisive measure of a hostile character.

Again: The committee were unanimously of opinion that the 34th article of our treaty with Mexico required that a demand should be made, under its provisions, before resorting either to war or to reprisals. This article was one of a peculiar nature. It might have been impolitic to agree to it at first; but it was now a part of our treaty, and its requisitions must be held sacred. Here Mr. B. read from the article, as follows: "Thirdly. If (what indeed cannot be expected) any of the articles contained in the present treaty shall be violated or infringed in any manner whatever, it is stipulated that neither of the contracting parties will order or authorize any acts of reprisal, nor declare war against the other, on complaints of injuries or damages, until the said party considering itself offended shall first have presented to the other a statement of such injuries or damages, verified by competent proofs, and demanded justice and satisfaction, and the same shall have been either refused or unreasonably delayed."

This language was too plain to be misunderstood. It was true that it did not extend to direct insults to the national honor—such as violations of our flag, or opprobrious and injurious conduct towards our consuls. But the committee were very clear and unanimous in their opinion, that when pecuniary damages were sought by our citizens, for pecuniary injuries sustained, in violation of any article of the treaty, before we could redress those injuries by reprisals, a previous demand must be made, in pursuance of its provisions. On this point, there could scarcely be two opinions.

The treaty required something more than a mere presentation of the complaints of individuals to the Mexican Government, through the agency of our minister to Mexico. Our Government must be the judge, in the first instance, of the injuries requiring redress. We must decide this question ourselves. We are then bound to present a statement of such injuries and damages to the Mexican Government, verified by competent proofs. That such a demand under the treaty had never been made hitherto, must be apparent to all those who have read the correspondence. Throughout the whole of it, this article does not seem to have attracted any attention. That it was not within the contemplation of Mr. Forsyth, when he addressed the letter of instructions to Mr. Ellis of the 20th of July last, will appear conclusively from that letter itself. After enumerating our causes of complaint against the Mexican Government, he says: "Though the Department is not in possession of proof of all the circumstances of the wrongs done in the above cases, as represented by the aggrieved parties, yet the complaints are such as to entitle them to be listened to, and to justify a demand on the Mexican Government that they shall be promptly and properly examined, and that suitable redress shall be afforded."

The committee believed that it would require several months to enable the Department of State to collect the necessary proofs for the purpose of verifying each of the private claims of our citizens, and to make the demand according to the treaty. All the necessary forms can probably not be complied with until within two or three months of the meeting of the next Congress. They therefore thought it much better to wait this brief space, and refer the whole question to Congress, than to authorize the President immediately to issue letters of marque and reprisal, in case the answer of the Mexican Government should not prove satisfactory. After this demand shall have been made, and the answer of the Mexican Government received, the whole case will then be before Congress in a clear and distinct form. If that Government should refuse to do us justice, he could not doubt but that Congress would adopt prompt measures for vindicating the honor of the American flag and asserting the just rights of our injured fellow-citizens.

He should have been willing to use stronger language in the resolution appended to the report, but he believed it was now presented in the best form. Whilst negotiation continued, it was not politic to use the language of menace. Still he thought, from the report and the resolution, taken together, the Mexican Government could not fail to perceive the determination of that of the United States to enforce, in the most prompt and energetic manner, the redress of all our grievances.

When Mr. BUCHANAN concluded, the question was taken on agreeing to the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and decided as follows:

So it was

Resolved, unanimously, That the Senate concur in opinion with the President of the United States, that another demand ought to be made for the redress of our grievances from the Mexican Government, the mode and manner of which, under the 34th article of the treaty, so far as it may be applicable, are properly confided to his discretion. They cannot doubt, from the justice of our claims, that this demand will result in speedy redress; but should they be disappointed in this reasonable expectation, a state of things will then have occurred which will make it the imperative duty of Congress promptly to consider what further measures may be required by the honor of the nation and the rights of our injured fellow-citizens.

TEXAS.

Mr. WALKER moved the consideration of his resolution for the recognition of the independence of Texas.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to postpone its consideration to Friday; and a desultory conversation took place upon the motion, which was finally modified by inserting Wednesday next, and carried, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Davis, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Lyon, Morris, Niles, Page, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, Wright—25.

ALABAMA TWO PER CENT. FUND.

The bill to advance $1,000,000, on the two per cent. land fund, to the States of Alabama and Mississippi, respectively, being under consideration—

Mr. MOORE said he had presented a memorial from the Legislature of Alabama, in relation to a great work now in contemplation, to unite Mobile with the waters of the Tennessee. He regretted extremely that the Committee on Public Lands, to whom this memorial was referred, had overlooked the views of that Legislature entirely, and had reported the bill now before the Senate, without a due regard to their views. He had no objections that Mississippi should dispose of her two per cent. fund in any manner that she and her representatives might think proper; but he had objections to the refusal of the same privilege to the State of Alabama. He therefore moved to lay the bill on the table for the present, preferring to run the risk of being misrepresented as illiberal, to that of being unfaithful to the interests of his constituents.

On this motion Mr. WALKER asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were taken, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Hubbard, Knight, Linn, Moore, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, White—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buchanan, Crittenden, Fulton, Kent, King of Alabama, Lyon, Norvell, Parker, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Spence, Strange, Walker—16.

JOHN MCCARTNEY.

The bill for the relief of John McCartney coming up on its third reading,

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: The history of this claim may be gathered by attention to the memorial and reports that have been made by committees in both branches of the National Legislature. A sketch of the meritorious character of the claimant may also be obtained from some of the accompanying vouchers. And, sir, I would not feel that I had discharged my entire duty to this worthy old gentleman, were I to omit to add my testimony in favor of his entire honesty, integrity, and correct deportment, for about twenty-seven years, during which time I have known him intimately.

Mr. McCartney tells you in his memorial that he is one of that gallant band, of which but few now remain, who perilled every thing in the war of the Revolution for the liberty we now enjoy; and I can testify to one fact in support of this position also, for it is known to me that he is now enjoying the small pittance given for his valor and suffering, by a grateful country, in the way of a pension.

This claim was first presented in the House of Representatives, by me, in 1822 or 1823; it was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, at the head of which the distinguished member from Tennessee, General Cook, then presided as chairman, who, at that time, was a very influential member of the party called the radicals or reformers; and to those who are acquainted with the history of the times I need not say that that gentleman had acquired a reputation for thorough investigation into all claims, and a rigid watchfulness over the public treasure, which none except the Third Auditor, (Mr. Hagner,) who, I believe, is one among the best officers in the employ of the Government, ever enjoyed. It was proverbial then with that gentleman, as it is now with Mr. Hagner, that whenever any claim has passed the ordeal of his investigation, and was approved, no one dared to doubt its propriety and justice. That gentleman, at that time, when a large public debt was hanging over the Government, and economy the order of the day, made a favorable report in McCartney's case, accompanied by a bill for his relief, which passed the House of Representatives. I have felt it my duty to present the claim here every session since I have had the honor of a seat here. It has passed and repassed here, but has halted and been lost in the House for want of time or other considerations. Well, sir, having said thus much as regards the history of the claim, what are the grounds upon which it is attempted to be resisted?

Sir, according to the views given by the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. SWIFT,] and the views of others in opposition heretofore, it does appear to me that this opposition rests more upon mere legal technicalities than upon any broad principle of propriety, supported by equity and justice. It is alleged that the officer who took and carried away McCartney's property, although he acted in obedience to an order issued from the commanding general, was a trespasser, the order illegal, therefore void, and the officer liable. Now, sir, to say nothing as to the impracticability and impossibility of McCartney's obtaining redress in this way, when the officer was stationed at a garrison, out of the jurisdiction of the court, let us take for granted all this to be so, and suppose, for argument sake, that Mr. McCartney, instead of presenting his claim to Congress, had brought suit against Lieutenant Houston for this trespass, committed in obedience to the order issued by General Jackson, and suppose he had recovered damages against Houston, would not Houston have made an immediate application to Congress for indemnity? And would any Senator have hesitated for a moment as to the propriety of granting the indemnity? No, sir; no. If, then, we would have indemnified Houston, as I am fully persuaded every Senator would have done, where, then, is the impropriety of giving McCartney relief in the first instance?

Indemnity has been given for trespasses committed under somewhat similar circumstances in the Northwestern army. The statute book will prove this to be so. But, Mr. President, this officer acted merely as a ministerial agent. He had no discretionary powers; he did nothing more than he was commanded to do; and the Government is surely liable for the acts of its agent. It does not follow, that because the agent is liable the Government is not also liable. And, sir, in this case, the great principle of civil liberty requires that the agent and Government both should be liable. The rights of the citizen cannot be secure without this joint liability of both the Government and its agent. Let the principle be but once established that this Government may at will, by its agents, violate the property of the citizen, without being responsible for such violation, and there can be no security for private property. All that will be necessary to enforce a perfect despotism will be for the Government to employ agents destitute of property, and therefore irresponsible, and make any wanted attack upon the property of the citizen, the agent protecting himself behind his bankruptcy, which will be a complete shield, as far as he is concerned, and the citizen without redress. This joint responsibility, therefore, of both the agent and the Government, is the safeguard of the liberty of the American citizen, and I hope will not be lightly abandoned by an American Senate.

The question was then taken on the engrossment of the bill, and carried in the affirmative.

After going through several other bills;

On motion of Mr. EWING, of Ohio, it was

Resolved, That the Senate, during the remainder of the session, take a recess from three o'clock to half past four.

The Senate then broke up, to meet again at half past four.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate met, pursuant to adjournment; and, after taking up and considering several bills, proceeded to consider the bill to remunerate Captain Francis Allyn for conveying General Lafayette to the United States, in 1824.

This bill proposed to allow $4,000 to the captain and owners of the ship Cadmus, for bringing over General Lafayette to this country. The captain relinquished his place in the Havre line, and procured a ship on his own responsibility, and was at expenses in going to Paris, &c.

The bill was warmly opposed, as opprobrious in its character; it was making a commodity of the honor of having tendered to the General his passage. The owners had had loud praises at the time for their liberality, yet now came to Congress for pay.

It was contended, on the other hand, that this captain had been at large private expenses, for which he ought to be remunerated. It did not appear that the owners had ever requested any thing of the kind.

After a desultory debate,

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to lay the bill on the table, and called for the yeas and nays; which were taken, and stood: Yeas 22, nays 18.

So the bill was laid on the table, but afterwards reconsidered, and, after amendment, was agreed to, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

HALL'S RIFLE.

The bill to remunerate Captain John H. Hall, for improvements in firearms, being under consideration,

Mr. DAVIS desired to know the merits of the bill.

Mr. TIPTON said that he would state, in a few words, the reason which had influenced the Committee on Military Affairs to report this bill in favor of J. H. Hall. That individual was the inventor of the rifle commonly called Hall's rifle, which had been introduced and extensively used in the army of the United States. Before this description of arms had been put into the hands of our soldiers, they had undergone a rigid examination, and were proved by boards of officers at Fortress Monroe, Greenleaf's Point, and Harper's Ferry, and were approved by the able and experienced officer at the head of the ordnance department, (Colonel Bomford.) Reports had been made by these boards of officers, among whom were General Eustis, Colonel Crane, and Major Hickman; all of whom, as well as Colonel Bomford, concur in bearing testimony in favor of the rifle.

The board convened at Fortress Monroe stated that, in long ranges of —, although the rifles were fired with the usual charge of powder, viz: two eighths the weight of their bullet, and the muskets with the increased proportion of two fifths the weight of the ball, the relative execution was found to be in favor of Hall's rifle; that, after having undergone 8,710 discharges, the rifle appeared to be in a fit condition for service, considering the severe proof to which it had been subjected; that it was equal to the service of sixteen active campaigns; and that further proof was considered unnecessary, and was consequently discontinued.

Captain Hall was also the inventor of machinery for the identical construction of the different parts of firearms. He had accomplished what no other mechanic had been able to accomplish in this or any other country—the identical construction of firearms. This name had been given to the parts of firearms which were all perfectly equal, and made with such uniformity that, after dismounting any number of these guns, and mixing their different parts promiscuously together, we were able, from the confused mass of materials, to form a perfectly fitted arm with the utmost facility, and without regard to the particular stocks from which the mountings had been stripped. As evidence that Captain Hall had accomplished this most desirable object, he referred to a portion of the report of a board of practical armorers, appointed in 1827, to examine the rifle and machinery invented by him. They say:

"In making this examination, our attention was directed, in the first place, for several days, to viewing the operations of the numerous machines which were exhibited to us by the inventor, John H. Hall. Captain Hall has formed and adopted a system in the manufacture of small arms entirely novel, and which, no doubt, may be attended with the most beneficial results to the country, especially if carried into effect on a large scale.

"His machines for this purpose are of several distinct classes, and are used for cutting iron and steel, and for executing wood work, all of which are essentially different from each other, and differ materially from any other machines we have ever seen in any other establishment.

"Their general merits and demerits, when contrasted with the several machines hitherto in general use for the manufacture of small arms, will, perhaps, be better understood by pointing out the difference of the results produced by them, than by any very accurate description of the machines themselves.

"It is well known, we believe, that arms have never yet been made so exactly similar to each other, by any other process, as to require no marking of their several parts, and so that those parts, on being changed, would suit equally well when applied to every other arm, (of the same kind;) but the machines we have examined effect this with a certainty and precision we should not have believed till we witnessed their operation.

"To determine this point, and test their uniformity beyond all controversy, we requested Colonel Lee, acting superintendent of the United States armory at this place, to send to Hall's armory five boxes, containing 100 rifles manufactured by him in 1824, and which had been in the arsenal [United States arsenal] since that period. We then directed two of his workmen to strip off the work from the stocks of the whole hundred, and also to take to pieces the several parts of the receivers, so cal-

ed, and scattered them promiscuously over a long joiners' workbench. One hundred stocks were then brought from Hall's armory, which had been just finished, and on which no work or mounting had ever been put. The workmen then commenced putting the work taken from off the stocks brought from the United States arsenal on the 100 new stocks, the work having been repeatedly mixed and changed by us and the workmen also; all this was done in our presence, and the arms, as fast as they were put together, were handed to us and minutely examined. We were unable to discover any inaccuracy in any of their parts fitting each other, and we are fully persuaded that the parts fitted, after all the changes they must have undergone by the workmen, as well as those made designedly by us in the course of two or three days, with as much accuracy and correctness as they did when on the stocks to which they originally belonged.

"If the uniformity, therefore, in the component parts of small arms is an important desideratum, which, we presume, will not be doubted by any one the least conversant with the subject, it is, in our opinion, completely accomplished by the plan which Captain Hall has carried into effect. By no other process known to us (and we have seen most, if not all, that are in use in the United States) could arms be made so exactly alike as to interchange and require no marks on the different parts; and we very much doubt whether the best workmen that may be selected from any armory, with the aid of the best machines in use elsewhere, could, in a whole life, make a hundred rifles or muskets that would, after being promiscuously mixed together, fit each other with the exact nicety that is to be found in those manufactured by Captain Hall."

An attempt had been made by the Government of France, as early as 1722, to accomplish the identical construction of firearms; but it was abandoned, after expending a large amount in the experiment. The attempt was renewed in 1785; some hundreds of sets were made, but, on being subjected to proof, it was found that the arms were only similar, not identical, and the effort was again abandoned.

Mr. T. said that Captain Hall had spent the best part of a long life in the fabrication of arms, and machinery connected with their manufacture. He had obtained patents for his invention, according to law; and both his rifles and carbines, as well as the machinery for their identical construction, had been introduced and were extensively used in our armory. The bill which had been reported made an appropriation of $20,000, to be paid to Mr. Hall for the right of using his arms and machinery by the United States. A sum equal to this had been paid by an act of the last session to Captain Bell, of the ordnance, for his patent right to his new mode of pointing cannon; and he considered the improvements of Captain Hall as a much more important invention. There had not been a full meeting of the Military Committee when he was instructed to report the bill. The sum fixed on was the lowest proposed by any member present. He had no doubt that, if all the facts were understood by the Senate, a larger sum would be voted to Mr. Hall. The statements now on our table sustained this opinion. They could be read, if any Senator wished it. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BLACK] said there was some prejudice against Hall's rifle. Mr. T. said that was true. He had himself entertained strong prejudices until the arm had been distributed, and had come into actual service. He was convinced of its durability and usefulness. He had been, as it were, raised with a rifle in his hand; and, after a careful examination of the one now referred to, he was glad to state his confidence in its importance. The reports of the different boards of skilful officers would, he hoped, convince the Senate.

SENATE.]

Colonel Arbuckle—Inauguration of President of the United States, &amp;c.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] objected to the second section of the bill, on account of the provision it contained for the employment of Mr. Hall in our armory at Harper's Ferry. Mr. H. was now employed, he believed, under a regulation of the Department. His services had been found indispensable; he had been continually making improvements in the machinery used there. If the bill passed, the Executive was authorized to employ Mr. H. at a salary not exceeding $2,500, and his services could be dispensed with whenever the President or Congress thought proper. Mr. Hall had been offered double the amount proposed to be given him by the bill, by an agent of a foreign Government, for leave to use in that Government his patent right for his invention; but he had rejected the proposition, and chose to depend on the justice and liberality of his own Government.

Mr. T. said that it had been his duty, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, to bring this subject before the Senate. He had done so in a manner that would, he believed, give the members a proper understanding of the case. If, however, further information was called for, the rest of the report could be read. He felt, personally, no solicitude on the subject. He knew that other arms, more recently invented, had been presented at the War Department, and that a board had been directed to examine and prove them. But that board was unable to prosecute that duty satisfactorily during the cold weather of last month. A report need not be expected before we adjourn; and he would be content should the Senate postpone the decision of this case until the next session, or determine upon it at this time. He could not doubt that the inventor of this valuable and useful improvement would one day be amply compensated by our Government.

Mr. PRESTON also explained; but observed that various discoveries had been made since the rifle of Captain Hall, which might possibly supersede it. To settle this point, a series of experiments had been instituted, and were proceeding at this time. He doubted the propriety of passing the bill in the mean time. He admitted the merit of that part of Captain Hall's invention by which the various parts of a musket were made so uniformly that they might promiscuously be taken, and at once be put together, and would fit perfectly.

Mr. TIPTON further explained, and vindicated the provisions of the bill. It was not imperative, but only permitted the Executive to employ his services as long as they might be needed, at a salary not exceeding $2,500 a year.

Mr. LINN testified, from the result of experience on the Western frontier, to the merits of this rifle, of which he spoke in high terms.

Mr. BLACK moved to lay the bill on the table; which motion prevailed, and the bill was laid on the table accordingly.

COLONEL ARBUCKLE.

The bill for the relief of Colonel Matthew Arbuckle, of the United States army, having reference to certain land claims in Louisiana, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and explanations of it, involving various legal considerations, were given by Mr. SEVIER in its favor, and by Messrs. PRESTON, BLACK, BUCHANAN, and FULTON, in opposition.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the bill was amended by requiring Colonel Arbuckle to pay $1 25 per acre to the United States for the lands in question, on his acceptance of the bill: Ayes 16, noes 11.

A motion to lay the bill on the table was negatived, by yeas 16, nays 17. And having been further amended, it was lost, on the question of its engrossment, by yeas 16, nays 16.

After the consideration of several other bills,
The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 28.

INAUGURATION OF PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. presented a letter from the President elect of the United States, informing the Senate that he would be ready to take the usual oath of office on Saturday, March 4, at 12 o'clock, noon, at such place and in such manner as the Senate might designate.

Mr. GRUNDY offered a resolution for the appointment of a committee of arrangements, to make the requisite preparations for administering the oath to the President elect of the United States.

Mr. CLAY said he would like to inquire whether precedents had been examined on this subject. He was aware that the Senate had always had a peculiar agency in this business; but he was not aware why the Senate should act upon it any more than the House, or why it was not a joint concern. He remembered that, on the first election of Mr. Monroe, the committee of the Senate applied to him, as Speaker of the House, for the use of the chamber of the House; and he had told them that he would put the chamber in order for the use of the Senate, but the control of it he did not feel authorized to surrender. They wished also to bring in the fine red chairs of the Senate, but he told them it could not be done; the plain democratic chairs of the House were more becoming. The consequence was, that Mr. Monroe, instead of taking the oath within doors, took it outside, in the open air, in front of the Capitol. Mr. C. mentioned this for the purpose of making the inquiry, what was the practice, and on what it was founded, and why the Senate had the exclusive care of administering the oath.

Mr. GRUNDY said the committee had found no authority but several precedents, which were in strict accordance with the proposition now proposed to be made. He did not recollect any instance in which the House had participated in it; and, in fact, the House, as such, had no existence, their term having expired on the preceding day. The committee had examined three cases of more modern date, and had found nothing in opposition to the practice proposed. If the committee could not get into the House, they could go out of doors.

The resolution was adopted, and the Chair was authorized to appoint the above-named committee of three members.

THE DISTRIBUTION QUESTION.

The Senate, proceeded to the consideration of the fortification bill; and the question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, viz: to strike out the second section of the bill, which contains the provision for the distribution among the States of any surplus which may remain in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1838—

Mr. CALHOUN regretted that the committee had not made a written report on so important a recommendation.

Mr. WRIGHT explained that the second section of the bill being neither more nor less than the bill formerly introduced by the Senator from South Carolina himself, the case was fully understood by all the Senate, and needed no consumption of time to explain it. As to a written report, there had been no time to prepare one, even had the committee deemed it necessary.

Mr. CALHOUN reminded the Senate of the triumphant majority by which the deposite bill had been adopted at the last session; and as there had occurred nothing since then to change the principle of the measure in any respect, he was content to rest the present question on the principles then so unanswerably established, and the discussion by which they had been defended at the last session.

Distribution Question.

[SENATE.]

Mr. WRIGHT said that the principles which had governed his course last year did remain unchanged, and should govern it now. As to others, he presumed their votes last session had been governed mainly by the fact that a large surplus was actually in existence, and must be disposed of in some way. Such was not now the fact; and if any gentlemen should change their course, it was for them and not for Mr. W. to give the reasons for such change.

Mr. CLAY inquired whether it was the intention of the chairman of the Finance Committee and those with whom he acted, that if a surplus arose it was to be left in the hands of the deposite banks, where it drew an interest of two per cent., while in the hands of the States it would yield six. He was anxious to know what was to be the policy of the administration in regard to this matter.

[Mr. WRIGHT interposed, to say that its policy would be to have no surplus.]

Then (replied Mr. C.) take the land bill, like an honest man, and there is a perfect remedy for the difficulty. Mr. C. then adverted to the remarks made by Mr. RIVES, in the discussion of the expunging resolution, as to the democratic character of the Senate, and appealed to the body now to show whether it would justify this character by opposing a measure coming to it from the confessedly democratic branch of the Government. He called upon all who had voted for the distribution bill of the last session to rally round their own principles, and oppose the striking out. But, by way of compromise, he proposed the adoption of the land bill, &c. He concluded by demanding the yeas and nays.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he was one of those who intended to vote against the amendment to the fortification bill which had been adopted in the House, directing that the surplus revenue exceeding five millions of dollars which might remain in the Treasury on the first day of January next, should be deposited with the States, under the provisions of the deposite act which had passed at the last session of Congress. As he had advocated the passage of that act, it became necessary that he should make a few observations explanatory of the course which he purposed to pursue on the present occasion.

Mr. B. stated that there was but little analogy between these two measures, unless it might be that they were both called deposite bills. This was the chief point of resemblance. The principles upon which the present proposition was now advocated were entirely different from those which had been assumed by the friends of the deposite bill of the last session. And here he must be permitted to express his regret that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] seemed to have abandoned his bill to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the States. For his own part, he infinitely preferred that measure to the one now before the Senate.

What were the principles (said Mr. B.) upon which the deposite bill of the last session rested? There was then a vast sum of public money, beyond the wants of the Government, in the deposite banks, whilst an absolute certainty existed that at the end of the year this surplus would be greatly increased. At that time, these banks were not bound to pay any interest on their depositees. These accumulations of public money were loaned out by them to individuals, whilst all the profits arising from such loans went into the pockets of their stockholders. A wild spirit of speculation was thus fostered, which threatened to destroy the regular business of the country, and to convert our public domain into paper money. The enormous evils of this system were palpable. The banks were then inflicting deep injuries upon the country, by the manner in which they used this money; and it was every day becoming more and more uncertain whether they would be able to meet the demands of the Government, when called upon for this purpose.

Under these peculiar circumstances, what was to be done? We were compelled to choose between two great evils. We must either have suffered the money to remain in the banks, and subjected the country to the consequences; or it became our duty to deposite it with the States, and give them the advantage of using it until it should be required by the wants of the Government. No other practical alternative could be presented. For my own part, I felt no hesitation in making my choice.

At that time it seemed to have been admitted by every Senator, that, as a general system, it would be extremely dangerous to the country annually to distribute the surplus in the Treasury among the States. No voice was raised in favor of such a principle. It was universally condemned. As a plan of general policy, a worse one can never be devised. If pursued, it must, in a very few years, destroy the character of this Government. Let it once be established, and all men can see the inevitable consequences. Every Senator and every Representative will then come to Congress with strong feelings directly hostile to the best interests of the Federal Government. Instead of having our eyes exclusively fixed upon those great national objects intrusted to our care by the constitution, we would be more or less than men if we could banish from our minds the consideration that the full amount of every appropriation for such purposes would be so much deducted from the surplus to which our respective States would be entitled at the close of the year. The question will then be not merely what appropriations are necessary to promote the general interest of the country, but blended with this question will be another—how much can be withheld from those purposes, and to what extent can the dividend of our own States be thus increased? For example: a proposed fortification will cost half a million; in voting for or against it, the consideration will necessarily obtrude itself, would it not be better, would it not be productive of more good, to distribute this sum among our own States? In peace, it is our duty to prepare for war. With this view, a proposition is made to increase our navy. This may be necessary to protect our commerce, and to present such an array of our power to foreign nations, that they will not dare to injure our citizens, or to insult our flag upon the ocean. In voting upon such a proposition, how easily may we delude ourselves with the idea that there is no danger, and that the country will derive more real benefit from expending the necessary amount upon railroads and canals in the respective States. Every dollar which can be withdrawn from the General Government is a dollar given to the States. Establish this policy, and you set up a principle, to use a Senatorial word, antagonistical to the constitutional and efficient exercise of the powers of the Federal Government. You will thus paralyze the energies of this Government, and reduce it to almost the same feeble condition in which it was placed under the old articles of confederation. Can the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] deny, has he denied, that this would be the effect of such a system? Under its operation, will it not always be a question how much will this or will that appropriation for national purposes deduct from State dividends? You thus present to the very agents selected to administer the Federal Government the strongest temptations to violate their duty.

The deposite bill of the last session was advocated upon the principle that it was to be a single operation, and to be justified alone upon the extreme necessity which then existed. What is now the state of the case? This amendment has been ingrafted by the House upon an ordinary appropriation bill. From the very nature of such bills, they ought to be, and generally are, confined to grants of money for the execution of existing laws, and for carrying into effect the settled policy of the country. To unite this deposite section, in the same bill, with the appropriations necessary to complete our system of fortifications, is to declare to the world that it has become a part of our settled policy. Does any necessity now exist for the adoption of such a measure? Are we now placed in the same situation in which we were at the last session of Congress? Will there be any surplus in the Treasury on the 1st of January next, beyond five millions? Has this fact been ascertained? Shadows, clouds, and darkness, rest upon the question. Whether there will be or not is uncertain, contingent, dependent upon the action of Congress, and upon the speculations in the public lands. My own impression is, that, if there should be a surplus, it will be comparatively small; unless this very proposition for its deposite with the States should be the means of creating it, by defeating the passage of important bills for the defence and benefit of the country. What necessity now exists for the adoption of this measure? If there shall be a surplus when Congress meet on the 1st of December next, it will then be time enough to provide for its disposition. One great objection to this measure is, that it will make the extreme medicine of the constitution its daily bread. It has already become so familiar to us that Senators are now willing to insert it in an ordinary appropriation bill, and thus make it the settled policy of the country. It should be the exception, not the rule. Above all, it is a remedy to which we ought never to resort until we know that a surplus exists, or are absolutely certain that it will exist. Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof.

SENATE.]

Distribution Question.

[FEB. 28, 1837.]

I shall not now speak of the unhappy influence which this system of distribution would exert upon the State Governments themselves; because I have not risen to make a general speech, but merely to place my own conduct, in relation to this subject, in its true light.

And now, sir, permit me again to express my sorrow that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] had not been willing to postpone this question, and to wait until the next session. Then his land bill might be presented to Congress under brighter auspices than it has ever been heretofore. If a choice is to be made between that bill and a system of distributing surpluses, it will not be difficult for me to decide. There is, in my judgment, no comparison between the two. If you grant the proceeds of the public lands to the States as their right, this is one source of revenue which you withdraw from the control of Congress. Our system of policy would thus be rendered fixed and stable. We could then accommodate our duties on imports to the necessary expenses of the Government, and our tariff would not be subject to those perpetual changes which must ever exist whilst we derive a portion of our revenue from such a fluctuating source as that of the public lands. The States would receive this money, not as a matter of bounty, but of right. They would, therefore, not feel dependent for it upon the General Government. Nearly all the evils attendant upon a distribution of the surpluses would thus forever be avoided; and Congress would then be compelled to raise the revenue necessary to defray the expenses of the Government from the customs and from other taxes. This would introduce a wholesome spirit of economy into our councils, without making it the interest of the Senators and Representatives in Congress to array themselves against appropriations for objects of a national character. I should therefore have rejoiced, had the Senator from Kentucky adhered to his land bill and opposed this amendment, which, if it should prevail, must destroy that measure. For my own part, I shall vote to strike this amendment from the bill, without the slightest apprehension of subjecting myself to the charge of inconsistency.

Mr. RIVES explained, in reply to Mr. CLAY, that his remarks, as to the aristocratic character of the Senate, had no reference to the individual character of its members, but to the constitution of the entire body, in its collective capacity, as farthest removed from an expression of the popular will.

As to the appeal of the Senator to the majority of the Senate to exhibit a deference to the will of the people, as expressed by a vote of the other House, it would have had more weight had it been seconded by the example of the Senator himself. Mr. R. then alluded to the stern rejection of the three million appropriation for fortifications, which had been proposed by the House of Representatives on a former memorable occasion. The Senate was now committed before the world to a system of policy which was opposed to the accumulation of surplus revenue; and there was not the slightest inconsistency if, in adherence to that policy, it rejected a measure which was founded on a policy directly the reverse of this. Mr. R. adverted, as Mr. BUCHANAN had done, to the different circumstances in which the Senate had been placed at the last session, as a sufficient reason why he had advocated a similar measure, at that time, to that which he should now oppose.

Mr. PRESTON was understood to say that the Senate had been regarded and represented as an aristocratic body while it was opposed to the administration, but ceased to be so when it changed to the opposite side in politics. He regretted that it was so officially termed at the time, and hoped hereafter that it would not be so referred to at all.

The observations (he said) of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] were sound and judicious, so far as they related to facts; but Mr. P. had come to a different conclusion from that which Mr. R. had drawn from the premises. In the case of very large appropriations, from an abundance of money, the question readily occurred whether it might not be saved for their constituents; thus avoiding a wasteful and inexpedient expenditure. Could not the money be saved now for their constituents or for the States. The tendency of a surplus was to make members of Congress negligent and prodigal, which could only be corrected by their being stimulated to the very inquiry which the gentleman from Virginia had suggested. Could it be expected that such an inquiry would make them niggardly and parsimonious? The annual expenditure was now $30,000,000 or $40,000,000. Could there be any danger, in this state of things, of too great economy? We were about to be overwhelmed by a surplus, which we might get clear of either by distributing among the States, or by swelling the expenditures so as to absorb it. If one or the other of these measures must be perpetual, Mr. P. would prefer habitual distribution to habitual exorbitant expenditure. The former, though an evil, had attached to it a degree of justice. The latter, a continued wasteful and prodigal expenditure, was the worst possible condition of the body politic. But Mr. P. was opposed in both forms to this eternal sweat, and would much rather reduce it at once by the lancet.

Mr. P. said he regarded the measure of distribution as having a strong tendency to produce the very event of inquiry to which he had alluded. Pass now the measure of distribution, and it would arouse the States to look, not into the tariff, but into the annual Government expenditure of $30,000,000; and they would ask, why is all this squandered? Why is not the amount reduced within reasonable limits, and the residue given to us? The result (Mr. P. urged) of this would be that the expenditure would be reduced to some fourteen or sixteen millions.

The diseased action of this Government, Mr. P. said, had ever been over-action. Too much power was concentrated here, and the whole system was overloaded. The measure of distribution would arouse the States, and suggest an inquiry into the means of saving the expenditure of the people's money; and there was no danger of its being reduced too low. The powers and wants of the original Government were few and simple; it was for some time kept within the proper sphere of its action, and was all that the people could desire. But Congress had strengthened the Executive by expenditures, which must all go through his hands. Mr. P. desired to relieve the wants of the country; but he was still more desirous that the Government should be reduced to its proper action.

Gentlemen differed (said Mr. P.) in regard to the question whether there would or would not be a surplus. But if there should be a surplus, did they intend that it should remain in the banks? If there should be a surplus, all concurred in the expression of the opinion that it ought to be distributed. But suppose there should be none, a law of distribution would not take effect, and could, therefore, be the cause of no evil. It was best (he said) to guard on the side of danger, on the supposition that there might be a surplus. Gentlemen up to the close of the last session insisted that there would not then be a cent of surplus, and they came upon us with the full cry of wait, wait till there is a surplus. Was it proper to wait till the danger was upon us, or to provide beforehand even for its possible occurrence? If there should be no surplus, there would, in any case, be no danger. They ought to provide for the danger, which could possibly result in no harm if there should be no surplus, notwithstanding gentlemen argued that the law would have a deleterious effect on the minds of the people. If there should be no surplus, there was no possibility of its debauching the people. The only safe mode was to provide for a distribution.

But the probability was, that there would be a surplus; and, small or great, it was better to distribute it among the States than leave it in the banks. If there, the bubble of paper circulation, promoted by it, would burst, and it would be in danger; though the loss to the Treasury would be slight, in comparison of the general calamity. Let it be generally understood that when there should be a surplus, the banks were not to have it, but it would go back to the States. Some of them had turned the back of the hand for a moment when it was presented; but where was the State that had actually refused to receive it? Some of them were coy in their words; but when a great evil was to be avoided, they thought it better to get clear of it by submitting to the loss. Some States had said they would not touch it. But every one had received it. Congress ought to adopt the measure of distribution till the people should be aroused, and the expenditures and the revenue should be brought down to the economical wants of the Government.

Mr. CUTHBERT, having alluded rather indistinctly to the position which Georgia occupied in relation to this subject, said that his friend from South Carolina had stated very justly that some means ought to be devised to prevent extravagant expenditure. But had he been as zealous in providing the proper means of doing it, as in condemning the Government for raising the expenditures? Or when one administration raises their expenditures, did he propose that another should commit, as a remedy, an immediate robbery on the people, collecting their money for the purpose of distribution? His friend, he thought, had fallen into the extreme of error, proposing to open the way for improper taxation, and only throwing flowers over the mysterious way, which might hide his pit-fall.

Was this Government (Mr. C. asked) established to levy taxes; to collect, as trustees, the money that was to be expended by the States? Certainly not. When it collects taxes, is it to do it for the use of the States? Is it prudent and wise to engage the Government in operations not intended by the constitution? On the other hand, is not every operation of this kind to be avoided? Mr. C. would ask the Senators from South Carolina, when first this measure was resorted to, was it not through fear and anxiety? And had it not inverted the regular administration of the Government? Could a single instance be cited in which new and extraordinary measures of this kind had not led to evil?

And was there no danger to the Government from this new principle? Could any gentleman, however sanguine in his temper, fail to perceive that this operation would create a disturbance in the machinery of Government? What would be the necessary effect of the measure? The States would get into the Treasury by anticipation, and by imagination it would already be theirs; and not until after the Government was properly sustained would the remainder go to the States, but certain remnants would be left by them for the use of the Government. Representatives from the States would come here to procure the means of excessive internal improvements, and would leave the Government just so much as would maintain a miserable existence.

But there was also another view of the subject. Such was the pride and perversion of reason in the human mind, so great was the complication of motives that might be brought to bear upon it, that it was impossible to determine, in some cases, even between two opposite results. It might, therefore, be that the States would sink to a pitiful dependence on the Federal Government. And who dared deny that this might take place? Taken either way, it was a great evil in the proper machinery, and eminently disturbing the principle of Government. How great would be the mischief, it was impossible to determine; but even this uncertainty, in one sense, made it the more terrific. Was this measure, then, to be cherished and encouraged? Mr. C. called upon Senators who had an influence and name with the American people to maintain those great principles on which their safety and happiness depended.

The Senators from South Carolina had acknowledged, not only by their actions but their words, that there was no reason to apprehend a surplus in the coming year. This, then, was a new dread of a surplus, which had arisen suddenly, since Saturday last at six o'clock; (alluding to the origin of the proposition for distribution in the House.) That (Mr. C. said) was the date of this new anxiety.

Mr. NILES here made some remarks on the subject, in opposition to distribution, and unfavorable to the Senate, when opposed to the administration.

Here a short conversation took place, by Messrs. CLAY, WRIGHT, WEBSTER, and BENTON, on the subject of suspending the action on the bill till to-morrow; which, however, was not formally proposed.

Mr. BROWN remarked that the subject of the debate, which he had no disposition to prolong, had no connexion whatever with the main object of the bill. This he deemed a sufficient objection to the proposition as now presented, even if there were no objection on principle. The provision for distribution came intrenched behind the fortification bill; and he deemed this a system of legislation radically wrong, in which two great questions, wholly distinct, were so connected that Senators might be compelled either to take both, or else to lose both together.

Distribution Question.

[FEB. 28, 1837.]

The Senator from Kentucky had said that the present proposition was identical with that of the last session. Mr. B. thought there was a most material difference between them, and, in fact, no similitude at all. At the last session, there was an actual ascertained surplus; but now there was no surplus actually in the Treasury. There was only a possibility that it might accumulate. The one was a case of absolute necessity, the surplus having accumulated during several preceding years. But now they were called on to provide for a distribution of a surplus which might never occur.

The measure, he said, would be an injury to the State Governments, by inducing them to enter upon extravagant schemes of improvement, in anticipation of a surplus. Expectations would be excited by the act, which would never be realized. This, stimulating them to extravagant schemes, would throw them into difficulty, and do an unknown amount of mischief. And why legislate at all on the subject at this juncture? The provision in the bill proposed a distribution of the surplus on the 1st of January next; but, before that time, another session of Congress would commence, and there would be time enough then to legislate on what was certain, and not uncertain or improbable.

Another objection to the measure was, that it would tend to fix perpetual distribution on the General Government. The distribution law of the last session Mr. B. believed to be judicious, and the lesser of the two evils, one of which was unavoidable. But he would not contribute to the establishment of a system which he considered pernicious. And legislation of this kind, in so quick succession, he thought was calculated to fix the system upon us.

The country, he thought, must feel greatly indebted to their watchful guardians, who were for dividing a surplus among them which had no existence except in imagination. Mr. B. had always supposed that, when a trust had been committed to trustees, they had discharged their duty faithfully when they distributed funds after they had actually accrued. But here gentlemen proposed to execute a trust which had not yet devolved upon them.

But there was another aspect in which the question might be viewed, of great importance to the Union, and especially to the planting States of the South. No system which the advocates of the tariff could devise would be better calculated than this system to perpetuate the tariff. If Congress would give in to the system of annual distribution, this country would not, for years, if ever, be relieved from the tariff system. From the want of time, Mr. B. said he should forego some of the remarks which he had intended to make on this subject.

Mr. CALHOUN said the question was now brought to the single point, of what discrimination there was between this bill and the other, and whether this was unwise and that a wise one. Gentlemen admitted that the situation of the banks last year and now was precisely the same. The next point of the Senator from Pennsylvania (for others had followed almost exactly in the track which he had stricken out) was, that when the law of last year was passed, there was a large surplus in the Treasury, while now there was none. But (said Mr. C.) notwithstanding the distribution on the 1st of January last, our Treasury is as full now as it was at that time.

Mr. C. here went into the details of various statements and estimates, to prove this assertion. He made the sum in the Treasury now $42,000,000. The income of the customs last year he said was $21,000,000, which differed by $2,000,000 from his estimate for the present year. The imports, he said, were regulated by the exports, which were now known. The exports of cotton were greater than in the year preceding, and the price was now rising, and would probably continue to rise. The rice crop, also, was rather better, though the tobacco was not quite as much; so that the products for export in 1837 might be fairly put down to equal those of 1836. The profits of trade were never higher, and the customs would probably not be less than $25,000,000 or $30,000,000, though in his estimate he had made the customs rather less than last year.

In relation to the revenue from the public lands, Mr. C. had been guided more by the opinions of others who had more experience, and he had set it down at eight or nine millions of dollars. To this was to be added the stock in the United States Bank, which would make an aggregate, for the year, of $42,000,000.

The question now, whether there would or would not be a surplus, depended (he said) on the answer to the question whether Congress would appropriate all this money. Would politicians of the Jefferson school, who had expelled the old administration, partly on account of its prodigality in an annual expenditure of some $12,000,000, would they go so far as to appropriate even $27,000,000? At this Mr. C. would place the expenditure, though he thought the extreme ought not to exceed fifteen or sixteen millions, and the average not more than twelve or fourteen millions. There would then be a surplus of some fifteen or seventeen millions, with the enormous expenditure which he admitted might be made.

Last year, the reiterated predictions that there would be no surplus had proved to be false. This year they would be equally so. There was a heavy surplus now, and, without extraordinary expenditures, there would be at the end of the year. There were two reasons which he thought decisive in urging at this time the measure of distribution. One was, that if they made no disposition of the surplus, the scenes of last year would be renewed; the banks would loan extravagantly, relying on the surplus as banking capital, and would extend speculation every way and to every thing. This state of things the President himself had denounced; and yet, notwithstanding past experience and these denunciations of the President, we were now told to omit this measure for preventing such a result. The opposite course (Mr. C. said) was the true one. Pass this law now, and it would check extravagance and speculation, and remedy the very disordered state of the currency, which would otherwise be still more disordered. This would meet fully and decisively the two first objects of the Senator from Pennsylvania and of every Senator.

The next argument was, that the passage of the bill would familiarize us to a system of distribution, which might thus be permanently ingrafted on the administration of the Government; whereas distribution ought to be an exception, and not the rule. To this latter proposition Mr. C. agreed most heartily; and no man urged it more than he. He was the first to denounce such a system, and his opinion on this point had undergone no change whatever. It ought to be an exception, and not the rule. His own language was, that it was to be used as medicine, and not as food; and the provisions of this very bill were founded on the disordered condition of the republic. It was in the congestive state, and this bill was intended to remove the obstructions. But the dose must be repeated till the system should become healthy. In Mr. C.'s opinion, the measure ought to be repeated while the revenue should be going down, till the time of its reduction to the economical wants of the Government. It might require repetition again and again; while the scheme, as a permanent one, would be perfectly absurd. As such, there was not the smallest reason to fear that the people would ever come into it. General Jackson, in two of his messages, had strongly recommended it; but, with all his popularity and power, even he could not carry it; and nothing but absolute necessity had ever effected the passage of the former bill, or could effect the passage of this; and that this had already passed the House was decisive proof that it was a measure of necessity.

The Senator from Pennsylvania was in favor of reducing the revenue; and so was Mr. C. Early in the session, the Senator from New York and himself passed some words on the subject, and Mr. C. then told him that he had no faith in a reduction at this session, which was difficult at all times, but was now attended with insuperable difficulty. There were then two measures in view, one of which was to reduce the tariff of 1833. Mr. C. thought then there was very little prospect of the passage of such a law, or of a law reducing the revenue from the public lands. Yet, if they would and could reduce, he said, go on and do so. It was now the last day but one, and there was no hope that the bill for reducing would pass. The administration majorities in both Houses had failed of reduction. Would they now leave the money in the hands of the banks? Mr. C. trusted they would not. There were now but three alternatives, one of which was to leave the money in the banks. Would Congress do this, receiving only two per cent., and that not on the whole, but only a part of the amount, when it was well known that with them it was at least worth six per cent.? Were they to leave it with the banks, as an instrument for political purposes? Why should gentlemen recommend so extraordinary a course, so unequal, so partial, to avoid returning it to the people to whom it belonged? Why were they so averse to such a distribution? Was it to prevent the people from being corrupted? Were the people alone capable of being corrupted? Were the Government and banks all pure, while the people, the people alone, were corrupt and corruptible? Mr. C. however, would not argue in regard to the State Governments, as he thought they of course must be perfectly safe.

The second alternative (Mr. C. said) was to expend this enormous amount. That had already been contemplated as a dangerous error. In 1828, the income of the Government was raised enormously. We were now about in the commencement of the operation of raising the expenditure, and at the very time when the revenue was going down at about an annual average of $2,000,000 till 1842. Mr. C. thought $12,000,000 or $15,000,000 a most ample provision; especially as the fortifications and other defences being nearly completed, the expenses must be nearly limited to the civil list. The administration of Mr. Monroe was called extravagant in the expenditure of $10,000,000, which was the extreme annual amount. The appropriations then for fortifications and the army were called most extravagant. But now gentlemen could not be contented with less than $20,000,000 or $30,000,000; and at this rate the expenditure would very soon overrun the income. We must then raise the tariff or cut down the expenditure. These sudden vibrations (Mr. C. said) were all wrong. This want of looking forward, this wilful blindness to the future, was wholly unworthy of those who had the management of the republic. The responsibility and the danger was great, if either this bill should be lost, or if a resort should be had to extravagant expenditures.

The last and only remaining alternative was a deposit of the surplus with the States. It was now late in the session, and Mr. C. would not further consume the time; but what he had said was ample to show that there was no material distinction between the case now and that of the year preceding.

Mr. BENTON said, when the distribution bill of the last session was up, it was represented as one operation. But it made way for others. At the next session, he then thought there would be another proposition for one year more; at the next, again for two years; and so on, till, finally, the whole scheme would become forever perpetual and eternal. But he had not counted on the good fortune to the country that at this session the friends of the scheme would come forward with a proposition that it should be perpetual. And this matter was calculated to have so much the more favor, as eternity was greater than time. Mr. B. rejoiced that the entire magnitude of the proposition now stood revealed. The system (Mr. B. said) of permanent distribution was now avowed openly and aboveboard. Let us go on with the word deposite, and attach it to the harbor bill and every thing else. The word requisition was worn out during the confederacy, and led to the adoption of this Government, which was established for the sole purpose of being independent, with power to call for the money to carry it on. It was now proposed to annihilate the very ground on which the Federal Government was formed. The scheme was disclosed, and there was now no doubt that the high intelligence and incorruptible virtue of the people would look for a different project.

We had now, then, got a proposition for a permanent distribution, and the surplus was not intended to be appropriated, but to be distributed. And could any one doubt that Congress would not find a perpetual fund? Yes, they would find it. There were interests beyond that would have ample power to back and to bribe them; interests that were cemented together on the ground of resisting appropriations, and of resisting a reduction of the revenue also, and of increasing it from all its sources. They were now for yielding to the act of compromise, throwing around it the sanctity which was now claimed for it. The duty on wine had been already reduced, in contravention of the compromise; and when it should expire, in June, 1842, on the next morning, when Congress would be untied from the obligations in which the act had tied them up, on that very morning of the 1st of July, Congress would instantly restore the protective duties, and fill the Treasury to overflowing, and not with the continual current of a rill across the continent; on that day an act would be passed, compared to which that of 1828 was only a trifle. They would then want $50,000,000 or $100,000,000.

Mr. B., in the midst of some incidental remarks, alluded to the bill of Mr. CALHOUN for ceding the public lands to the States. Where was the person, he asked, who was simple enough to suppose that this proposition for distribution did not surrender that bill, leaving nothing but the bone to support a shadow? The lands that could now be got for $1 25 per acre would in 1842 be raised to $5 and $10 per acre. Let this bill pass, and farewell to that bill; farewell to the extinction of the federal title to lands, in favor of the States; farewell to all graduation of the price of the public lands. If this bill should pass, the Treasury would be kept for the purpose of being ravaged—the spoil of political scoundrels, and nothing but a remnant would be left for the immolated victim, the duped and ruined Federal Government. We know the young States are to be devoured by the old, and hence the measure is the more odious to the West. The land bill of Mr. CLAY was far preferable to the measure now presented. That bill gave 12½ per cent. of their own carcass to the new States. But this gave not one slice, not even a lick of their own blood.

If driven to the alternative, Mr. B. would take that in preference to this; but, rather than take either, he would place his hat on his head and walk out of the Capitol, never again to behold the inside or outside of its walls. Mr. B. rejoiced that the proposition had been brought forward at this early stage, with the purpose of making it perpetual, habitual, eternal, and that the word was even ostentatiously used, thrown in their faces, and driven down their throats.

Distribution Question.

And now for the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EWING.] That Senator had favored Mr. B. with a few words quoted from a speech of his. He had read it as he found it, and as Mr. B. had spoken it, and never in his life had he been better understood. The Cherokee treaty, the Florida war, and innumerable bills, all of which, he said, were for working the machinery of Government, providing for the pay of officers of Government, and for improving the condition of the country, belonged to the working of Government machinery. Mr. Jefferson's purchase of Louisiana for fifteen millions of dollars was not extravagant, and it would not be charged as the means of working Government machinery. At that time men charged it to the expenditures for the support of the common family.

He would now say a word on the subject of a surplus. No word in the English language had been so much abused as this, for the last twelve months. Gentlemen asked last year for a division of the surplus. But did they put it in the bill? No; it was not surplus, but appropriated money, which they recaptured and distributed among the States. Mr. B. here read over several appropriations which had not been expended. These, he said, were unexpended balances from the last year, because the appropriations were made too late. But they would never be abandoned, and the taxes must be kept up for the purpose of paying them. On the 1st of January next, there would be ten or twelve millions of unexpended appropriations. Now, he asked, what is surplus money under our laws? Here he read from the law, that appropriations were valid for two years after their passage. This act, he said, had been in force forty years, and this bill would go to violate it. No word, then, was more abused than the word surplus. Gentlemen were unwilling to insert the reserved $5,000,000, as over and above all appropriations.

The revenue, Mr. B. maintained, was in greater danger in the United States Bank than in the deposit banks. But what had the Government to do with banks? They were built on the surplus money, banks upon banks.

We had already seen the fatal effects of this measure on this session. All kept it in their eye, and stood together, resisting appropriations and a reduction of the revenue, and swelling the amount. What effect had this measure on the bill sent to the other House, on the 25th of February, for reducing the revenue? If there had been no scheme for distribution, that bill would have been acted on immediately. But now, by this scheme, that bill lay paralyzed, and probably dead forever. It would be seen that, when the revenue was to be reduced, the surplus party would stand together and vote against it. It would be so on appropriations; their vote would be one and indivisible, and they would be for raising the duties on the 1st July, 1842, and for raising the price of the public lands. Let gentlemen take their course. Those who voted for this bill would also vote for a permanent distribution, and to raise the duties in the tariff of 1842, and to deny pre-emption to settlers. Whatever might be their intentions, such would be the effect of their votes.

Mr. BUCHANAN must say, in candor, to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] that he had entirely failed to convince him he was wrong. Of one thing, however, he had convinced him, and that was that the Senator, in fact if not in profession, was one of the very best tariff men in the country. Let him succeed in supporting this amendment which had been adopted by the House; let him succeed in establishing a system of distribution as the settled policy of the country; and then what will be the inevitable consequence? High taxes upon imports will be maintained for the purpose of raising money to distribute; we shall no longer hear of reducing the revenue of the country to its necessary expenditure; we shall then have no difficulty in disposing of the surplus; it will go to the States as a matter of course; and our whole system of government will thus be changed.

For my own part, (said Mr. B.,) I should be sorry to reduce the tariff below the proper limit. I am in favor of affording to our domestic industry all the incidental protection which can be yielded to it in raising the revenue necessary for the wants of the Government. Indeed, if any thing could reconcile me to the doctrines of the Senator, it would be the protection which they must necessarily afford to our manufactures. Let this amendment pass the Senate, as it has already passed the House, and who can believe that the tariff will ever be reduced? If all the surplus money which can be collected by this Government is to be distributed amongst the several States, this will perpetuate high duties forever. It is not, however, either my intention or my wish to quarrel with him on this account. If he will, by advocating this system of policy, force upon us a high tariff, my constituents will bear their part of the dispensation with Christian fortitude.

I am sorry now to believe in the truth of the declaration of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] that the land bill is a lifeless corpse. I have clung to that measure, through good report and through evil report, until it has been abandoned by all its other friends, and I am left as the only mourner of its unhappy fate. Dead and gone, as it appears to be, I shall not do its memory so much injustice as to compare it with the system of distribution which its former friends have now adopted in its stead.

The land bill would be the safety-valve, the regulator of our system of revenue and expenditure, without inflicting any of the evils on the Federal Government which must flow from annual distributions of the surplus in the Treasury.

What is the theory of our Government under the constitution? Congress possess the power to levy and collect taxes. For what purpose? To accomplish the great objects specified in the constitution. This power of levying taxes carries with it an immense responsibility. The representatives of the people, when they know that all the money they appropriate must be taken from the pockets of their constituents, will be careful to expend it with economy and discretion. But we possess a vast reservoir of wealth in our public lands, so irregular in its current that, in one year, it pours into the public Treasury twenty millions, and in the next it contributes but one tenth of that sum. This deranges all our legislation, and renders all great interests of the country fluctuating and insecure. It encourages extravagant appropriations by Congress, and banishes economy from our legislation. It leaves every interest in doubt and uncertainty. In one year, when we have more money than we know how to expend, we hear the cry that the tariff must be reduced; the revenue must be diminished to the necessary expenditures of the Government; protection must be withdrawn from our manufactures. The next year, perhaps there may be a reaction. Speculation in the public lands may have exhausted itself, and the receipts of the Treasury from this source may be greatly diminished. What comes then? The tariff must be raised; the duties on imports must be increased to meet the necessary wants of the Government. Thus the public mind is kept in a perpetual state of excitement. No domestic interest can calculate upon any fixed and steady protection. We are in a state of continual doubt, public opinion fluctuating with the fluctuations in the sales of the public lands. None of the great interests of the country can ever flourish, unless they can calculate, with some degree of confidence, upon some steady and certain course of legislation in relation to themselves. Now, sir, a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the States would remedy all these evils, and correct all these anomalies of our system. It would secure to us a settled policy, upon which the country might rely. It would draw off from the General Government this eccentric source of revenue, and distribute it among the States. We should then be left where the constitution intended to place us. The Government would then be administered on its original principles. All our expenditures would then be derived from the taxes which we might impose on the people, and the tariff would thus be rendered fixed and certain. Whatever protection might then be afforded would be stable. Under such circumstances, an incidental protective duty, comparatively small, would be of more real value than a much larger one, subject to all the risk and uncertainty which now exist. A manufacturer, whilst embarking in business, would not then dread lest the policy of Congress might change before he could get into successful operation. There would then be no taxes raised from the people to be distributed among the people. We should hear no more of surpluses.

Distribution Question.

Combining some such a disposition of the proceeds of the public lands with an arrangement, as to the lands themselves, which would be satisfactory to the new States, the system might thereby be rendered perfect and permanent. I am strongly impressed with the belief that a plan might be devised which would meet the approbation of all reasonable men in the new States, whilst the just rights of the old States would be amply secured. But all hope of such a consummation has almost departed. The friends of the land bill have cast it aside. Even the Senator from Kentucky has abandoned the promising child which he had adopted and nursed so long and so tenderly, and is now caressing and cherishing the ill-favored bantling which is now before the Senate.

Has any argument which I urged when I first addressed the Senate been answered by the gentleman from South Carolina? [Mr. CALHOUN.] He says that it is a reflection upon the virtue and patriotism of the American people and their representatives, to suggest that they would withhold the necessary appropriations from the Federal Government, because the States might expect to receive what would remain unexpended in the Treasury at the conclusion of each year. Can this inference be fairly drawn from my argument? Every wise legislator, of every age, in framing any plan of government, has always taken care that the duty of those who were to administer it should not clash with their interests. In other words, that those who were to work the machine should not have any strong feeling opposed to its successful operation. Man, in his best state, is but a frail being. If you place his interest upon the one side and his duty upon the other, the history of the human race abundantly proves that he has too often abandoned his principles for the sake of promoting his private advantage. Lead us not into temptation, was the prayer of Him who best understood human nature. Am I, then, to be charged with reflecting upon the American people, because I believe they will be influenced by the motives which have swayed all mankind from the beginning? What wise man would ever think of establishing a constitution which would place the interest of the Governors in opposition to a correct and efficient administration of the Government? Would not this be emphatically the case, if you say to the Senators and Representatives in Congress that you shall have every dollar of surplus in the Treasury at the end of each year, for the use of your own States, which you can withhold from national objects? I would ask the Senator, if he were about to erect a house, and desired to have it elegantly and substantially built, whether he would put a given amount for that purpose into the hands of his agent, upon condition that the whole surplus which he could save, after the work was completed, should be his own property? This would be offering him a premium to be faithless to his trust. No, sir; I deny that, in applying to the American people the laws which govern human nature generally, I am treating them with disrespect. I merely say that they are mortal men, and not angels. I should be the last man to distrust their patriotism, because I firmly believe that, comparing them with the rest of mankind, they are, in the mass, more pure and more virtuous than any other nation upon the face of the earth.

Our own history presents us a useful lesson upon this subject. Let us refer to the days of the confederation; and what was then the state of things? Did the different State Governments pay into the Federal Treasury their contingents, which were due upon every fair principle? Would the debts of the Revolution have ever been discharged, had the old confederation continued to exist? No, sir. The members of the State Legislatures refused to tax the people of the respective States for these purposes. They were placed in such a position that their duty to the Government of the confederation was at war with the interests of their constituents; and the consequence was, that Government became a mere shadow—destitute of power, and incapable of performing its most necessary functions. Yet these men, who refused to perform their duties, were the very men who had periled every thing in the cause of liberty.

I voted for the deposit bill of the last session on the very principles then maintained by the Senator from South Carolina. At that time we heard nothing from him which would authorize us to infer that he intended to make the extreme medicine of the constitution its daily bread.

[Mr. CALHOUN here explained. He said that the bill introduced by him at the last session contained a distribution for several years.]

Mr. B. continued. I was perfectly aware of that fact; but with whom did this portion of his bill find favor? Is it not notorious that he abandoned it himself? He advocated the bill as an extreme remedy for an extreme case, and justified the measure from its absolute necessity.

The patient was then in a state of the most alarming plethora. The danger of apoplexy was imminent. We bled him copiously in order to save his life. But now, if we are to believe my friend from Georgia, [Mr. KING,] whose opinions upon this subject are entitled to great consideration, our patient will ere long be as lank and lean as the knight of La Mancha. He is now threatened with a galloping consumption. Shall we, then, Sangrado like, continue to bleed? When the symptoms change, the treatment should be different. Although I do not concur with the Senator from Georgia in the opinion he has expressed in regard to the future state of the Treasury, yet I cannot perceive the least necessity, under existing circumstances, to pass another deposit bill. I can never consent to make that which was an exception, under a peculiar state of things, the general rule of our conduct. It is so rendered still more emphatically by attaching this amendment to a common appropriation bill. If you introduce this policy, as a general system, you will change the whole theory and practice of our Government.

What effect will this principle probably produce upon the State Governments at home? They are now frugal and careful of the people's money, because their expenditures are derived from taxes levied upon the people. The members of the State Legislatures are placed in that condition of responsibility to their immediate constituents, which necessarily secures prudence and economy in making appropriations. But let the flood-gates of the national Treasury be opened, let copious streams of money flow in upon them, and you will have wild and extravagant schemes for spending it, which may be ruinous to the States themselves. They will thus involve themselves in debts, and rely upon the national Treasury to pay them. This will produce pressure upon their representatives to get as much as they can from the General Government, and give as little as they can to national objects.

I would put a question to my friend from Arkansas, [Mr. SEVIER.] We have removed and are about removing all the Indians east of the Mississippi to the country west of his State and that of Missouri. These turbulent and restless savages will all be imbedded on the Western frontier of these States. The Government are bound by every principle to yield their citizens protection. Chiefly for this necessary purpose, the Senate has passed a bill to increase the rank and file of the army. Does the Senator believe that the bill will ever become a law, should we adopt the system of distributing surpluses among the States?

[Mr. BENTON exclaimed "never, never,"]

The two principles are as much opposed to each other as light and darkness. If the surplus derived from taxation is to be annually given to the States, all appropriations in Congress will fail, unless such as may be made under the pressure of immediate and pressing necessity.

I voted for the deposit bill last year because no other practicable mode existed of relieving the Treasury, and removing the money from the deposit banks. But no such necessity now exists. No man now knows whether there will be a surplus or not. If there should be, as I think there will, it will be small, unless, indeed, this very bill should create it by defeating those measures in the other House necessary for the defence of the country, and the reduction of the revenue to the standard of our expenditures.

Mr. WALL said he voted for the distribution bill of the last session, but he never did intend to adopt the principle as one upon which he would act in all future circumstances, or which he would make into a system. If circumstances should be the same at that time, he would act upon it according to his judgment. But they were now entirely different. It was not now the question how the money in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1838, should be disposed of, but whether they should now sanction, by a deliberate act, a system of log-rolling legislation. The bill, without this distribution provision added to it, providing for the common defence of the country, was distinctly within the limits of the constitution. Who would not say that it was his duty to provide for the defence of the country? The bill to which this amendment was ingrafted was introduced in the House on the 21st of December, 1836, (the same bill failed last year,) and was acted on, so far as concerned the appropriations, in the Senate bill till the 27th of February. In the original bill there were appropriations for fortifications in Maine, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, Maryland, Virginia, Louisiana, and Florida, and one or two others. These provisions were for defence, and were clearly and unequivocally constitutional. But when it was brought to the Senate, there was connected with it a measure for dividing, not what was now a surplus, but a surplus which depended upon prophecy. Mr. W. was not willing to legislate on prophecy. There might or might not be a surplus on the 1st of January, 1838; and if there might not be, Mr. W. would not make provision for what might not take place. If there should then be a surplus, there would be men here then as honest and faithful as now, and there would be time enough for them to legislate on facts. All acknowledged that distribution was an evil which ought not to be encouraged; and if it must take place, the next Congress could provide for it. Were they afraid to trust them with the question, and would they therefore legislate not only for the present, but for futurity? There was as much evil in too much legislation as in too little, especially in legislating for evils which might or might not exist.

Mr. W. said he had no interest in the deposit banks. They were not of his party, but of the party opposed to the administration. If gentlemen would investigate, they would find that, in every instance, there was either a majority of the stock opposed to the administration, or a majority of the directors; and all the hue and cry against the deposit banks was made by the political friends of those who controlled them. Mr. W. therefore had no interest in them on political grounds. But the strongest objection to the amendment (provision) was that it was an improper mode of legislation. And in what situation would this species of legislation place some of the Senators who last year opposed appropriations for these fortifications, but would vote for them this year with a small amendment added, which had no connexion with the original bill? [Mr. EWING, of Ohio, said nearly every one voted for the bill last year.] Mr. W. said he spoke from the record; he would not recite it, but refer to it. Let gentlemen look at it themselves. Mr. W. was for making proper appropriations for the welfare of the country, but he protested against this log-rolling system of legislation, connecting together subjects totally distinct, and compelling members to take both or neither.

Mr. WEBSTER said the Senator from New Jersey was certainly under a mistake. A bill for certain new works was opposed at the last session. But the bill known as the common fortification bill was not opposed.

Mr. BENTON said perhaps there would be found in this fortification bill a part for new works.

Mr. NILES and Mr. CRITTENDEN also addressed the Senate on the subject of the amendment of the House to distribute the surplus revenue; after which,

The Senate took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

DISTRIBUTION QUESTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill from the House, making appropriations for fortifications, &c. for the year 1837, the question being on a motion to strike out the section of the bill which provided for a deposit of the surplus revenue, on the 1st of January next, with the several States.

The debate was continued to a late hour with much earnestness, when the question was taken on the motion above stated, and decided as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Moorr, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White—19.

So the motion to strike out the provision for the distribution among the States of the surplus revenue on the 1st of January next, was decided in the affirmative.

And, thus amended, the bill was ordered to a third reading.

The various bills which were yesterday ordered to a third reading were severally read a third time and passed.

The bill concerning pilots came up on its third reading.

Mr. CALHOUN objected to it, as relating to a subject which required considerable attention, and as one which he was rather disposed to think properly belonged to the several States.

Mr. WALL explained the objects of the bill in detail, and urged the importance of its passage.

Mr. WRIGHT also spoke in favor of the bill; and it was then passed.

LIGHT-HOUSES, &c.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill making appropriations for light-houses, light-boats, buoys, &c., for the year 1837.

Mr. DAVIS from the committee, offered various amendments to the bill, (mostly inconsiderable,) one of which requires the Navy Commissioners to examine the premises before any appropriations shall be applied; which amendments were all adopted.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed his high approbation of this amendment, objecting, however, to the whole system, and especially to the practice of making appropriations before the examinations are actually made.

The bill was still further amended, on motions of Messrs. RUGGLES and HENDRICKS, and was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. RUGGLES stated that the aggregate amount appropriated by this bill was something over $500,000.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON, the bill to give security to correspondence between the United States and foreign countries was amended by a substitute, providing for an increase of the number and compensation of clerks and watchmen in the Post Office Department, and for the erection of a new building for that Department.

Mr. ROBINSON stated that the Postmaster General had recommended to the committee a reduction of postage, as there was a large surplus of money in the Department. A majority of the committee were, however, of the opinion that it ought to be applied in increasing mail facilities; for which purpose this substitute was now introduced.

Mr. KNIGHT stated that the minority of the committee were of the contrary opinion.

The substitute for the bill was adopted as the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and subsequently passed.

FRENCH AND NEAPOLITAN INDEMNITIES.

Mr. WRIGHT moved the consideration of a bill anticipating the payment of indemnities accruing to citizens of the United States, under the convention with France of the 4th of July, 1831, and that with the Two Sicilies of the 14th October, 1832.

Much discussion was excited by this motion; but it was at length agreed to.

The bill was then reported, and ordered to its third reading, by yeas, and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clayton, Ewing of Ohio, Hubbard, Kent, Linn, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Southard, Tipton, Walker, Webster, Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Davis, Hendricks, Moore, Swift, Tomlinson, Wall, White—8.

Many other bills were taken up, considered as in Committee of the Whole, ordered to a third reading, and passed; when the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 1.

CHEROKEE INDIANS.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented the memorial of 2,500 Cherokee Indians, both east and west of the Mississippi, in relation to the treaty with their tribe ratified at the last session of the Senate, remonstrating against that treaty as fraudulent in its origin, and oppressive in its effect, and praying an investigation of the subject by Congress.

Mr. S. moved that the memorial be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. PRESTON opposed the printing, as a useless expense, and as tending only to create pernicious agitation.

Mr. SOUTHARD disclaimed all disposition to debate the question; but, after stating the nature of the petition, appealed to the Senate in behalf of what he represented as the wish of the great body of the Cherokee nation, that the late treaty should be examined into. It was too late in the session to hope for any action in the case, but he hoped the printing of the memorial would not be refused.

Mr. TIPTON, after referring to the late period of the session as not allowing of debate upon such a question, moved to lay the motion to print upon the table; which was agreed to.

BOOKS FOR COMMITTEE ROOMS.

The resolution introduced by Mr. WALL, for supplying the committee rooms of the Senate with various works published by order or under the superintendence of Congress, was read a third time; and the question being on its passage—

Mr. WALL explained its provisions, and stated that the total sum to be expended under the resolution would not much exceed $800.

Mr. EWING moved to amend it by adding to the list of works in the resolution Elliott's Debates and Diplomatic Correspondence.

Mr. SOUTHARD supported the resolution in a few remarks.

Mr. BENTON went at length into a speech in opposition to the resolution, which he deprecated as itself a useless expenditure, as scattering the books which ought to be kept together under the care of the Secretary, and as leading to the establishment of a library for each committee room, &c.

Mr. CALHOUN joined the opposition to the measure, as but the commencement of a system of expense, &c.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the resolution was laid on the table.

TEXAS.

Mr. WALKER called up his resolution for the recognition of the independence of Texas, on which a debate of much interest arose. Mr. W. advocated his resolution by a speech of much earnestness, in which he pressed the claims of Texas for recognition with much devoted ardor.

He was followed by Mr. PRESTON, on the same side, who went into an extensive review of the history of Mexico, from the period of her recognition by our own Government to the present time, whence he deduced the argument that she never had, in fact, exercised control over Texas, and was in no condition now to enforce her claims of sovereignty. He then went into a similar review of the history of Texas, past and present, and argued to show that she was fully capable of performing the duties and sustaining the responsibilities, both domestic and foreign, which belong to an independent Government.

Mr. NORVELL said that, somewhat more than two months ago, the President had transmitted a message to the Senate of the United States, concerning the civil, political, and military condition of Texas, and its relations with Mexico. In that message he observed the following passage: "It is true that, with regard to Texas, the civil authority of Mexico has been expelled, its invading army defeated, the chief of the republic himself captured, and all present power to control the newly organized Government of Texas annihilated within its confines. But, on the other hand, there is, in appearance at least, an immense disparity of physical force on the side of Mexico. The Mexican republic, under another Executive, is rallying its forces under a new leader, and menacing a fresh invasion to recover its lost dominion. Upon the issue of this threatened invasion the independence of Texas may be considered as suspended; and were there nothing peculiar in the relative situation of the United States and Texas, our acknowledgment of its independence at such a crisis could scarcely be regarded as consistent with that prudent reserve with which we have heretofore held ourselves bound to treat all similar questions."

Texas.

It is true, sir, (said Mr. N.,) that this second invading army has not penetrated into Texas. It is true that not a hostile foot is to be found in Texas. But it is equally true that the late chief of the Mexican republic has been released from imprisonment by the Texian Government, and that he has returned home. It is probable that this course was agreed upon by both of the contending parties, with the understanding that, if public sentiment in Mexico should be found to authorize it, the Mexican chief would himself lead the way in recognising the independence of Texas. If no such understanding had taken place, was it certain that another invasion of Texas, more formidable than the first, would not be attempted? In either event, it would be more prudent in this Government, more wise, more consistent with the delicate relations which exist between the United States and Mexico, to wait until we see the result of the return to that country of the Mexican chief, before we venture upon the decisive measure of recognition, and of throwing additional embarrassment in the way of a peaceful adjustment of our serious differences with Mexico. The policy of this Government, with regard to foreign nations and to the domestic contests which take place among them for power, had, from the time of Washington to the present day, been cautious, prudent, and strictly impartial. We have always waited until their new Governments had acquired stability, and were placed beyond the probability of change, before we recognised their independence.

The Executive of this country could not, it would be remembered, be induced to acknowledge the independence of the Spanish American republics, until they had carried on their struggles with Spain for several years; and this, too, when we had no serious differences to adjust with that monarchy. The contest for Texian independence has not been going on for more than one year. We have, at this time, difficulties of such magnitude with the republic of Mexico, that the President of the United States had recommended reprisals against her. The Senate, two days ago, unanimously voted against the adoption of any such hostile measure towards that republic. And could they now, consistently with that vote, prematurely commit the peace of the nation? Could they now, honorably, take advantage of the weakness and distractions of Mexico, and recognise the independence of Texas, without knowing what course the Mexican chief himself would take on the subject? Would this be magnanimous? A short delay would remove all difficulty. This delay would not be incompatible with the indulgence of all our sympathies for the Texans. In a month or two we should learn the views of Santa Anna in relation to Texas. In the mean time, the Executive, charged with the foreign relations of the country, ought to be permitted to act according to circumstances, upon his own responsibility, with respect to the acknowledgment of Texian independence. This course would be in harmony with the action of the other branch of the Legislature on the subject. They had made an appropriation to enable the President to send a diplomatic agent to Texas, whenever he should receive satisfactory evidence that she was actually an independent Power, and deemed it expedient to despatch a minister to that country. Mr. N., therefore, submitted a substitute for the original resolution, declaring "that whenever information, satisfactory to the President of the United States, should be received, that Texas has in successful operation a civil Government, capable of performing the duties and of fulfilling the obligations of an independent Power, it will be expedient to acknowledge the independence of that republic." It would, he said, be observed, that while the language and spirit of his amendment were similar, in most respects, to the resolution adopted by the Senate at the last session upon the same subject, there was this material variation, in the amendment, from the resolution: that was an abstract and general declaration; this devolved upon the President the responsibility of deciding when such a state of things might exist as to justify the recognition of Texian independence. The amendment would obviate the necessity of delaying this recognition until the next session of Congress, if, in the judgment of the President, it could be safely and wisely made before that time.

Mr. WALKER objected to the amendment, as not advancing the Texian cause beyond the point at which it stood last session.

Mr. CALHOUN also opposed the amendment, and spoke for a short time in support of Mr. WALKER's resolution.

Mr. CLAY inquired whether the resolution was intended to be followed up by any, and what, legislative action. He objected to the resolution, as covering not only the legislative but also the executive functions of the Government. Though he should prefer that the question should lie over a little longer, yet, if the question were put to him in any shape in which, as a legislator, he was called to give an affirmative or negative vote, he should, in conformity with the principles on which he had always acted in reference to the South American States, give an affirmative answer. But there would then remain behind the very grave and important question of annexation; on which he would at present express no opinion. They were entirely distinct questions; and a vote on the one would not commit any man on the other. As the question would come up, however, on the appropriation bill from the House, he should prefer, if agreeable to the mover, to move at present that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. WALKER said that there would be no inconsistency in adopting his resolution, and then voting on the item in the appropriation bill. The latter was contingent in its character, but this resolution gave a positive expression of the opinion of the Senate. He contended for the propriety of such an expression of opinion, and against casting the whole burden of responsibility on the Executive.

Mr. BUCHANAN, after expressing his best wishes for the success of Texas, and his confident hope of it, contended that this was not the moment in which it became us to act. Every one knew that the success of Texas, thus far, had been achieved mainly by men and resources drawn, in fact, from the people of the United States, though without any recognition of its Government; and as the people of Texas had adopted a resolution that, as soon we should recognise their independence, they would immediately apply for reception into the United States as a State of this Union, we might expose ourselves, in the view of the world, to the strongest suspicions of a departure from that impartiality which we had always observed toward other nations. As Santa Anna had had his life given him by the people of Texas, and was likely to return with acclamations to the Government of Mexico, would it not be better to wait and see whether he would not fulfil the promise he had been understood to have made of using his great influence in favor of his liberators? Mr. B. did not believe he would have the least desire to try a war with Texas again.

[At this stage of the debate, the Senate took its daily recess.]

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution on the independence of Texas, the question being on the substitute offered by Mr. NORVELL.

Mr. PRESTON addressed the Senate at some length, chiefly in reply to Mr. BUCHANAN, urging that former precedents not only warranted but required the express action of Congress at this time, the subject having been referred to them by the President, and the facts being such as not only to justify but demand a recognition. He urged both the impropriety of referring the subject wholly to the President, and his unwillingness to trust with him the whole responsibility. He insisted that for Congress to wait till Mexico should recognise the independence of Texas was at variance with all former precedents.

Mr. BUCHANAN, waiving reply, moved to lay the resolution on the table; which motion was negatived, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Davis, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Knight, Morris, Nicholas, Norvell, Page, Prentiss, Ruggles, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Linn, Moore, Mouton, Niles, Parker, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Spence, Strange, Walker, White—22.

The amendment offered by Mr. NORVELL was lost, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Davis, Hubbard, Knight, Morris, Norvell, Page, Prentiss, Ruggles, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Wall, Wright—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, King of Alabama, Linn, Moore, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Parker, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Spence, Strange, Tipton, Walker, White—25.

The original resolution, as offered by Mr. WALKER, was as follows:

“Resolved, That the State of Texas having established and maintained an independent Government, capable of performing those duties, foreign and domestic, which appertain to independent Governments, and it appearing that there is no longer any reasonable prospect of the successful prosecution of the war by Mexico against said State, it is expedient and proper, and in conformity with the laws of nations and the practice of this Government in like cases, that the independent political existence of said State be acknowledged by the Government of the United States.”

The question on agreeing to this resolution was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Linn, Moore, Mouton, Niles, Parker, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Spence, Strange, Walker, White—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Davis, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Morris, Nicholas, Norvell, Page, Prentiss, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Wright—19.

So the resolution was agreed to.

The announcement of this vote called forth some applause from the gallery, which was promptly checked by the Chair.

NAVAL SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1837.

The amendments offered by the committee were adopted.

On motion of Mr. RIVES, the bill was further amended, by appropriating $100,000 to launch and secure the United States ship of the line Pennsylvania.

Mr. CALHOUN remarked that the balances on hand for the naval service amounted to about $4,800,000. This, with the appropriations of this bill, would make the whole a very large sum, rather greater than the whole expenditure of Government under Mr. Monroe, and about equal to the highest entire expenditure under Mr. Adams.

Mr. RIVES replied that these appropriations were in addition to outstanding balances, except where the contrary was expressed in the bill. The objects, he said, were distinct. Former outstanding appropriations were for the completion of works begun; but the objects of the appropriations of this bill were new and distinct.

Mr. CALHOUN said he would now say to the Senate that this bill, in connexion with previous appropriations, would put under the control of the Navy Department something like $12,000,000.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, and subsequently read a third time and passed.

OLD HARBORS, &c.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill making appropriations for certain harbors, and for the removal of obstructions at the mouths of certain rivers.

Several amendments from the committee were adopted.

On the amendment to this bill, proposed by the committee, for the relief of the citizens of Alexandria,

Mr. WRIGHT called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered. He remarked that this amendment was identical with the bill lately passed by the Senate for this purpose, and protested against this mode of legislation, by which members might be compelled either to vote for an amendment having no connexion with the objects of the bill, or to vote against the bill itself.

Mr. DAVIS admitted the mode to be generally exceptionable. But the committee, he said, were influenced by the considerations that this measure ought to pass, and that the bill sent to the other House for this purpose, loaded as it was there with other important business, was not likely to pass in that House. He proceeded to show that justice demanded this appropriation for Alexandria, and that the amount would but just place Alexandria on the same footing with Georgetown and Washington, which cities had obtained so much greater aid from Congress on the Holland debt.

This amendment was further and earnestly discussed by Messrs. PARKER, WRIGHT, NILES, BUCHANAN, KENT, and PRESTON, and was carried in the affirmative, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Buchanan, Clayton, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Hendricks, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Linn, Moore, Nicholas, Norvell, Parker, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Sevier, Spence, Walker, White—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Hubbard, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Page, Prentiss, Ruggles, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Wright—17.

Mr. HENDRICKS moved to amend the bill by appropriating $50,000 for the improvement of the navigation of the Wabash river. Negatived.

Also negatived, an amendment offered by Mr. MOORE, of $100,000 for the completion of the canal around the Muscle shoals, in Tennessee river.

SENATE.]

General Appropriation Bill—Brigs Encomium, Enterprise, and Comet.

[MARCH 2, 1837.]

Mr. WALL moved to amend the bill by an appropriation of $9,900 for Raritan river; which he pressed with great ardor and perseverance, in which he was earnestly supported by Mr. SOUTHARD.

After must debate, this amendment was lost in committee: Yeas 16, nays 16; but was carried afterwards in the Senate: Yeas 21, nays 14.

An amendment by Mr. WALKER, of $5,000 for the mouth of Pascagoula river, and of $1,000 for that of Pearl river, was lost in committee: Ayes 10, noes not counted; and lost again in Senate: Ayes 12.

Mr. LYON moved to increase the $15,000 in the bill, for a pier at the mouth of St. Joseph's river, to $30,000. Negatived.

An amendment by Mr. EWING, of Ohio, of $20,000 for the mouth of Maumee river, was lost in Senate.

Also, of $12,000, by Mr. LYON, for Kalamazoo river. The bill was then ordered to a third reading.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Finance Committee, reported the appropriation bill for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1837, with numerous amendments; which were agreed to.

Mr. WEBSTER moved to amend the bill by inserting $5,000 to complete the law library of Congress, according to a catalogue to be furnished by the Chief Justice of the United States. It was agreed to.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the bill by increasing the salary of the recorder of the General Land Office to $2,500; which was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to insert $2,000 for the salary of a secretary of legation to Mexico. Agreed to.

Mr. PARKER moved to insert $30,000 for the purchase of the manuscripts of Mr. Madison, containing a record of the debates of the convention.

Mr. HUBBARD asked the yeas and nays; which, being taken, stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Crittenden, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Hendricks, Kent, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Norvell, Parker, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Webster, White, Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Davis, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Moore, Nicholas, Niles, Prentiss, Ruggles, Swift, Tipton—12.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved for statuary for the eastern front of the Capitol, $8,000.

He said he had been advised not to insert the name of any artist, although, from his knowledge of Mr. Persico, (on whose character and talents he pronounced a handsome eulogy,) he was strongly inclined to insert his name here, as it had been in the bill from the House. He, however, would waive doing so, in the hope that Mr. Persico might be appointed to execute the work.

Mr. WEBSTER advocated the amendment; but as art, like science, belonged to the world, and not to any particular nation, he was opposed to designating any individual artist, whether an American or a foreigner. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FULTON moved an amendment for the compensation of the surveyor general of Arkansas, $2,000. Agreed to.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the bill by striking out of the appropriation for the contingent appointment of a diplomatic agent to Texas the words "may receive satisfactory evidence that Texas is an independent Power."

Mr. W. advocated the amendment, on the ground that the Senate had this day decided that, in their judgment, Texas was independent.

The amendment was negatived, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Calhoun, Crittenden, Fulton, Hendricks, Linn, Moore, Mouton, Parker, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Walker, White—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, Wright—21.

Mr. PRESTON moved to strike out that part of the bill which relates to the salaries of librarian, assistant librarian, and messengers, with a view to increase them; but it was rejected.

On his motion, $400 was appropriated for part payment of the artist who made a bust of the late Chief Justice Ellsworth.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, moved an amendment for extra compensation to the judge of the district of East Florida, who had adjudicated on certain private land claims, $1,500, accompanied with a clause repealing the act for this charge in future. It was not agreed to.

The bill was then reported to the Senate. The amendments were agreed to, and the bill ordered to its third reading.

Several other bills received their third reading, were passed, and sent to the House for concurrence.

And the Senate then adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 2.

BRIGS ENCOMIUM, ENTERPRISE, AND COMET.

Mr. CALHOUN said that it would be remembered that on his motion a resolution was adopted, requesting the President to communicate to the Senate the correspondence between this Government and that of Great Britain, in relation to the case of the brigs Encomium and Enterprise. He held in his hand the message of the President in answer to the resolution, from which he found that there was another case (that of the Comet) of a similar character, of which he was not aware when he made his motion, and which occurred as far back as 1832. He had read with care the correspondence, but, he must say, with very little satisfaction. It was all on one side. Our Executive has been knocking, (no, that is too strong a term,) tapping gently at the door of the British Secretary, to obtain justice, for these five years, without receiving an answer, and this in the plainest case imaginable. It was not his intention to censure those who had been intrusted with the correspondence on our part. They had written enough, and more than enough; but truth compelled him to say the tone was not high enough, considering the injustice to our citizens, and the outrage on the flag and honor of the Union. His remarks were intended more especially for the latter part of the correspondence, after the long delay without an answer from the British Government. At first, in so plain a case, little more could be thought necessary than a plain statement of the facts, which was given in a very clear and satisfactory manner in the letter of the President elect in the case of the Comet.

Without repeating what he said on the introduction of the resolution, he would remind the Senate of the facts of the case in the briefest manner possible.

The three brigs were engaged in the coasting trade, and, among other passengers, had slaves on board, belonging to our citizens, who were sending them to the Southwestern States, with a view to settlement. The Enterprise was forced, by stress of weather, into Port Hamilton, Bermuda, where the slaves on board were forcibly seized and detained by the local authorities. The other two were wrecked on the Keys belonging to the Bahama islands, and the passengers and crew taken by wreckers, contrary to their wishes, into Nassau, New Providence, where the slaves shared the same fate as at Bermuda.

These were the essential facts of the case. He did not intend to argue the questions that grew out of them. There was, indeed, little or no ground for argument. No one in the least conversant with the laws of nations can doubt that these vessels were as much under the protection of our flag, while on their voyage, proceeding from one port of the Union to another, as if they were in port, lying at the wharves, within our acknowledged jurisdiction. Nor is it less clear, that forced as the Enterprise was by stress of weather, and taken, under the circumstances that the passengers and crews of the other two were, into the British dominions, they lost none of the rights which belonged to them while on their voyage on the ocean. So far otherwise, so far from losing the protection which our flag gave them while on the ocean, they had superadded, by their misfortunes, the additional rights which the laws of humanity extend to the unfortunate in their situation, and which are regarded by all civilized nations as sacred. It follows, as a necessary consequence, that the municipal laws of the place could not divest the owners of the property which, as citizens of the United States, they had in the slaves who were passengers in the vessels; and yet, as clear as is this conclusion, they were forcibly seized and detained by the local authorities of the islands; and the Government of Great Britain, after five years' negotiation, has not only withheld redress, but has not even deigned to answer the often-repeated application of our Government for redress. We are thus left by its silence to conjecture the reason for so extraordinary a course.

On casting his eyes over the whole subject, he could fix on but one that had the least plausibility, and that resting on a principle which it was scarcely credible that a Government so intelligent could assume: he meant the principle that there could not be property in persons. It was not for him to object that Great Britain, or any other country, should assume that or any other principle it might think proper, as applicable to its subjects; but he must protest against the right to adopt it as applicable to our country or citizens. It would strike at the independence of our country, and would not be less insulting than outrageous; while it would ill become a nation that was the greatest slaveholder of any on earth, notwithstanding all cant about emancipation, to apply such a principle in her intercourse with others. It is time to speak out boldly on this subject, and to expose freely the folly and hypocrisy of those who accuse others of what, if there be guilt, they are more guilty themselves.

Ours is not the only mode in which man may have dominion over man. The principle which would abrogate the property of our citizens in their slaves would equally abrogate the dominion of Great Britain over the subject nations under her control. If one individual can have no property in another, how can one nation, which is but an aggregate of individuals, have dominion, which involves the highest right of property, over another? If man has, by nature, the right of self-government, have not nations, on the same principle, an equal right? And if the former forbids one individual from having property in another individual, does not the other equally forbid one nation holding dominion over another? How inconsistent would it be in Great Britain to withhold redress for injustice to our citizens committed in the West Indies, on the ground that persons could not be property, while in the East Indies she exercises unlimited dominion over more than a hundred millions of human beings, whose labor she controls as effectually as our citizens do that of their slaves! It is not to be credited that she will venture to assume, in her relation with us, a principle so utterly indefensible, and which could not but expose her to imputations which would make her sincerity questionable. This she must see, and to the fact that she does he attributed her long and obstinate silence.

But it may be asked, why, then, does she not make reparation at once in so clear a case? Why not restore the slaves, or make ample compensation to their owners? He could imagine but one motive: she had among her subjects many whose fanatical feelings on this subject she was unwilling to offend; but, while respecting the feelings of her subjects, blind and misdirected as they are, she ought not to forget that our Government is also bound to respect the feelings of its citizens. Let her remember that, if to respect the rights which our citizens have over their slaves be offensive to any portion of her subjects, how much more so would it be to our citizens for our Government to acquiesce in her refusal to respect our right to establish the relation which one portion of our population shall have to another, and how unreasonable it would be for her to expect that our Government should be more indifferent to the feelings of its citizens than hers to any portion of her subjects. He, with every lover of his country, on both sides, desired sincerely to see the peace and harmony of the two countries preserved; but he held that the only condition on which they could possibly be preserved was that of perfect equality and a mutual respect for their respective institutions; and he could not but see that a perseverance in withholding redress in these cases must, in the end, disturb the friendly relations which now so happily exist between the two countries.

He hoped, on resuming the correspondence, our Government would press the claim for redress in a manner far more earnest and becoming the importance of the subject than it has heretofore done. It seemed to him that a vast deal too much had been said about the decision of the courts and the acts of the British Government than ought to have been. They have little or nothing to do with the case, and can have no force whatever against the grounds on which our claims for justice stand. However binding on their own subjects, or foreigners voluntarily entering her dominions, they can have no binding effect whatever, where misfortune, such as in these cases, placed our citizens within her jurisdiction.

If they be properly presented, and pressed on the attention of the British Government, he could not doubt but that speedy and ample justice would be done. It could not be withheld but by an open refusal to do justice, which he could not anticipate. As to himself, he should feel bound, as one of the representatives from the slaveholding States, which had a peculiar and deep interest in the question, to bring this case annually before Congress, so long as he held a seat on this floor, if redress shall be so long withheld.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION AND HARBOR BILLS.

The bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1837, and the bill making appropriations for certain (old) harbors, &c. for 1837, were severally read a third time, and passed; the latter by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Clayton, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Linn, McKean, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Southard, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, Webster, Wright—26.

struction of certain roads (including the Cumberland road) having been taken up—

Mr. NORVELL, after making a few remarks, moved to strike out the fourth section, which provides for the repayment of the appropriation for the road out of the two per cent. fund.

The question on the amendment being taken by yeas and nays, it was rejected, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Lyon, McKean, Moore, Norvell, Preston, Ruggles, Southard, Spence, Webster, White—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Kent, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wright—22.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, and passed.

TEXAS.

Mr. RUGGLES moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the resolution relative to recognising the independence of Texas was adopted, in order that he might change his vote, which was given, under misapprehension, in the affirmative.

Mr. WALKER was opposed to the motion, because he regarded it as a violation of the spirit of the rule, at least. If the vote were reconsidered, the result as to the resolution would not be disturbed. Being satisfied that this would be the case, and as time was now so precious, he felt it his duty to move to lay the motion of reconsideration on the table. Mr. W. withdrew the motion at the request of Mr. CALHOUN, who said he concurred with the Senator from Mississippi in what he had said as to the rule. And Mr. C. did not regard the motion of the Senator from Maine as going the whole length of reconsideration; all that he wanted was to correct his vote. Mr. C. renewed the motion to lay the motion of reconsideration on the table.

Mr. HUBBARD asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the question was determined in the negative: Yeas 23, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Kent, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Mouton, Nicholas, Parker, Preston, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Walker, White—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, McKean, Morris, Norvell, Page, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, Wright—25.

The question then recurred on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, which was decided in the negative, as follows—the votes being equal:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, McKean, Morris, Norvell, Page, Prentiss, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, Wright—24.

DISTRIBUTION QUESTION.

A message having been received from the House of Representatives, disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate in striking out the 2d section of the fortification bill, providing for the distribution of the surplus revenue among the States—

Mr. WRIGHT moved that the Senate do insist upon its amendment.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed his hope that the Senate would recede, and not resist an expression of the will of the Representatives of the people, given by so decided a majority as was said to have voted in the other House.

Mr. CLAY said it was at least in order to indulge in suppositions as to what had passed elsewhere; and supposing the land bill to have been rejected in the other House, (a fact he rejoiced to hear,) could any Senator doubt that there would remain a large surplus in the Treasury, especially if other measures which had passed the Senate, and which contemplated large expenditures, should follow the fate of the land bill?

He urged the propriety of submitting to an expression of the popular will, so distinctly manifested as it had now been. Was it not wisdom to look ahead?—to provide for the future? If a surplus accumulated, was it not better to return it to the people of the several States than to leave it in the hands of the deposit banks? As to what had lately been said by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] in regard to his favor for a land bill he had formerly had the honor to introduce, and the favorable prospects of that bill, Mr. C. had not seen any indications in the course of the Senate which would encourage much hope for that measure, (though Mr. C. did not finally relinquish hope in regard to it;) but although he should infinitely prefer such a disposition of the surplus revenue as that bill proposed, he would accept, as an alternative measure, the distribution clause inserted by the other House in the fortification bill, rather than leave the money in the deposit banks. Mr. C. said that the country owed its thanks to the other House for what it had recently done; he rejoiced to see light breaking out in that glorious quarter, so immediately related to the people; and was it possible that a majority of the Senate would oppose the ascertained popular will in relation to the disposition of the surplus revenue? The Senate had tried the House once, and they insisted on the amendment. They knew the ground on which they stood; they well knew that they were with the people in the stand they had taken.

Would the Senate, with all these facts before them, repeat the vote they had before given? He trusted not. He put it to the majority, who held the power of this body, whether they would not yield to the wishes of the people—wishes known not merely by the course of their Representatives, but through a thousand other channels, so that it was impossible to mistake it? Would gentlemen insist on leaving the public money in the hands of the deposit banks, and under such an agency as now superintended them?

Mr. CRITTENDEN made some remarks. He was understood to refer to the reproaches cast on him, and those who voted with him, on a former occasion, for the loss of the fortification bill; and to ask, if the fortification bill should now be lost, at whose door the blame would lie?

Mr. CALHOUN said the naked question was, whether the surplus revenue should be left in the deposit banks, or should be returned to the people to whom it belonged.

The question was now taken, and decided, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Wright—28.

[SENATE.]

Robbins, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White—22.

So it was resolved that the Senate insist on their amendment; and it was ordered that the House be notified accordingly.

FALMOUTH AND ALEXANDRIA RAILROAD.

The bill to aid the Falmouth and Alexandria Railroad Company to construct their road within the District of Columbia having undergone much debate, and some amendments, the Senate took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate informally passed over the bill under consideration, and took up the bill for the relief of Furlay Kellogg; which was ordered to a third reading.

They then took up the Indian appropriation bill, which had come from the House with amendments, covering the expenses of several Indian treaties on our Northwestern frontier, and sundry minor items for examining the country to the southwest of Missouri, and into the depredations in Florida previous to the war, and for the salaries of additional Indian agents.

After some remarks by Mr. WHITE, objections by Mr. SEVIER, and replies by Mr. TIPTON, the amendments were concurred in.

FALMOUTH AND ALEXANDRIA RAILROAD.

The Senate then resumed the bill respecting the railroad to Fredericksburg.

Mr. HUBBARD strenuously opposed the amendments to the bill, which, as he stated, went to appropriate $300,000 to the construction of the road. He asked the yeas and nays.

Mr. PARKER replied, contending that the money was to be spent exclusively within the District of Columbia, by which all constitutional objection was removed.

Mr. PRESTON advocated the amendments, stated the miserable state of the road at present, and asked why, when public works were made toward every other point of the compass, the moment any thing was proposed towards the South it was strenuously opposed.

After a desultory debate, in which Mr. KENT, Mr. HUBBARD, Mr. PRESTON, Mr. WALKER, Mr. NORVELL, Mr. SWIFT, Mr. RIVES, Mr. BUCHANAN, Mr. PARKER, Mr. HENDRICKS, Mr. BROWN, and Mr. LYON, took part, and in which the constitutional objections to the measure were discussed, (the bill being zealously advocated, especially by Mr. PARKER,) the bill was slightly amended, and then ordered to its third reading, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Hendricks, Kent, King of Georgia, Linn, Mouton, Norvell, Parker, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Southard, Strange, Tipton, Walker—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Prentiss, Sevier, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Wall, White—17.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and remained engaged in it until a late hour, and then adjourned.

FRIDAY, MARCH 3.

The various standing committees were successively discharged from the consideration of all subjects before them on which they had not reported.

DISTRIBUTION QUESTION.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, stating that the House insisted in its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the fortification bill, (which amendment struck out the clause providing for a distribution of the surplus revenue,) whereupon it was

Resolved, That the Senate request a conference, and appoint, on their part, Messrs. WRIGHT, PARKER, and WEBSTER, as a committee to conduct the same.

After transacting some other business,

The CHAIR announced to the Senate that there was no business on the table, or otherwise before the Senate. The Senate then took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to executive business. When the doors were reopened, Mr. WRIGHT reported to the Senate that the committees of conference of the two Houses on the amendment to the fortification bill had met and conferred, but had been able to come to no agreement.

HARBOR BILL.

The harbor bill was received from the House, with several amendments, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DAVIS, from the committee, reported the bill to the Senate, recommending a concurrence in the amendments.

Mr. STRANGE opposed the amendments on constitutional grounds, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. LINN replied, explained, and advocated the concurrence.

Mr. STRANGE insisted on his objection, and complained that the valley of the Mississippi should be made, by this legislation, to swallow up all the bounty of the Government.

Mr. DAVIS advocated the amendments, the details of which he explained and defended serialim, and pressed a concurrence.

The vote was then taken, and resulted as follows: For concurrence 31, against it 11.

So the amendments to the harbor bill were concurred in.

NAVY PENSION FUND.

Mr. RIVES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a recommendation that the Senate disagree to the amendments from the House of Representatives to the bill for the more equitable administration of the navy pension fund.

Mr. R. explained the ground of the recommendation. The bill of the Senate went to raise the pensions of the widows of officers before March, 1835, to the level of those since that date, while the amendment of the House proposed to cut down the pensions since 1835 to the level of those before that time.

The recommendation of the committee was assented to, and the Senate disagreed to the amendment from the House.

DISTRIBUTION QUESTION.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, informing the Senate that the House adhered to its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the fortification bill.

Mr. WRIGHT thereupon moved that the Senate adhere to its amendment.

Mr. CALHOUN observed that this was a very important amendment indeed, and one which he deeply regretted the committee had deemed it proper to report. He could not consent to sit by in silence, and suffer the question to be taken, without at least requesting to hear some reason why an amendment of this character had been reported. If there should be a large surplus in the Treasury, as there was every reason to expect there would be, the natural and proper distribution of it was obviously to return it to the people. He could not but express his surprise that the committee should expect the Senate to strike out an amendment of this importance, simply on their recommendation.

Mr. WRIGHT said that it was not his purpose to occupy the time of the Senate at this late period of the session. None knew better than the Senator from South Carolina the nature of the amendment, and the hearings of the whole question. The subject was as well understood by every member of the Senate as it could be by the committee. The section which the House of Representatives had added to this bill was precisely the bill introduced at the commencement of the session by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina himself, which had been referred to the Finance Committee, and long since reported on. Surely the gentleman did not expect a written report on a bill referred but yesterday, and embracing a subject of such vast magnitude. The amendment involved as important a question as ever had been submitted to Congress; and if this had been the first time the Senate had ever heard of it, there would have been great propriety in requiring either a written report, or at least some verbal explanation in regard to it. But Mr. W. did not feel bound, as the case stood, to make a long report on a matter with which every body was familiar, and on which he could not suggest a single new idea. A report, under such circumstances, would, if made, change no opinion. This was the simple explanation which he had to make (so far as he was personally concerned) in reply to the call of the honorable Senator from South Carolina. By the committee the subject of a written report had not once been mentioned. For himself, he considered the section which had been added to the bill as completely disconnected with the subject-matter of the bill as it left the Senate, as one thing could be distinct from another. It was in fact an important act of independent legislation. All the members of the Senate were acquainted with Mr. W.'s opinions on the principles of the measure proposed by the amendment, and he should not, therefore, detain the Senate or waste its time by stating them. Mr. W. offered this explanation as an apology for the absence of a report on the amendment; whether it would prove acceptable to the Senator from South Carolina, he could not say.

Mr. CALHOUN said he now understood the Senator from New York to rest the question of concurrence in the amendment on the discussion which had taken place at the last session. To this he could have no objection; for, so triumphant had been the argument last year in favor of the distribution bill, that the gentleman had been left in a minority of six against the whole Senate. As no reason had since intervened to change the circumstances of the case, Mr. C. was content to rest the issue as it had then been made. A more triumphant argument he had never listened to; and, such had been its irresistible force, that it had broken through the bonds of party discipline, and compelled gentlemen to leave their party and vote for the bill. He would not repeat it, but he would ask those Senators who had at the last session felt and admitted its force, and had voted for the distribution bill, whether they would now change their ground, without a single argument having been urged in reply. Surely the Senator from New York was bound to show some difference in the case, which should induce those who had voted for distribution last year to vote against it now. The Senator from New York owed this to gentlemen of his own side, if he expected them thus to turn about in the face of the world.

Mr. WRIGHT rejoined. He was bound to say that the principles which had governed his own course remained unchanged, without recriminating on any who now differed from him. It was unimportant to him for what reasons other gentlemen might have changed their ground; but he supposed and believed, and so did the gentleman from South Carolina, that the surplus actually existing at the last session, and that which was then certainly anticipated, and which must be disposed of in some way, had governed the action of gentlemen who then voted for the bill. And if the same state of things were certain now, they would act in conformity with it. Mr. W. had no doubt that all those gentlemen who voted for the bill of the last session had acted just as conscientiously as he had himself done in voting against it. He admitted that the opinions which he had at that time held on the subject of the surplus had, to some extent, proved erroneous. But surely the Senator from South Carolina would not call upon him for the reasons which actuated others. If gentlemen should act differently on this occasion from the manner in which they had acted at the last session, the Senator would, no doubt, find them ready to vindicate their course, and much more able than himself to explain the considerations which actuated them. He trusted that this would supersede the censure of the honorable gentleman.

Mr. CLAY hoped that the question would be decided by yeas and nays. The proposition adopted, said he, by the House of Representatives, and now sent to this body for its concurrence, is, that any surplus revenue which may remain in the Treasury on the 1st of January next, beyond the wants of the Government, shall, after retaining five millions, be distributed among the States. If at that time there shall be no surplus, the bill will have, of course, no effect; if there be, it will. What are the objections to concurring? We have been favored with very few on this occasion. I would ask of the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. WARENT] whether it is his intention that, in case there shall be a large surplus, it is to remain in the deposit banks which have now the custody of the public money, at an interest to the Government of two per cent.? Does the honorable Senator think that that is a prudent and proper disposition of the public funds? A great central State in our neighborhood has, I understand, directed that her portion of the surplus distributed in January last be placed in banks, paying for it an interest of 6 per cent.; and there was not any difficulty in the arrangement. Does the Senator consider it as a wise and proper financial operation to keep the money of the United States in deposit banks, at an interest of two per cent., when, for the same money, the Government might obtain six per cent. on adequate security? I am anxious to know what is to be the policy of the coming administration on this subject.

[Mr. WRIGHT. Their policy is to have no surplus.]

Mr. CLAY resumed. Then take the land bill, like an honest man. There is the remedy. That will be better than your restrictive measures on the sale of the public lands, which throw open 180 millions of acres at a time. I should be glad, I say, to know what the administration policy is to be; the country has a right to know. The honorable Senator was stout last session in his denial that there would be a surplus: oh, no; there would be no surplus—no surplus. At length, however, he was obliged to admit that there would be some—a little; but how did it turn out? We all know. Well, if there is to be a surplus in January, what is to be done with it? Is it to be kept in the deposit banks at two per cent. interest? Is that your calculation? Is that the policy you will announce to the people? Why, what do the daily developments which are taking place demonstrate? Do they not prove that these deposit banks are but so many mere political machines? Have you seen the application recently made by one of the banks in the city of New York for a share of the public money? The greatest recommendation urged by the applicants, their strongest argument, is this: "We are cordial friends to the distinguished chief who has so ably filled the chair of the Chief Magistrate," &c. Let me now make an appeal to the majority in this House, and I am glad that what I say will be heard by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES.] This body has been pronounced by him to be the aristocratic branch of the Federal Government. If not positively and avowedly aristocratic, it has at least a squinting toward aristocracy. Well, and who are the majority of the aristocracy here? Are they not the friends of the administration? Now, the democratic branch in Congress have determined that it is unwise and improper to leave a large surplus revenue in the deposit banks, to pay the country an interest of two per cent.; and whence does the opposition to this salutary democratic measure proceed? From the aristocratic majority in the Senate. Are you, then, going to confirm your own charges against this body? I take your own words, and I ask, will you oppose the democracy of the country? Will you withstand the people's will? Will you, by a silent report, give your lordly dissent to what they have approved and resolved upon? I call on that majority of this Senate who, at the last session, thought it unwise to leave the public money in the deposit banks, to rally around their own principles, to stand by their democratic friends in the other House, and to take the money of the nation out of the hands of these deposit banks, and distribute it among the people of the States, on the principles advocated by themselves last year. I fear, however, the Senator from New York cannot be brought to consent to this arrangement. Well, then, I will propose to him, by way of a compromise, that he consent to the land bill. This is a middle measure; it disposes of two great interests at once. Is it possible to conceive of a better disposition both of the question of the surplus and the question of the tariff? If the honorable gentleman will consent to that, I will agree with him; but I entreat the majority of this body not to lend themselves to the plan of retaining this surplus revenue in a few banks, to be selected by the administration. I hope we shall not agree to the recommendation of the Committee on Finance, and I trust that its honorable chairman will, when the yeas and nays shall be called, be found now, as he was found at the last session, standing in a small minority. I ask that the question may be decided by yeas and nays.

Mr. RIVES said he did not rise from any wish to lengthen this debate, but merely with a view to submit a few remarks in reply to the appeal which had been addressed to himself and others by the honorable Senator from Kentucky. I do not see why he was so particularly anxious that I should hear what he had to say on this subject. I have often listened to that honorable Senator, always with pleasure, and often with profit; but what was it he was so anxious I should hear? In some observations which I had the honor to submit upon another occasion, I took occasion to say that, in a philosophic view of the structure of this Government, the Senate was to be considered as the aristocratic branch of it; not that every individual member of that body was an aristocrat, in the odious sense of that term, but that the body, from the manner of its constitution, was less immediately subject than the other House to the popular will. On that point, I shall enter into no controversy, but I would apply the honorable Senator's argument to his own case. He says that we are bound now to show that we of the Senate are not aristocratic in our feelings and course of action, and we are to do this by obeying the impulses which proceed from the democratic branch in the other House; and he contends that, if we shall refuse to do so, it will be a verification of what I said. There is no propriety in his making an issue with me; but let it be admitted that the argument is properly addressed to a democratic majority, and it amounts to this: that, in order to vindicate their democratic character, they must, in all things and on all occasions, submit to an expression of the will of the democratic branch of the Government. If this be so, let me remind the Senator of his own course in relation to that very important measure, the fortification bill of the last session. He cannot but recollect the appropriation by the House of Representatives of three millions of dollars, in anticipation of the contingency of a war with one of the European Powers. The amendment came here, and was sternly rejected. Notwithstanding the gentleman's doctrine of submission to the democratic branch, the rejection was persisted in until, by means of it, the bill was lost. The Senator himself, on that occasion, set an example directly the reverse of what he is now contending for. I do not call up this subject from any desire to revive the heats which then prevailed, but I mention it as an occasion of reminding him that, if he means to urge a principle of action upon us, he must at least observe it himself.

Now, what ought to be the course of the Senate? Will the Senator from Kentucky, or any other gentleman, who does not speak merely ad captandum, say, that when the Senate stands committed before the world to a great system of policy, and an amendment comes from the other House, proceeding on wholly different grounds, this body is bound to surrender the policy it approves, and adopt that which comes from the House of Representatives? Does not the whole system of this Senate proceed upon the ground that there should not be any surplus revenue? Have we not altered the land system and reduced the tariff for the express purpose of preventing a surplus? And now, when we are openly pledged to the country, and to the world, not to distribution, but to reduction, must we at once turn about and say that there shall be a surplus, and that it shall be distributed among the States? Is there any fairness in requiring us to surrender all our fixed opinions at the mere bidding of a majority of the other House? There are other channels, beside the acts of that body, through which we may learn the will of the people. Member as I am of that which, according to its essential genius, is the aristocratic branch of this Government, I do hold myself under the control of public opinion, as it comes to me in authentic forms. The House of Representatives is not the only oracular source whence I am to learn it. There are the acts of my own State Legislature; there is the public press; there are a thousand other legitimate exponents of public opinion. Looking at these indicia, what do we see? We see that, even by the temporary distribution of the surplus which had accumulated last year, we have thrown an apple of discord among the States. Such is the language of my own State. While, owing to the pressure of circumstances, she has felt herself constrained to accept the deposit of her quota of the surplus, she warns this Government against the repetition of the measure. And what did we hear from the gentleman from Connecticut? [Mr. NILES.] He tells us that he has received letters from many members of his own State Legislature, describing the conflicts in that body, and all terminating with this oburgation: "For God's sake, send us no more surplus." Such has been the effect in all the New England States; and I do say that the public sentiment of this nation, as expressed by its legitimate organs, echoes the same sentiment. Let us have no more surplus, but bring down the revenue. In yielding to the public sentiment, thus fully expressed, there is no inconsistency with democratic principles, but the contrary.

We are reminded, however, that many of us voted for the distribution bill of the last session. But what were the circumstances? Then we had a large amount of surplus actually in hand. We could not get rid of it. Ought we to have expended it in reckless and anti-republican extravagance, or should it be left in the deposit banks? I then said that it was infinitely better to distribute it among the States. I chose this as the lesser evil; I always regarded it as an evil, never as a good; and I resorted to it only as a means of preventing greater evil. Now there is no actual surplus, although I see that, if there is not some change in the revenue laws, there is every probability that there will be one. We have adopted two important measures, which, according to the gentleman from Kentucky himself, are well calculated to prevent a surplus. In saying this, I refer to a part of his speech which I was so unfortunate as to lose; I was not in my seat when, I am told, the honorable Senator referred to myself. His remarks I shall be happy to notice at another time, though I cannot attend to them at present. I understand that he distinctly took the ground, when objecting to the reduction of the tariff, that that reduction was not necessary in order to bring down the revenue, because that had already been done by the land bill.

[Mr. CLAY here explained. What he had said was this: that, if all the measures passed by the Senate should be concurred in by the House, there would probably be no surplus; in which remark he had alluded to the various extravagant measures which had been voted.]

We viewed these measures, which the honorable Senator characterizes as extravagant, as connected with each other, and constituting a whole. I shall not enter upon a consideration of them now. The most important, and those which the Senate chiefly relied on to reduce or to prevent a surplus, were the land bill and the bill to reduce the tariff, (and which, if passed, will reduce it by two and a half millions.) After a long and painful deliberation and debate, we brought those bills into a shape acceptable to the Senate, and they were adopted and passed. They indicated the course of policy approved and sanctioned by this body. But here comes an amendment which is based upon directly opposite principles; an amendment which proceeds upon the assumption that there is to be a surplus, and that it must be distributed among the States. If this is to prevail, both the tariff bill and the land bill are at once superseded. It is in vain for gentlemen to blink the question. That must be the inevitable consequence. But after we are solemnly pledged to the reduction policy, must we at once surrender it, out of our profound respect for the other branch of the Legislature? And we must do this lest we incur the odium of aristocracy! The Senator from Kentucky must surely have apprehended the spirit of my remark as to the aristocratic character of this body. He cannot but have understood me as not referring to the character of individuals, but to the genius of this branch of the Government, to the character purposely given to it by the provisions of the constitution; and I insist that, from its structure, it does possess this character. I avow that as my sentiment; I repeat it openly; and, formidable as the Senator from Kentucky always is, I am ready to discuss it with him. But this is not the time for such a discussion. I should not have said a word but for the pointed reference of the honorable gentleman to myself. I did hear his remarks, and listened to them with profound attention; but, weighty as they were, they would have been far more so had they been supported by his own example.

Mr. CRITTENDEN followed. He expressed strong surprise that gentlemen who had voted for the distribution bill of the last session should declare that they could see no analogy between that law and the present amendment. Not only was there the most perfect analogy between the two, but a perfect identity. The bill of the last session and the amendment now proposed by the House of Representatives were in the very same terms. The subject-matter of both was the same, and they differed only as to the amount—a difference which involved no principle, but was a mere incidental fact, in no way touching the essence of the amendment or affecting its character. So far as the question of constitutional law was concerned, the two were perfectly identical; and all that prevented their identity in all respects was the difference in the amount of money which might be in the Treasury on the 1st of January next from that which had been there on the 1st of January of last year. Could gentlemen find in this difference sufficient ground to change their votes? If it was right to distribute $38,000,000, why was it not right to distribute $10,000,000? The policy which dictated the one equally sanctioned the other. The policy of collecting revenue for the purpose of distributing it was advocated by none; but if a surplus of revenue legitimately collected did occur, how ought it to be disposed of? Ought it to be thrown into the deposit banks, to excite the cupidity of these corporations and encourage reckless speculations? Or should it be thrown back into the hands of the people? This was the question which had been decided at the last session. Congress determined in favor of the latter alternative. But because they had restored to the people $38,000,000 of their own money, was it time for Government to indemnify itself by retaining $10,000,000 to meet the fancies or the lusts of those in power?

But the honorable Senator from Virginia was reluctant to throw an apple of discord into the State Legislatures. The return of their own money might be converted into an apple of discord by State politicians, but to the country at large it was the bond of peace and union. How were the States to be agitated by a measure which gave peace to the Union? Ought the Government, in the excess of its patriotism, magnanimity, and tender mercy, to take the people's money out of their hands to relieve them from discord? Should the Government render itself unhappy and distracted, in its disinterested desire to save the people from corruption? The people, it seemed, were to be fatally corrupted by handling this money; but the Government might be steeped to the lips in the corrupting stream, and still remain purer than snow. To manage the money would occasion the Government no embarrassment whatever; but the poor silly people were unable to bear so weighty a trust, and to them it would prove but an apple of discord.

Another reason urged in opposition to the measure was, that it would inspire the members of the National Legislature with narrow and selfish feelings: each man would be endeavoring to withhold the appropriations necessary to the general good, from a hope of securing a larger share of surplus for his own State. Nothing could be more idle than such an objection. Did not gentlemen perceive that the same argument might be applied to the ordinary duty of appropriation? Was there not the same temptation to withhold the taxes; and might not gentlemen as well argue that the General Government could never go on, because it would be the interest of the representatives to prevent the taxation of their constituents? The argument was precisely the same; and if it was a valid argument, it went to show that the American people were incapable of conducting a free republican Government. His friend who had last addressed the Senate appeared to have serious apprehensions lest his colleague had repeated what were unpopular opinions, and seemed resolved for himself to eschew such a course, as the greatest of misfortunes. Mr. C. hoped he would never fall under so heavy a calamity; but unless the people of that gentleman's State had a distaste for money, which did not belong to Mr.

Distribution Question.

[SENATE.]

C's constituents, it was possible he might find that he had himself incurred the same disaster which he had so earnestly deprecated in the case of Mr. C's colleague. For his own part, he had not seen a single man in his own quarter of the country who at all disapproved of Kentucky's taking her share in the distribution of the surplus. Yet he had never understood that the people of that part of the Union were distinguished by an inordinate regard for money. He did not think that in that respect they went very far beyond the people of the North and of the East. He feared, lest some great change had passed upon the character of the gentleman's constituents, that he would find on his return home that they had again relapsed into at least a due estimate of the value of money. He could not but apprehend that the honorable Senator would find it somewhat hard to persuade them that it was better that millions of the public revenue should remain in the Treasury than in their pockets. The honorable Senator, however, did not, he presumed, need any of his admonition; he doubted not that he would be sufficiently careful of his own popularity.

Some of the States, to be sure, had shown themselves very coy in taking their share; but whatever might have been their scruples, and the throes of their conscience, he believed that as yet not one had refused; and, what was more, they would take the same again and again, whenever it might be deemed necessary to disencumber the Treasury.

The Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] had said that it was the policy of the coming administration to have no surplus. A very proper policy, indeed; and the present amendment would give to the nation ample security that such a policy should be observed. Give them this security, and then the majority would never be found creating a surplus with a view to retain and manage it. There were several ways to prevent a surplus: one was, not to raise more money than was wanted; another method, equally certain, was to make the expenditure come up to the amount of the receipts. Now, the amendment proposed would tend to preserve the economy of this Government. If virtue, as has a thousand times been observed, was the foundation of republican Government, then a lavish expenditure of public money, by corrupting the virtue of the nation, must have a direct tendency to undermine public virtue; and the amendment, by preventing the accumulation of an extravagant surplus at the disposal of the Government, would contribute so far to the preservation of virtue, and thereby to the safety of our liberties. In every point of view, Mr. C. considered the distribution policy as good. Gentlemen had expressed an apprehension that if the experiment of distribution should again be made, the thing would, in a short time, become habitual, and that all previous measures would be calculated with a reference to that end. He had no such apprehensions. It was proposed to distribute only the superfluous and unnecessary revenue; and what better could be done with this, than to give it back to the people? He trusted that none of those who had supported this policy at the last session would oppose it now. The action of the House of Representatives went clearly to show that the people approved of the measure. So forcible had been the pressure of public opinion, that it had broken down all party trammels. Men had revolted from under party discipline, from a wholesome fear of their constituents. As far as his knowledge extended, the public sentiment of the country was all in favor of distribution. There could be no good reason for leaving the surplus in the banks. The Executive had told the Senate that it furnished great means for speculation; and so strong had been his conviction of the evil to be apprehended, that, with a view to prevent it, he had assumed the responsibility of issuing the Treasury order; and yet the Senate was to be deterred from a measure which was legal and legitimate, and which would remedy the evil. This went to show that, after all, the majority of the Senate were in favor of banks and banking. He remembered well when the President, in commencing his attack on the United States Bank, held out to the nation the golden prospect of a specie circulation. It was the cheap purchase of anticipated glory. It rang from Maine to Georgia, and the bank was destroyed. The nation had all been in the most triumphant anticipation of those halcyon days which were to follow; but when the time was actually come, and the friends of the administration were asked for what they had promised, behold, what a multitude of objections were at once interposed. One was afraid that the money would corrupt the people; another that its possession would create interminable discord; another dreaded the danger of the example, and predicted that it would weaken the Government, and make it a mere collector for the States. Thus, after all the promises, and after the first great step had been taken, gentlemen were likely to fall back into the old position, to keep fast hold of the money bags; and when the people remonstrated, to reply by assuring them that they were incapable of managing their money; that it would only corrupt them; and that their wisest course would be to leave it in the pure and incorruptible hands of those who now had the management of it.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, was desirous of submitting a few remarks, which he considered due to the occasion. He was not one who was in favor of collecting revenue for the sake of again distributing it, and the gentlemen who placed the matter on that footing lost their argument on him. He had no such disposition now, nor had he been so disposed when the deposit bill of last session was passed. It was not the proposition of this amendment. The proposition went on the supposition that there would be a surplus. If no surplus should arise, the clause would have no effect; it would be altogether nugatory; but if there was a surplus, it would place the money in safe keeping, and at the same time avoid all the mischief of retaining it in the deposit banks. While Mr. E. was unwilling, on the one hand, to create a surplus with the view to distribution, he would not, on the other, consent to unsettle the business or disturb the tranquility of the country for the sake of avoiding one. He was opposed to interfering with the compromise, and he still hoped it would not be interfered with. He would not upset an arrangement of that importance to prevent a surplus of two millions, at the expense of more than fifty millions of injury to the country. It would be better to throw the money into the Potomac. Nor was he disposed to give away the public lands, to prevent the price of them from coming into the Treasury; nor was he willing to give the public domain at less than its value to a certain exclusive set, rather than let all our citizens share equally in its advantages, as heretofore. If a surplus arose, he would rather distribute it than avoid its accumulation by measures like these, or by extravagant appropriations beyond what had ever been known before. If the laws of the country brought a surplus into the Treasury, he would not wrest the laws for the sake of preventing it; nor would he absorb the revenue in lavish and wasteful expenditures, rather than distribute a surplus. If it came into the Treasury in a fair and legitimate manner, he would dispose of it as it had been disposed of last year. He could not see the least distinction between the two cases. Some gentlemen had said that they could see no resemblance between the case of last session and the case of this; to him they appeared not only like each other, but the same. This amendment was in the very words of the distribution bill of last year; it was a perfect fac simile of that bill.

Distribution Question.

[MARCH 3, 1837.]

Here was certainly some slight resemblance. It was, indeed, very true that, while the form of the bill was the same, there might exist a state of things which would make the bill very different in principle. Now, let us see what are these alleged points of distinction. Gentlemen had said that last year it had been admitted that there would be a surplus. It was very true that he had admitted it, and those who acted with him; but there had been gentlemen on the other side who protested strongly that there would be no surplus. All the difference, then, in that respect, consisted in this: that more had been admitted at the last session than now. Mr. E. heard none now say that there would be no surplus. His own estimate at the last session had been that there would be one of ten, fifteen, or eighteen millions, if the appropriations were marked with any thing like moderation. But both appropriations and revenue had far exceeded his calculations. But be this as it might, the same argument which had been urged last year applied equally well now; if there was no surplus, this law would divide nothing. It was a hypothetical law. He would not, indeed, agree to pass a law which would probably be nugatory, but that did not apply to the present amendment, because there was every probability that there would be something, and not a little, to divide. They knew that there was to come in a large incidental sum from the Bank of the United States; then there were the receipts from the customs, and the receipts from the public lands; so that when gentlemen came to see the actual figures next winter, he rather believed that they would find not less than twelve millions of dollars, which must either remain in the deposit banks or be distributed among the States. As to the proper time for passing the bill, gentlemen knew that various deposit banks complained even last year. The Secretary told Congress that the sudden withdrawal of the money from those institutions would cause a great shock. Why not, then, give him time? If they waited until the next session, much time would necessarily be consumed in legislation; and after the bill passed, the banks would need time to conform themselves to the new arrangement, so that it would be past midsummer before a cent could actually be distributed. There was another reason for legislating at this time. It would give the deposit banks timely warning that the public moneys in their hands were not to be loaned out permanently, for the purpose of investments. Such a notice would be very important.

But it was said that this practice of distribution, if repeated, would become habitual, and that the General Government would starve for want of the requisite appropriations. Gentlemen who urged this objection must have greatly changed their ground within a few years. The friends of the honorable Senator on his left [Mr. BUCHANAN] had advocated the doctrine that too much was expended for the General Government. He held in his hand a report of a speech made by the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON], which seemed to have been carefully considered, in which that gentleman had endeavored to show that it required not less than eight millions to put the machinery of Government in motion. Allowing for extraordinaries, it might require twelve millions. The gentleman would remember that they had expended thirty-seven millions last year, and that he had recommended and strongly advocated the expenditure of not less than sixty millions, which was five times the amount of his own estimate of the necessary expenses of the Government. Did not this go to show that the danger was not that of starving the General Government, but quite on the other side? That the real danger was of making the appropriations so extravagant as to absorb the revenue, let it amount to what it might? The expense was not felt, because the money flowed into the Treasury without direct taxation; but the danger was only the greater on that account. Who had ever heard of a Government going backwards in its expenditure? What Government had ever been able to retreat? England, it was true, had freed herself from one million and a half, out of about forty millions—an enormous load of taxation—but it had not been without a mighty effort, a struggle which shook the kingdom. How could we ever accomplish a reduction of our national expenses, unless we fell on some disposition of the public revenue which should induce gentlemen to think what could be saved to their constituents?

Mr. DAVIS rose and said he could not permit a measure of so much consequence to be lost without expressing his dissent from so ill-advised and injurious a policy. The measure proposed was precisely the same which went through both Houses at the last session, with an almost unexampled unanimity. It proposed simply to trust the several States with the custody of all the surplus revenue, if any should exist, beyond five millions. If this fails, the money will go to the deposit banks. It is singular, if such distrust is entertained of the States, that their credit is not as good as that of the deposit banks! The amendment has been deprecated as introducing a new and dangerous policy; but let it be distinctly understood that it proposes that whatever surplus there may be beyond five millions shall be placed with the States, instead of being left in the deposit banks—that it shall be held by the officers of the States, instead of being under the control of the office-holders of the United States. This is the measure, and the whole measure, which has excited the extraordinary alarm and apprehension which we hear from gentlemen in this chamber.

Some Senators seem indignant because it is connected with the fortification bill. This is pronounced unnatural and highly objectionable, because the matters have no affinity. If the two measures could be conveniently separated, and presented each in a bill by itself, I should prefer that course; but every one who witnesses the daily proceedings in the other end of the Capitol knows that the order of business and the rules of action there are such that matters incongruous in themselves are every session brought together in the same bill, from necessity. The statute books contain the most plenary proof that such a course has it in nothing unusual. Admitting, therefore, that the connexion is unnatural, there is nothing in it unprecedented or uncommon. No one here can be ignorant of the fact that this important measure could not be acted upon at all by the House, unless as an amendment to some bill; and it must thus come up, or be left without consideration.

But is there any thing so unnatural as is represented between the bill and the amendment? The bill is an appropriation act, purely so; taking money from the Treasury to strengthen the defences of the country. The amendment provides for taking what remains, after these and other appropriations are satisfied, and placing it with the States. The great object of each is to dispose of the public money—the one in a useful, the other in a safe way; and all they differ in is, that the bill gives to what it takes one direction, and the amendment to what it takes another direction. Can it be said that they do not relate to the same subject? Does not the fortification bill relate to the public money? And does not the amendment relate to that, and nothing else? I confess I am not able to see much force in the objection, and am not surprised that the House disregarded it. It is, after all that has been made of it, but an unsatisfactory apology for giving a preference to the deposit banks over the treasuries of the States.

But it is a new act of distribution; and we are warned of the injustice and unconstitutionality of collecting revenue to distribute among the States. Let me say, at once, to all who thus speak of the amendment, that they misrepresent it. It makes no provision for the collection or the distribution of revenue. You will not collect a cent more or less of revenue, whether we adopt or reject it. It involves no question of policy, nor has it any connexion with the tariff; and the Senator from Mississippi is quite mistaken, when he attempts to prove that it has. It neither proposes to alter, modify, enlarge, diminish, or continue the revenue laws. Turn it which way you will, give to it whatever reading ingenuity is capable of, scrutinize it as closely as you please, and it provides for the safe keeping of the public money, if any sum over five millions shall be on hand; nothing more. And the only question here is, shall the States have the use of it till it is needed, or shall the stockholders of the deposit banks be enriched by loaning it out for their own benefit? This is all the matter we have to deal with; and let us meet it fairly; let us call it by the right name; and, if it is to be so, let the people understand that the interest of these banks is more powerful than their own in this place.

MARCH 3, 1837.]

Distribution Question.

[SENATE.]

Whose money is this? It belongs to the people; it is their property; and whom do you talk of corrupting and seducing from their duty by the fascinating influences of money? The people. The people are to be bribed and corrupted by possessing their own property. How wonderfully pure and patriotic the officers of this Government! They can trust themselves with the money; but the people will be corrupted and seduced, if their own property is permitted to approach so near to them as the State treasuries!
